order; and immediately after what has been read, at the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is what the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order."

The only person who called the gentleman to order was the occupant of the chair. He will state that when the quotation from "Marmion" was first used by the gentleman from Tennessee the words did not fall upon the ear of the Chair. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] occupies a seat most distant of all in the Hall from the Chair, and at the time he was speaking a member from Pennsylvania was consulting the Chair in regard to the business upon the Speaker's table and its relation to an important bill now pending, and thus the words used did not reach the Speaker, nor the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLY,] who sits nearer to the seat of the gentleman from Tennessee than does the Chair. If the Chair had heard those remarks, although as first used they were inferential and in the form of a quotation, he would have called the gentleman from Tennessee to order, the intent being evident from the language used. Those words were afterward repeated, and the Chair instantly called the gentleman from Tennessee to order. The gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] a few minutes later, raised the point of order that the whole debate was out of order as irrelevant, and the Chair sustained that point of order.

The rule as to questions of privilege is, that where a proposition is made which relates to the privileges of the House, it is—

"The duty of the Speaker to entertain it, at least to the extent of submitting the question to the House as to whether or not it presents a question of privilege."

This resolution does not appear a formal vote of censure. It is a resolution assuming to express the sense of the House in regard to the supposed violation of its privileges; and the Chair will therefore, in accordance with the rule which will be found, as he has quoted it, on page 156 of Barclay's Digest, submit the question to the House whether the resolution involves a question of privilege or not, and let the House determine it.

The question is, Will the House entertain the resolution as a question of privilege?

MR. SPALDING. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

MR. BANKS. If the resolution were before the House I should be very willing to sustain the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING.] But the Speaker has stated that he submits to the House the question whether the resolution shall be entertained as a question of privilege. Now, I do not understand that this resolution affects the privilege of this House at all, and therefore I must vote against its reception. It appears to be a simple expression of opinion in regard to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER,] and in regard to the politics of his constituents. It does not touch the privilege of the House at all, and therefore I hope it will not be entertained in any shape or form whatever, and thus establish a precedent.

MR. WARD, of New York. Would it be in order at this time to move a vote of censure upon the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER?]

THE SPEAKER. That question is not before the House. The question is, whether the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROOMALL] shall be entertained by the House as a question of privilege.

MR. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I raise the point of order, that as this resolution is not yet before the House all debate upon it is out of order.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the question of receiving the resolution is not debatable except by unanimous consent.

MR. FARNSWORTH. I would inquire of the Chair whether a mere sentimental resolution, which proposes no action, no censure whatever, is a question of privilege at all?

THE SPEAKER. That is a question for the House to determine. The Digest states that it is the duty of the Chair to submit to the House for its determination any question which it is claimed relates in any way to the privileges of the House.

MR. BANKS. I call the previous question.

MR. BROOMALL. If allowed by the House, I will withdraw the resolution for the purpose of amending it, so as to avoid the objections which have been made to it.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to withdraw the resolution before any vote is taken upon it.

MR. BROOMALL. Then I withdraw it.

MR. BANKS. I think it is important that the House should understand the exact position of the question.

MR. BROOMALL. Is there any question before the House? I have withdrawn the resolution.

MR. ELDRIDGE. Had the gentleman any right to withdraw it after the Chair had submitted the question of its reception to the House?

THE SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A motion may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment; but not after the previous question is recorded. It may, however, be withdrawn while the House is dividing on demand for the previous question."

THE SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair that rule applies to all motions. The question before the House was, whether this resolution should be entertained as a question of privilege. Before amendment or a vote the gentleman has a right to withdraw the resolution; and it has been withdrawn.

A RECUSANT WITNESS.

MR. COOK. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House on yesterday ordered John F. Tracy to be brought before the House to answer for contempt. I wish to say that I have received communications from New York this morning which show that the presence of Mr. Tracy is absolutely necessary this day, and was yesterday, before the board of directors of the Pacific railroad. I have brought this information to the attention of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE,] the chairman of the House portion of the joint Committee on Retrenchment. It seems to me that these communications show that Mr. Tracy has not been guilty of a contempt of the House.

MR. HALE. This is a subject upon which I have no personal feeling whatever. In regard to the person ordered to be brought to the bar of the House I have learned through several members that dispatches have been sent here from different sources and from different gentlemen, urging that Mr. Tracy be allowed to remain in New York to-day and to-morrow on account of private business. I have only to say that he was duly summoned to appear before the committee, but failed to do so, or to render any excuse for his non-appearance. The committee, therefore, unanimously instructed me to make the motion which I made yesterday. I will leave to the House to determine whether a private business engagement is to be considered a reasonable excuse for a person failing to attend, pursuant to a summons, before a committee of this House, conducting an investigation which has been ordered by the House, and deemed of sufficient importance to be inquired into. On that point I will express no opinion whatever; I shall be entirely satisfied with whatever action the House may choose to take upon it. I will say that I am perfectly satisfied, as I think all the members of the committee are, that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Cook,] who introduced the resolution ordering this investigation, acted in entire good faith.

MR. GRINNELL. It is known to many members of this House that Mr. Tracy is the president of the Chicago, Rock Island, and Pacific railroad and a director of the Union Pacific railroad. He has, I am told, very important and pressing business engagements, and I know that in failing to attend at the time appointed by the committee he meant no disrespect to the committee or the House. I hope there will be no objection to the motion to reconsider.

MR. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] for how long this extension of time is desired.

MR. COOK. The dispatch states that the board of directors of the Pacific Railroad Company require his presence to-day and to-morrow. The dispatch is from Hon. James Brooks, who, I believe, is one of the directors. Mr. Tracy will certainly be here on Monday, if this motion to reconsider be adopted.

MR. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I will agree to any arrangement that may be proposed provided that this gentleman will come here at the time the gentleman from Illinois has indicated. I desire to say that I join with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] in defending the entire good faith with which the gentleman from Illinois made this proposition. He was perfectly warranted in making this inquiry and offering the resolution requiring the appearance of Mr. Tracy as a witness. I may say that the reason for this investigation has not been substantiated. I desire that the House and the country shall know why and upon what grounds such an idle rumor was circulated, affecting the character of the Secretary of the Treasury and also the sub-Treasurer at New York. I think further that this occurrence will tend to give a wholesome lesson for the future to gentlemen in Wall street, who for their own purposes seek to influence the market so as to affect the values of Government stock and Government gold.

MR. HALE. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cook] allow me a word further?

MR. COOK. Yes, sir.

MR. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I ought to say that this is not a trifling case. Mr. Tracy, the person against whom process for contempt has issued, is the person on whose charges a resolution of inquiry was introduced here in regard to the improper loaning of gold in New York by an officer of the Government. The charges which have been made by this man, and which we have summoned him before us to sustain, are charges of felony against Mr. Van Dyke, the Assistant Treasurer at New York. The committee thought that it was too important a subject to be allowed to sleep; that the investigation should proceed as rapidly as possible, so that the country might be informed whether those charges are well founded or not.

MR. WENTWORTH. Will my colleague allow me a word?

MR. COOK. Yes, sir.

MR. WENTWORTH. I desire to ask whether this gentleman is willing to be here by Monday or Tuesday?

MR. COOK. By Monday morning.

MR. WENTWORTH. I see no reason why we should resort to this process of attachment to bring this man here if he is willing to be here on Monday. I know Mr. Tracy, and I should be willing to guaranty to the House that if he promises to be here on Monday he will be here. I believe, however, that this matter should be promptly investigated. Ever since this question of currency was brought before the House every man who has dared to raise his voice against the banks and against the expansion of the currency has been attacked as the menial of Mr. McCulloch. It has been charged that Mr. McCulloch has been speculating in the public securities; that he has been loaning the public funds. We have now a chance to drive these lies home, and we ought to do it. But if Mr. Tracy will pledge his honor that he will be here on Monday I for one am willing to wait for him. I hope that this committee will call before it not only Mr. Tracy, but every other man who charges that Mr. McCulloch has been guilty of a felony. Let us see who they are. If Mr. McCulloch has been guilty of official misconduct or malfeasance, let us impeach him; but if he is innocent, let us brand these liars with the infamy they deserve.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. I wish to ask whether the attachment ordered by the House yesterday has not already been issued; and if so, whether it is not too late for the House to reconsider the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair signed the attachment yesterday during the session of the House.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. I make the point of order, whether it is not too late for the House to reconsider?

Mr. COOK. I will answer the question. I asked the Sergeant-at-Arms at what time the attachment left, and he said it left last night; and Mr. Tracy will be brought before the House to-morrow unless this vote is reconsidered. It seems to me from the evidence, Mr. Tracy is detained by the board of directors of the Pacific railroad on a matter of importance to the Government. He telegraphed to me and asked me to request the committee to excuse him until after that thing was over. That telegraphic dispatch I received too late, and therefore I had no opportunity to present it. That he will be here on Monday morning next is perfectly certain. I think there is no doubt about it.

Mr. JOHNSON. How long has he been a delinquent?

Mr. COOK. I understand he was subpoenaed day before yesterday, and was expected yesterday morning.

Mr. JENCKES. I trust this resolution will not be reconsidered in the present state of this business. This gentleman, whatever his character may be, has neither obeyed the summons nor sent to the committee any excuse.

Mr. COOK. He telegraphed to me to lay the matter before the committee, and I did not get the telegram in time.

Mr. JENCKES. I submit that is not a proper mode of responding to a summons of this House. It was the duty of the committee to report his delinquency and to move his attachment. It has been done, and I trust we will see that gentleman here to-morrow to give his excuse at the bar of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope, Mr. Speaker, there will be no reconsideration of this vote. The Committee on Retrenchment, of which I also am a member, considered well what they were presenting to the House when they asked an attachment against Mr. Tracy.

What are the facts? Mr. Tracy is at New York, and is duly summoned as a witness. He has full twenty-four hours' notice, and he does not pretend not to have that notice, but makes his excuse, now when the matter comes to be inquired into, it was not convenient for him to come. Why not, sir? Because Mr. Tracy is president of a railroad company, and Mr. Tracy is perhaps, like other gentlemen, speculating at all times in stocks in Wall street. No matter what his engagements may be—

Mr. COOK. Mr. Brooks states Mr. Tracy was detained at the request of the board of directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Tracy, because he is serving with the board of directors of the Pacific Railroad Company, ought to keep this Congress waiting; is that it? Is Congress to wait upon this board of directors instead of the board of directors waiting upon Congress? Mr. Tracy gives no excuse, makes no explanation, does not attend to the notice of subpoena regularly served upon him. He does not attend here as he might have done at the time indicated. Now, what does it amount to? What does it mean? Would it be establishing a safe precedent that a president of a railroad company, at the request of a board of directors, shall come when summoned only at his convenience. When you summon a carpenter or shoemaker, who if he leaves his bench or plane, leaves his children to suffer during his absence, there is no sympathy for him. I do not present this for the purpose of drawing any distinction which may be demagogical, but I do it for the purpose of considering this case fairly. If anybody should attend it is this man, who should set an example, according to his intelligence and high position, of obedience to the laws of the land.

We do not take into consideration that it is inconvenient for Mr. Tracy to come here. But he did not let the committee know it was inconvenient; he did not ask to be excused; he did nothing, but refused and neglected, as the resolution which has been passed recites, to obey or give any regard to the subpoena served upon him.

Mr. JENCKES. I ask whether Mr. Tracy did not reply to the officer who served the summons that he would come that night.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir; he promised he would come, and the committee met for no other purpose whatever on the morning indicated except to hear Mr. Tracy's testimony. They waited for two hours, and no witness appearing the committee adjourned.

Now, sir, I think it time, when we take into consideration, particularly along with these facts, the fact that Mr. Tracy is himself the one important witness, the prosecuting witness, the witness who makes these grave charges, and he has declined or failed to appear as he was bound to do, that he should be made to understand that the processes of this body are to be regarded quite as much as the convenience or wishes of his fellow-members of the board of directors of a railroad. That is really the whole case, I think.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, having had some little experience on investigating committees, it seems to me that if the House is desirous of rendering the work of its committees at all efficient, and making them anything more than a farce, it should be reluctant to excuse this witness at the present time, in limine, before he comes before the House. It is important very often for investigating committees that a witness should appear when summoned, and that we should have no reason to suppose that any convenience of his own or any indulgence of ours will permit him to fix his own time to appear before a committee. I do not mean to say that that is the case with this man; but I mean simply to speak of the general rule. Often the witness may have a day or two to consult his own interest or the purpose which he may think the committee may have in view; and—

Mr. COOK. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. DAWES. Not while I am on the floor.

The SPEAKER. The mover has an absolute right to withdraw the motion at any time; the rule makes no limitation.

Mr. DAWES. For the purpose, then, of stating just what I wanted to say I renew the motion to reconsider. I wish to say that there never can be any hardship in undertaking to enforce this proposition, for the reason that the witness, when he is brought up, the first thing, before any action of the House, is called upon to show cause. He can come in and make a statement himself on paper explaining the reason, and if the House sees there is no intent to treat its precept with contempt it will let him off. Now, it seems to me that this witness of all others is in a position where he should at least come before this body and explain why he did not even so much as notice the precept of the House. Therefore, in order that he may come and make his statement to the House and the House pass upon it, I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House bill No. 765, amendatory of an act to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases." Also, that the Senate had passed a bill (S.

No. 347) entitled "An act to change certain collection districts in Maryland and Virginia."

Also, a bill (S. No. 460) in relation to persons imprisoned under sentence for offenses against the laws of the United States; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

LOYAL CLAIMANTS IN EAST TENNESSEE.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to report to this House the bill introduced by Hon. Mr. TROWBRIDGE at the last session of Congress, and referred to said committee, establishing a commission for the investigation and adjustment of claims of loyal persons of East Tennessee against the Government of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I object.

TAX ON ALCOHOL AND BURNING FLUID.

Mr. HOGAN. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a joint resolution to amend existing laws relating to the internal revenue. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue desires action upon it at once, and it is very important that it should pass immediately.

The joint resolution, which was read in full, provides that alcohol made or manufactured of distilled spirits upon which the tax imposed by law shall have been paid, and burning fluid made or manufactured of alcohol, or spirits of turpentine, or camphene, upon which the taxes imposed by law shall have been paid, shall be exempt from tax, and that so much of the act of June 30, 1864, as relates to alcohol and burning fluid is hereby repealed; and all products of distillation by whatever name known, which contain distilled spirits or alcohol on which the tax imposed by law has not been paid shall be considered and taxed as distilled spirits. The second section amends the internal revenue law by striking out the words "distillers of burning fluid and camphene."

No objection was made; and the joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIR OF JAMES BELL.

On motion of Mr. PRICE, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the papers in the case of the application of Rose A. Cameron, heir-at-law of James Bell, and the same were laid upon the table.

JOHN GRAY.

Mr. PRICE also, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill for the relief of John Gray; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of John Gray on the pension-roll at the rate of $200 per annum during his natural life, payable semi-annually.

Mr. DELANO. Has this bill the approbation of any committee?

Mr. PRICE. It has the approbation of the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions. I will state that this applicant is one hundred and three years old, and I have another similar case to report in which the applicant is one hundred and seven years old, and both of these men are now supported by public charity.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the bill by striking out "two hundred dollars" and inserting in lieu thereof "five hundred dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FREDERICK DANIEL BAKEMAN.

Mr. PRICE also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Frederick Daniel Bakeman, a revolutionary soldier; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Frederick Daniel Bakeman on the pension-roll at the rate of $200 per annum during his natural life, payable semi-annually.

Mr. SPALDING, I offer the same amendment to this bill that I did to the last. I move to strike out "two hundred dollars" and insert in lieu thereof "five hundred dollars."

Mr. DELANO. I desire to know if this amendment comes from any committee?

The SPEAKER. The original bill grants this man a pension of $200. The gentleman from Ohio proposes to amend it so as to give him $500.

Mr. DELANO. For what reason?

Mr. DRIGGS. He is one hundred and seven years old, and he is now supported by public charity.

Mr. PRICE. He is one of the only two survivors of the soldiers of the revolutionary war so far as I know.

Mr. DELANO. Then I make no objection to the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to make an inquiry as to the history of this man. Why has he not been placed upon the pension-rolls already?

Mr. PRICE. This man's name is, as appears from the bill, Frederick Daniel Bakeman. He is evidently a German, and his name is Bochman, but it appears upon the rolls of the War Department as Bakeman. I am informed on very good authority that application was made for a pension in the name of Bochman, but the name appeared as Bakeman on the rolls of the War Department, and the case was held over, and has been since neglected. It was merely a difference in spelling; his name was Bochman, but spelled in English they made it Bakeman.

Mr. DAWES. Were the committee satisfied that he actually served in the revolutionary war?

Mr. PRICE. We are satisfied of that fact by the testimony of several persons. This old gentleman is now one hundred and seven years of age and is supported by public charity.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is the only reason why the Department did not give this man his pension that he spelled his name "Bochman," and not "Bakeman"?

Mr. PRICE. That is the only reason, according to the testimony before the committee.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. There must have been some very stupid man in the office.

Mr. DAWES. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] where this person served. I desire the information as an interesting historical fact.

Mr. DELANO. And I would also ask what is the evidence of identity?

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VAN AERNAM] is personally acquainted with the applicant. He served at Fort Stanley, and is, I am informed, one of the Mohawk Dutch.

Mr. DAWES. If he actually served I do not care what his name was.

Mr. PRICE. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and main question ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. SPALDING, to increase the annual pension from $200 to $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD GRANT.

Mr. MAYNARD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to revive and continue in force the provisions of an act granting public lands in alternate sections in the State of Mississippi to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, and for other purposes, approved August 11, 1856; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

MEMORIALS, ETC., FROM KANSAS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following memorials, &c., from the State of Kansas:

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, asking for aid to the Union Pacific railway, southern branch; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of a bill extending the benefit of the homestead law to settlers on the land recently purchased from the Osage Indians; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

A joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, praying the passage of Senate bill No. 489, giving the right of preemption to settlers on the Cherokee neutral lands in Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Governor of West Virginia, transmitting a copy of a joint resolution adopted by the State Legislature ratifying the amendment proposing a fourteenth article to the Constitution of the United States; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

CAPITOL BUILDING FOR DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Dakota, asking an appropriation to erect a capitol building at the seat of government in Dakota Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PENSION LAWS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a copy of resolutions adopted by the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union, of Washington City, relative to the pension laws; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DELANO. I move that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House upon the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House, (Mr. FARNSWORTH in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of bills and joint resolutions on the Private Calendar as on "objection day."

The CHAIRMAN. There are two bills upon the Private Calendar which were not reached when the House was last in Committee of the Whole on objection day, and which are subject to the objection of one member only. The Clerk will now report those bills.

JAMES HOOPER.

A bill (H. R. No. 967) for the relief of James Hooper, of Baltimore, Maryland.

The bill was read at length. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to James Hooper, of Baltimore, Maryland, the sum of $16,000, to reimburse him for the destruction and loss at sea of the bark General Berry, while in the military service of the Government, on the 9th of July, 1864.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

E. J. CURLEY.

Senate bill No. 443, for the relief of E. J. Curley.

The bill was read at length. It requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay E. J. Curley the sum of $34,248 52, as compensation in full for corn purchased of him by Captain E. B. W. Reslieaux, assistant quartermaster on the part of the Government.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no report.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I object to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The remaining bills on the Calendar, having been once objected to, will be laid aside, to be reported to the House, unless five members object.

JOHN R. BECKLEY.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 174) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and pay the claim of John R. Beckley.

The joint resolution, which was read, recites in the preamble that divers horses, the property of John R. Beckley, mail contractor on mail routes No. 9634 and No. 9619, in the State of Kentucky, were during the late war captured by the rebel forces and guerrillas, and lost to him while endeavoring to carry out his contract with the United States.

The resolution directs the Secretary of the Treasury to have the claim of Beckley audited, and to pay him the amount which shall be found due for the loss of property in carrying the mail. The amount, however, is not to exceed $5,950, and it must appear that the property was lost without any fault or negligence on the part of Beckley.

The joint resolution was laid aside to be reported to the House.

ALEXANDER F. PRATT.

An act (S. No. 435) for the relief of Alexander F. Pratt.

The bill, which was read, proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Alexander F. Pratt $530 in full for pursuing and capturing one Elijah K. Jauner, convicted of counterfeiting United States coin.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

JOSIAH O. ARMES.

An act (S. No. 16) for the relief of Josiah O. Armes. [Objected to.]

SUFFERERS BY PORTLAND FIRE.

An act (S. No. 428) for the relief of the sufferers by the late fire in Portland. [Objected to.]

JOHN T. JONES.

An act (S. No. 122) for the relief of John T. Jones, an Ottawa Indian, for depredations committed by white persons upon his property in Kansas Territory. [Objected to.]

DONAHUE, RYAN AND SECOR.

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 141) for the relief of Donahue, Ryan & Secor, builders of the iron-clad monitor Camanche. [Objected to.]

HENRY S. DAVIS.

An act (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of Henry S. Davis.

The bill, which was read, appropriates $5,720 04 for the relief of Henry S. Davis, which is to be in full of his claim against the United States for work done by him on the west wing of the Patent Office building under his contract of November 6, 1857.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

BALMER AND WEBER.

An act (H. R. No. 821) for the relief of Balmer & Weber, of St. Louis, Missouri. [Objected to.]

GEORGE W. LANE.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of George W. Lane, superintendent of the branch mint at Denver, Colorado, and Assistant Treasurer of the United States.

The joint resolution, which was read, proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to allow to Lane, in the settlement of his accounts, a credit of $4,419 90, the amount of public money which was stolen from the mint without fault or neglect on his part and which has not been recovered.

The joint resolution was laid aside to be reported to the House.

GOLDSMITH BROTHERS.

An act (S. No. 192) for the relief of Goldsmith Brothers, of the city of San Francisco, California, and Portland, Oregon, brokers. [Objected to.]

MRS. ABBY GREEN.

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 112) for the relief of Mrs. Abby Green.

The joint resolution was read. The preamble recites that from the evidence of General H. C. Hobert, Colonel A. D. Streight, and Captain John F. Porter, jr., late of the United States Army, it appears that Mrs. Abby Green, then of Richmond, Virginia, by her courage, patriotic devotion, and assistance, from May, 1863, to February, 1864, enabling one hundred and nine officers and soldiers of the United States to make their escape from Libby prison, in Richmond, Virginia, and from the hands of the nation's enemies, has deserved well of the country.

The resolution appropriates $1,500 to Mrs. Green, her heirs or administrator, in compensation for her services.

The joint resolution was laid aside to be reported to the House.

AMBROSE MORRISON.

An act (H. R. No. 666) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase certain property for military purposes.

The bill was read. The preamble recites that the Government of the United States, on the 4th day of May, 1863, took possession of the dwelling-house and lot of Ambrose Morrison, of Nashville, Tennessee, and entirely demolished it and constructed a fort upon the lot, which has been occupied by the military forces of the United States up to the present time, the materials of which the dwelling-house was constructed being used partly in constructing the fort, partly in other public works, and a portion sold for the benefit of the Government; that Morrison is and always has been a loyal citizen of the United States, and a military commission, appointed by Special Order No. 103, of General J. D. Morgan, dated May 4, 1863, inquired as to and reported the value of the property at the sum of $16,384 90.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to purchase the above-mentioned property of Morrison, if in his opinion it shall be proper so to do, at a price not exceeding $15,000. Before the money is paid Morrison is to convey the property to the United States, by a good and indefeasible title, in fee simple, free and clear of incumbrance.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

E. J. CURLEY.

An act (S. No. 443) for the relief of E. J. Curley. [Objected to.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 253) to incorporate the First Congregational Society of Washington.

The message further announced that the Senate had insisted on its amendment, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions; had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Messrs. LANE, TRUMBULL, and BUCKALEW as conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. DELANO moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FARNSWORTH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, according to order, had the Private Calendar generally under consideration, and had directed him to report the following bills and joint resolutions to the House, with the recommendation that they do pass:

A bill (H. R. No. 267) for the relief of James Hooper, of Baltimore, Maryland;

An act (S. No. 435) for the relief of Alexander F. Pratt;

A bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of Henry S. Davis;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 211) for the relief of George W. Lane, superintendent of the branch mint at Denver, Colorado, and Assistant Treasurer of the United States;

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 112) for the relief of Mrs. Abby Green; and

A bill (H. R. No. 666) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase certain property for military purposes.

JAMES HOOPER.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was House bill No. 267, for the relief of James Hooper, of Baltimore, Maryland.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. DELANO demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALEXANDER F. PRATT.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was Senate bill No. 435, for the relief of Alexander F. Pratt.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. COBB. I should like, before this bill is passed, to have some explanation of it. It is a Wisconsin claim, I know, but I do not think it should pass.

Mr. DELANO. This bill has never been before the Committee of Claims, and I have no knowledge in regard to it.

Mr. PAINE. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, I will undertake to give my colleague some information on the subject. I am acquainted with the claimant in this case, and I have no higher opinion of his political character than my colleague, but nevertheless, having looked into the claim, I am satisfied it is a just one and ought to be paid.

At the time it occurred Mr. Pratt was sheriff of Waubeshaw county, in the State of Wisconsin. A prisoner was sent to the jail of that county by order of the district court judge, but he subsequently succeeded in making his escape from the jail. His escape arose from no fault on the part of the sheriff, because the jail was an insecure one. The expenses necessarily incurred in the capture of the prisoner were not allowed by the judge of the district court, because, he said, it was the duty of the State of Wisconsin to furnish him with a secure jail. The State of Wisconsin, on the other hand, said it was a jail good enough for the State of Wisconsin, and as he had selected it as the jail to which this prisoner should be sent he had no reason to complain. It was optional for the judge to send his prisoners to that jail or to some other jail, and if he selected that jail he ought to be satisfied with it. The State, therefore, refused to pay this demand, not because it was not a just demand so far as this claimant was concerned, but because the State thought the United States should pay the expenses of recapturing the prisoner. Hence it was that Mr. Pratt was compelled to come here with his claim. I think it a just demand against the Federal Government, and think the bill ought to pass.

Mr. COBB. I desire to say in reply to my colleague I urged no objection to this claim on account of the politics of the claimant. My request merely was that some information be furnished to the House to show why the claim should be paid. I did not object on the ground of politics, although I knew Mr. Pratt's politics were of the worst kind. While I differ with him politically, yet my personal relations are such that I would not object to any just claim he might bring before Congress.

I do not say anything, therefore, about his politics, but I by no means regard this as a just claim against the Government. I do not know of any reason why I should support an unjust claim from my own State any more than from any other State. I am not one of those who believe that every claim which comes from my own State is thereby necessarily just. I do not desire, and I am sure I will not follow the example set here by many gentlemen of objecting to claims coming from another State and voting uniformly for every one that is presented by citizens of one's own State. Nevertheless I am very loth to oppose a just claim coming either from another part of the country or from the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] yield to me?

Mr. DELANO. Certainly.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. COBB. I am not through. I know I am somewhat slow, but it is because half a dozen gentlemen around me are telling me what to say, and I happen to differ with them as to the propriety of what is to be said. [Laughter.] I hope my friends will not take offense.

Now, I undertaket to say that the facts stated by my colleague, good lawyer as he is and able as he is, establish no claim whatever against this Government. He says that the district court of the United States, sitting in Milwaukee, committed a man to jail in Waubeshaw county, and that the prisoner broke jail, wherefore the sheriff took it for granted that that gave him a roving commission over that State, and perhaps over other portions of the country, to recapture the man at any expense. Now, I think it should be considered that the simple fact of his being the sheriff of that county imposed no such duty upon him, and that the Government has the right to adopt its own means and its own way for the recapture of prisoners. That the fact of his having broken jail gives the sheriff any jurisdiction in the matter I deny. At the suggestion of several gentlemen I will move, if it is in order, to refer this bill to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DELANO. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. COBB. I make that motion.

Mr. PAINE. If the gentleman from Ohio will allow me, I wish to state that until this bill came from the Senate I had no knowledge that such a claim was before Congress. I have examined it only since it came to this House from the Senate.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield.

Mr. DELANO. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The facts in regard to this bill I have no doubt are precisely as stated by my colleague, [Mr. PAINE.] I have some knowledge of this claim, which I obtained from the gentleman who preceded my colleague as the Representative from that district, and I have no doubt of the entire justice of the claim. I should be very sorry that any gentlemen should base their action in this case upon the political character of the party or the fact that he might differ from them in politics. This claim, if I am not very much mistaken, has passed this House at least twice before and failed for want of time to act upon it in the Senate during the last Congress. It has now passed the Senate and comes to the House. I have no special desire to advocate a claim I have not been called upon to advocate, but it seems to me it is entirely just that we should act upon it favorably and without regard to the fact that the gentleman may differ or agree with us in politics.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to inquire if this bill has been before any committee of this House?

The SPEAKER. It has not. It came from the Senate to the House during the closing days of the last session, and was referred to the Committee of the Whole, instead of going to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. When it went to the Committee of the Whole I raised no objection because I supposed it had passed to the Committee of Claims, and had great confidence in that committee. I think, as it has not been before a committee, the friends of the bill ought to consent that it go to the Committee of Claims, and with their sanction of it I presume there will be no objection to its passage. I will therefore support the motion to so refer it.

Mr. DELANO. I now yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. SLOAN. I should have no objection to having the motion now pending prevail; but from what I have heard of this claim I am satisfied it is a just one, and as the amount is small I think it had better be finally disposed of now rather than have a reference of it to the Committee of Claims. It has already occupied the attention of Congress to a much greater extent than the amount involved in it in my opinion justifies.

The facts of the case are simply these: the prisoner, under sentence of the United States court in the district of Wisconsin, was put in jail in Waubesa county by the sheriff. The prisoner escaped from the jail. The pursuit was a very long one and involved considerable expense. This bill is simply brought in for the purpose of reimbursing this Mr. Pratt for the expenses he incurred in making this pursuit, recapturing the prisoner, and bringing him back.

I believe with my colleague on the other side [Mr. SLOAN] that the character, either moral or political, of the claimant ought not to be considered in the consideration of his claim. When a man arrests a prisoner who has been sentenced by a United States court and has escaped he surely presents a proper ground for being reimbursed by the Government for the expense he incurred in the capture. And, as my colleague has stated, the ground on which the allowance was rejected by the district judge was technical, and I think untenable.

Mr. DELANO. I now demand the previous question.

Mr. COBB. I ask the gentleman to allow me two minutes.

Mr. DELANO. I will do so.

Mr. COBB. My colleagues on both sides seem to insist upon it that I have attacked this claimant on account of his politics. Sir, I said nothing about his politics. I disclaim having said anything against the politics of this man; and I desire to say that while I could say many things about him and not be outside of the truth, I object to that line of argument which has been suggested by my colleague. I have never known a scheme to be passed through Congress, or any other legislative body without somebody saying that improper influences were brought to bear. This bill has not been examined by any committee of this House.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was referred to the Committee of Claims.

L. L. MERRY.

On motion of Mr. CONKLING, by unanimous consent, the Committee of Ways and Means was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of L. L. Merry, for relief from payment for stamps burglariously taken; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

REPORT ON INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and under the law referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved. That there be printed six thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; two thousand for the use of the House and four thousand for the use of the office of internal revenue.

HENRY S. DAVIS.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill of the House No. 820, for the relief of Henry S. Davis.

Mr. DELANO. I wish to say to the House that this claim has never undergone an examination by any committee of this House.

The SPEAKER. The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say that this claim has been three times examined by the Committee on Appropriations when it was referred to them; but it has always failed between the House and the Senate for some reason or other.

Mr. DELANO. I did not intend to interpose any objection to the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill was reported by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. RICE] from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw my motion.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE W. LANE.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole House was joint resolution of the House No. 211, for the relief of George W. Lane, superintendent of the branch mint at Denver, Colorado, and Assistant Treasurer of the United States.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter action was agreed to.

AMBROSE MORRISON.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole was House bill No. 666, authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase property for military purposes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. ABBY GREEN.

The last business reported from the Committee of the Whole was Senate joint resolution No. 112, for the relief of Mrs. Abby Green.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DELANO moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. NIBLACK asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. KERR, for the remainder of this week.

Mr. BERGEN asked and obtained leave of absence for himself for a week.

SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. DELANO. I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of business upon the Speaker's table of a private character.

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON COUNTY HORSE RAILROAD.

The first private business upon the Speaker's table were Senate amendments to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. R. No. 380) to incorporate the Washington County Horse Railroad Company in the District of Columbia.

The amendments of the Senate were merely verbal, except the one to add to fourth amendment of the House the following:

And Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY.

The next business was the amendment of the House to Senate bill No. 253, incorporating the First Congregational Society of the city of Washington, to which the Senate disagreed.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that the House insist upon its amendment, and ask a committee of conference.

Mr. WENTWORTH. What is the issue between the two Houses in regard to this bill?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The Committee for the District of Columbia of this House reported a substitute for the Senate bill, which the House adopted, but to which the Senate disagreed.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Well, what is the question at issue between the two Houses? Is it a matter of church discipline? [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is not. The House substitute proposes some persons among the incorporators different from those which the Senate bill proposed. The Senate disagrees to our substitute, and I ask the House to insist upon it, and ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Is it all for the same society and the same church?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is.

Mr. WENTWORTH. And the same preacher?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is.

Mr. WENTWORTH. "One faith and one baptism?"

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman is getting into almost too deep water for me. [Laughter.]

Mr. WENTWORTH. The two Houses have disagreed about something. The chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia tells us that both the bill and the substitute are for the same church, the same society, the same everything. Then, I ask, what is it that the two Houses are differing about? Let that difference be pointed out; if it is merely a difference in men that is one thing. I want to know why the time of the two Houses should be taken up by a disagreement when they are both in favor of the same thing? I would ask the gentleman if there are not other differences than those in regard to men?

Mr. INGERSOLL. None whatever.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Is the treasurer in both cases the same?

Mr. INGERSOLL. The bill does not provide for or name a treasurer; that is left to the corporators.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I understand that the Senate placed the name of General Howard in the bill as one of the trustees, and the House struck out the name of General Howard and others and put in a new list.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that a motion to recede from the House amendment will take priority of a motion to insist; as a motion to bring the two Houses together takes precedence of one to continue a disagreement between the two Houses.

Mr. DELANO. I move that the House recede from its amendment to the bill of the Senate; that will leave the name of General Howard in the bill.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes sixty-six; noes not counted. So the House receded from its amendment.

MRS. ELIZABETH R. SMITH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 451) for the relief of Mrs. Elizabeth R. Smith; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

HEIRS OF JOHN E. BOULIGNY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 438) for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

MRS. MARY E. FINNEY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 511) for the relief of Mrs. Mary E. Finney, widow of First Lieutenant Solon H. Finney, late of the sixth regiment Michigan cavalry; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. PRICE. I hope this bill will be put on its passage now.

Mr. ARCONA. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill, which was read, provides for paying to Mrs. Finney the three months' extra pay proper which her husband would have been entitled to receive had he been mustered out of service after April 9, 1865, he having died of wounds received in battle on that day.

Mr. SCHENCK. This case has been brought to my attention, and although it has not been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs I have no doubt that committee would report upon it favorably. I trust the bill will be passed.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

An act (H. R. No. 755) amendatory of an act to amend an act entitled "An act relating to habeas corpus, and regulating judicial proceedings in certain cases," approved May 11, 1866; and joint resolution (S. R. No. 156) to provide for the removal of the wreck of the steamship Scotland.

MRS. MARY J. DIXON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 508) for the relief of Mrs. Mary J. Dixon, of Alexandria, in the State of Virginia, widow of the late Turner Dixon, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

ORDER OF BUSINESS TO-MORROW.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Speaker, I understand there are several gentlemen who desire to speak upon some of the questions pending before the House. I suppose it is not the intention of the House to cut off all general debate on these questions. It has been suggested to me that to-morrow ought to be set apart for debate alone. I therefore ask that, by unanimous consent, we may have an understanding that to-morrow shall be appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I must object. There are only forty days—practically only about thirty—remaining of the session. I am very anxious that gentlemen desiring to deliver speeches shall have an opportunity to do so, and I will vote for the holding of night sessions for that purpose; but I cannot consent that another day shall be spent in speech-making alone.

Mr. NIBLACK. I beg leave to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] whether he designs to press his bill to a vote before next week?

Mr. STEVENS. I could not think it fair to deprive gentlemen who have held the floor for several days of the opportunity of speaking; and as the discussion, if resumed to-day, would extend beyond four o'clock, I shall not ask a vote to-day.

Mr. NIBLACK. Does the gentleman ask for a vote to-day?

Mr. STEVENS. Not to-day.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will he ask for a vote to-morrow?

Mr. STEVENS. I intend to ask the House in some way to dispose of this matter to-morrow.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will move that the House take a recess at half past four o'clock to meet at half past seven o'clock this evening for debate only.

Mr. DELANO. I will yield for that motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know of any gentleman who desires to speak at the evening session. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] who has the floor wishes to submit his remarks in the day session.

Mr. NIBLACK. I was requested to ask it on the part of gentlemen who desire to speak on the various questions before the House.

The SPEAKER. There are several gentlemen who desire to speak on other questions than the one now immediately pending before the House, but the Chair is not aware that they want to make their remarks in the evening session.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. As it appears no one wants to speak this evening I will withdraw my motion for a recess.

Mr. COBB. If we are to have an evening session I want the gentleman from Ohio to preside as Speaker pro tempore. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That would be perfectly satisfactory to the Chair.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I will agree to that if the gentleman will consent to make an hour's speech. [Laughter.]

CLAIMS OF THE STATE OF IOWA.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House what steps have been taken to carry into effect the act of Congress, approved July 25, 1866, entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a commissioner to examine and report on certain claims of the State of Iowa, including the name of the commissioner, when appointed, and the report, if any, which he has made under said act."

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill increasing the pensions of widows and orphans, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE REPORT.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution that ten thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office be printed for the use of the House; which under the law was referred to the Committee on Printing.

SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. GRISWOLD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to expedite the construction of the Southern Pacific railroad; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. CONKLING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I voted for that at the last session on condition that the road should not ask for money.

The motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

JOSIAH O. ARMES.

Mr. DELANO. I ask that by unanimous consent the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 16) for the relief of Josiah O. Armes; and that the same be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WINDOM. I object. I should be very glad, however, to have the bill taken up now and acted on, either passed or rejected.

Mr. DELANO. I will agree to that.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it will be taken up by the House to be disposed of finally at the present time.

There was no objection.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Josiah O. Armes $9,500 in full for damages sustained by him in consequence of the burning of his building and the destruction of his property at Anandale, Fairfax county, Virginia, by United States troops.

Mr. DELANO. Read the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM], who has charge of the bill proposes to explain it.

Mr. SPALDING. Why, more than five members objected to that bill.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole was discharged from its further consideration by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPALDING. I give notice I shall move that it be laid upon the table.

Mr. DELANO. I simply desire to have such an understanding of my rights in this case as to know whether I may make a brief explanation to the House or not?

The SPEAKER. As the gentleman from Ohio made the first suggestion he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman may proceed now, and I will take the floor afterward. I do not want more than five or ten minutes.

Mr. DELANO. Then I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WINDOM. This case is too well known here to require any extended remarks from me. I am well aware of the objections in the mind of the gentleman from Ohio. I am also aware of the resolution that was passed by this body to govern the Committee of Claims with reference to cases similar to this, and I know the fear on the part of the chairman of that committee that if this bill be passed it will open up so vast a number of this class of claims that the Government will be unable to pay them. I think this claim, however, may be distinguished from those which will be presented hereafter. I think it may with propriety be to-day made an exception. But whatever may be the rule of the House hereafter in regard to claims of this character it seems to me the peculiar circumstances of this claim call upon this House to act upon it favorably at once.

This bill has passed the House of Representatives twice already; once in the Thirty-Seventh and once in the Thirty-Eighth Congress. It also passed the Senate in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and would have become a law, having passed both branches, but from a mere accident on the part of a clerk of the Senate. And in order to substantiate what I say I will read a few lines indorsed on the former bill by the Clerk of the Senate.

"OFFICE OF THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, March 10, 1865."

"I hereby certify that the above bill passed the two Houses of Congress as above stated; but through mistake in the hurry of the last moments of the session, the Clerk, whose business it was, inadvertently took the engrossed copy of joint resolution (H. R. No. 161) to the House of Representatives instead of the bill, (H. R. No. 161,) which alone caused the failure of this bill being passed through all the formalities necessary to its becoming a law."

Simply a mistake on the part of the Clerk. It has now passed the Senate a second time. It has on two occasions received the sanction of this House. I believe it passed the Senate twice at the last session, for a message was sent to the House requesting it to be returned, and on being returned it was reexamined there and passed again, making three times there. That, I think, makes this bill an exception, and I cannot believe there is any danger to the country if this House shall choose to do justice to this most worthy claimant, who has rendered service to the Government amounting to a dozen times the value of his claim; who at the peril of his life has rendered it; whose house has been burned down almost within sight of the Capitol—not many miles from where we are now sitting—being destroyed by the order of our own generals. It does seem to me, when both Houses have thus approved of this claim, giving a little more than half the amount proved to be due, this House should act upon it at once and grant the relief.

I will, with the permission of the House, send to the Clerk to be read the report of the Senate committee, which states the case more briefly than I can. I will say, however, that the House committee in the Thirty-Seventh Congress made a report of which this is almost an exact copy. I happen to know something about the action of the Committee of Claims at that time for I made the report myself. There has been no report upon the claim in this Congress. It was not referred to the Committee of Claims because the House having adopted a rule to govern that committee it was known that it would be applied to this case no matter how just the claim might be. I ask the Clerk to read the Senate report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"At the breaking out of the present rebellion, Josiah O. Armes, the claimant, was the owner and in possession of a valuable house and out-buildings at Anandale, Fairfax county, Virginia. The house was a valuable one, and all the testimony in the case tends to show it to have been worth twelve or fourteen thousand dollars. It was built of stone, three stories high, with a cupola on top, fourteen feet high, with windows for lighting the stairway beneath. The house was octagonal in form, and about two hundred feet in circumference. There were two verandas extending around it, well latticed and supported by two tiers of columns. The roof of the house was covered with tin, and the cornice was large and heavy. The house contained thirty rooms, some of which were large, including seven parlors. The building of the house was commenced in 1855 and completed in 1860, and was intended for a female seminary. There were in the house twenty-eight windows, and the rooms were well ventilated. The walls were fourteen inches in thickness, and there were four firmly-built brick chimneys. The foundation was good, and the wood-work painted outside and in.

"The master-builder of the house testifies that from his knowledge at the time it cost the said Armes $10,000. There were attached to it a servant's house, a granary, barracks, sheds, and carriage-house.

"The last of November, or the 1st of December, 1861, this house and buildings were destroyed by order of Colonel R. J. Belge, of the sixty-eighth regiment New York volunteers.

"Mr. Armes had been driven out from the house before its destruction; and the country about it seems to have been a sort of debatable or skirmish ground—sometimes held by Union troops, and sometimes by the rebels. Mr. Armes was, and is, a thoroughly loyal citizen. In the commencement of the war he was of service to our troops in giving information of the movement and situation of the rebels; and General Heintzelman, in a letter submitted to the committee, acknowledges the valuable aid he afforded.

"At or about the time the property was destroyed by order of Colonel Belge, the buildings seems to have been used by the rebel troops both as an observatory of the movements of the Union troops and as a stronghold from which they fired upon our men as occasion offered. To prevent its being longer so used Colonel Belge ordered it, as a military necessity, to be destroyed. General Heintzelman, in a letter dated January 18, 1861, says he heard of the matter at the time that the buildings were burned by our troops, and it was a military necessity. He also adds, that 'the mother' [meaning Mrs. Armes, the wife of the claimant, and mother of a young man then in our Army] 'came in one dark night last summer to give us information at the risk of her life.'

"The committee have not been able to obtain the evidence of Colonel Belge, who ordered the property to be destroyed, for the reason that he has left the service, and his place of residence has not been ascertained. There is, however, the testimony of several persons, officers in and members of his regiment, who say that they heard Colonel Belge give the order for the destruction of the property at the time it was burned.

"The House of Representatives have reported a bill for the relief Mr. Armes, to the amount of $9,500; and the committee are satisfied that the property was of that value and more; that it was destroyed by the Union troops as a military necessity, under order of their commander; they therefore recommend the passage of the House bill.

"Mr. Armes is an aged man; he is utterly impoverished by the destruction of this property; he is patriotic, having had a son in the Union Army, and having exerted himself to aid the Union cause in various ways. His family were driven from their home, and the wife, who risked her life to bring information to our troops in the darkness of the night, is since dead. The case appeals strongly to our sympathies, but equally and more so to our sense of justice."

Mr. WINDOM. That is how I understand the bill. I do not desire to discuss it further, and I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. DELANO. I simply want the House to understand the facts of this case, and then they will do what they deem best. The House will remember that at the commencement of the last session of Congress it adopted a resolution that, until otherwise ordered, the Committee of Claims be instructed to reject all claims referred to them of citizens of States lately in rebellion. That resolution is on record, and it is needless to read it. Every member of the House who will recur to what was then said will recollect that it was deemed advisable for the safety of the nation to refuse to entertain claims for damages from the rebel States growing out of the destruction of property under the necessities of war, or for property actually taken and appropriated by the Army for its support. Acting upon this principle, the Committee of Claims have steadily refused to allow any claim for damages from the loyal States, whose claims resulted from a state of war; in other words, we have refused to allow everything denominated damages from the war coming from the loyal States; because we deemed that it would be beyond the financial capacity of the nation to undertake to pay for all the damages to property that had been committed under the exigencies and ravages of war.

Upon examination of the authorities we were satisfied that national law did not require the nation to pay for this class of damages. The resolution, however, went further and provided that where the claim was for a citizen of the rebel States, although it might be for property taken and appropriated for the use of the Army, it should not be paid for, for various reasons which it is needless to discuss now. There is a reason manifest to everybody, and that is that it would be impossible to determine with any accuracy who was and who was not loyal, and we were admonished, as I can now admonish the House, that to open that door would be to place the nation upon the very verge and border of a gulf in the way of expense that may destroy it altogether.

Now, sir, this claim of Mr. Armes is for property destroyed under the necessities of war, under the inevitable ravages of war; and, sir, according to the whole action of the House during this Congress, this man's claim could not be allowed if he resided in Pennsylvania, New York, or Ohio. The case is clearly one in which the property was destroyed as one of the necessities of war. That is not all. It is just, patently and openly, one of those cases from the rebellious States that needs no argument. It would be an insult to the House for me to attempt to argue it. I ask, can it be distinguished? It is said that this bill has once passed both branches of Congress and only failed to become a law through some technical mistake of a clerk. What of that, I ask the intelligence of this House? What if it did pass? Is it any more meritorious because it failed to pass by accident? Perhaps it was fortunate that it did so fail; but it did not become a law; it got very near to the door of the Presidential Mansion, where the last action was necessary to make it a law, but it did not receive the presidential sanction.

Mr. BLAINE. If this claimant had the sanction of both branches of Congress, would you, because of a blunder, and I should say a culpable blunder, on the part of a clerk, deprive the claimant of that which Congress had, so far as its action could go, granted to him?

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask the member from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] if he expects those of us who voted against this bill in the former Congress to vote for it now?

Mr. BLAINE. They must determine that for themselves.

Mr. SPALDING. Certainly; we must be allowed to judge of that.

Mr. BLAINE. I am only saying what I shall do.

Mr. DELANO. I do not stand here, either as a member of this House or of the Committee of Claims, to vote for or against any claim because of the peculiarities or circumstances which surround it. This House has adopted a rule, which is or should be a law to its members, which declares that a claim situated as this is shall not be paid.

Mr. BLAINE. Was not that rule passed long after this claim had passed both Houses, and failed to become a law by reason of an accident merely?

Mr. DELANO. Agreed; at a former Congress this claim came very near being passed into a law, but it did not quite become a law; and now because it once came so near being a law members say that it should be made an exception to this rule. If there is any logic in that reasoning I have not brains enough to comprehend it. The claim was defeated then, no matter under what circumstances or by what means, it simply failed. Having failed, it stands now on the same footing with all other claims. It received no white-washing, it got no infusion of merit, no element of justice or equity by the fact of coming so near to being a law, that was not in it intrinsically and by its own nature without the existence of that fact. That fact gives it no power, no merit, no equity, no anything.

Now, I understand very well that this claim appeals to the sympathies of gentlemen who have been approached by the claimant, Mr. Armes. But He who knows my heart knows that if, without establishing a rule that would be injurious to the finances of the country, I could vote to give this man $9,000, I would do it. But I am not here to do acts of charity or of benevolence; nor is any other member of this House here for that purpose. Each member must settle these questions according to his own judgment and his own conscience. It is a question of our duty here as legislators, and not a question of humanity to this man. I know very well there is scarcely a member of this House who has not seen this man; and there is no member who has a heart who has not been touched by his condition and by his circumstances. I have felt them myself.

But I am not here to be actuated by any feeling of this kind. It is a simple, plain, straight-forward question, whether the rule we adopted as necessary to the finances of the nation shall stand or whether it shall be overturned and destroyed. I know how these cases are used as examples, and how the example is carried much further than it really ought to be; and I tell gentlemen that if this claim be passed the flood-gates will be hoisted and the rushing tide of claims will pour in and overwhelm you before you are well aware of the danger. See even now how these precedents are used. My open-hearted friend from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] can see now, in the very fact that this claim came very near being a law in a former Congress before the rule I have referred to was adopted, a reason why this claim should now override that which we solemnly prescribed as a law to ourselves. I mention this to demonstrate to this House the danger of setting precedents of this character.

I have said more to the House perhaps than I ought to have said. But I pray the House to enter upon this case with a consciousness of what it will lead to, and not allow themselves to be actuated by feelings of benevolence to establish a rule that will be so dangerous to the country.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. DELANO. Certainly.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. As a member of the Committee of Claims of the Thirty-Eighth Congress I examined this claim of Mr. Armes; I was satisfied of its merits and voted for it. The claim passed this House and went to the Senate, and, as I have been informed, it passed the Senate.

What are the facts in this case? The Government found this man on the other side of the Potomac and burned down his house. He has lost all his property, and the services that his wife rendered to this Government brought her life to a termination. He gave his only son to the Union Army, and has furnished us a record of his loyalty that cannot be disputed. He has not only been reduced to poverty, but physically he has become a mere wreck, and is now to-day but a scanty offering to the King of Terrors. By a strict construction of our resolution this claimant comes within our grasp; and we are told that if the American Congress shall do him the small measure of justice proposed in this bill the stability of the Government will be endangered. In other words, the implication is that unless we reject this meritorious application Congress will not have virtue enough to withstand the flood of claims that will rush in upon us. If we are justified in entertaining so little confidence in ourselves, then let this old man, or what little there is left of him, be sacrificed. I do not for my part believe that in order to perpetuate our Government it is necessary for us to immolate this worthy, loyal-hearted old man. By an appropriation of a few thousand dollars we can save him from spending the remainder of his days in wretchedness and misery; we can save him from becoming an object of public charity; we can keep him out of the asylum for paupers.

This bill does not propose to reimburse to this man a tithe of what he has lost. He has suffered loss, not only in property, but in the lives of members of his family. Why, Mr. Speaker, we ought not to hesitate a moment in voting this money. If we do not feel disposed to pay him for the destruction of his house, let us grant him something in consideration of the loss of his poor old wife. In such a case as this it is almost idle to plead with the House. If members do not recognize at once the justice of the claim it is useless for me to appeal to them. For myself I should feel a consciousness of guilt during the remainder of my life if I did not speak and vote in behalf of this worthy claimant. He is a patriot who has been injured by the act of the Government. That there was a necessity for the injuries inflicted upon him and his property I admit; but that necessity arose, not from any fault of his, but from the fault of Congress. The necessity would not have existed had Congress heretofore legislated wisely. If we legislate wisely now we shall prevent this apprehended flood of claims upon us by taking actual possession of these territories, improperly called "States," and making the property of the guilty indemnify the losses of the innocent. That is what we ought to do.

In my opinion members ought to be ashamed to be whining here over the expenditure of a few dollars for the payment of a just claim like this. This claim has really more merit than hundreds of the claims that we pass here every day. The objection made to this claim is that there is an element of charity in it. Why, sir, if we can do a little charity now and then, we should remember that "charity covers a multitude of sins;" and no member, I imagine, will assert that we have not our full share of errors and sins that need atonement.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether it is not a universally acknowledged principle of the common law, and the common law is nothing but a mantle of charity, that property destroyed by an army in the work of putting down a rebellion stands on the ground of inevitable accident, and the owner has no claim upon the Government, either in law or in equity, for remuneration.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I never heard of any such principle of law. I deny the existence of any such principle.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DELANO. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I am astonished at the question just asked by the learned gentleman from Connecticut. I had supposed there was nothing better understood than that when the army of a country, by reason of military necessity, destroys the property of a loyal citizen of the country, the Government always pays for it among the very first claims that are paid. The Government in such a case is liable under the law of nations; and it ought to be ashamed if under any pretext it refuses remuneration. Here was a house owned by a loyal man—a building used as an academy or literary institution; the rebels took shelter behind it, and in order to get at them it was necessary to batter it down. This was done as a military necessity by the order of one of our commanders. Will any man who has ever read Montesquieu or Vattel tell me that our Government is not liable for every dollar's worth of property destroyed under such circumstances?

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. If the gentleman will permit me I want to make a single suggestion. Suppose that while the Union forces were before the city of Charleston, throwing shells into that city, the house of a Union man was set on fire and destroyed, will the gentleman say that by the law of nations or the law of equity the Government is bound to indemnify that loyal citizen for the destruction of his property under those circumstances?

I place such cases upon the ground of inevitable accident; and I am sustained by the law as reported in every book. I am sure I will be justified by every gentleman who has read the common law or the law of nations. I know I am right on this subject. Let the gentleman from Pennsylvania cite his case so we may know what it is.

Mr. STEVENS. There is no inevitable accident about it. This was a deliberate order to destroy the property of Mr. Armes, growing out of military necessity. I am quite sure no one learned in the law will for a moment deny our Government is liable for the property. For instance, the Government burned a bridge across the Susquehanna river in order to prevent the rebel army from crossing; will any man tell me this Government is not liable for it? It has once already been reported here. To be sure the gentleman from Ohio has not reported it.

Let me say another thing. The resolution introduced here and adopted the gentleman, I think, called a law. I do not call that a law—a resolution of this House reported by that committee. Why, sir, it is no more binding than any other resolution. It was got up after this bill was once reported and passed upon favorably. It is a resolution, in my judgment, the most iniquitous that ever an honest Government adopted to say we shall not pay for property belonging to our own people destroyed for the use of the Government by its own officers.

Mr. DELANO. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. DELANO. Do I understand the gentleman to say these inhabitants of the rebel States are in that category? I thought he regarded that country as conquered territory and the inhabitants of it as aliens.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman had listened to about one twentieth part of what I have said in the world he would have learned—

Mr. DELANO. That would have been a good deal.

Mr. STEVENS. He would have learned that long ago, while I considered and do consider, as I think every lawyer does, that the territory belonging to the rebel States is conquered territory, as territory conquered by us, still that the loyal men in those States stand upon an entirely different footing in a civil war from the inhabitants of a foreign nation which has been conquered, as I can show in many instances.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Let me say a word.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, no; the gentleman has talked more now than I have. [Laughter.]

I have only to say, Mr. Speaker, we are not passing upon an original question. I say that Mr. Armes is entitled under the law to this money. Both branches of the Government passed it and ordered it to be sent to the President for his signature; but one of our agents took another bill and it was returned signed when no one wanted it done. If we were private individuals Mr. Armes could sue that agent and recover every dollar.

I put it upon the ground we are perfecting what we did before, declaring by joint resolution what both branches of the Government gave him before, and what ought to have been law, and would have been but for our own negligence. There is no law and certainly no equity in our depriving Mr. Armes of his property.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. DELANO. I yield first to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. WHALEY. For how long?

Mr. DELANO. Ten minutes.

Mr. WHALEY. Mr. Speaker, it cannot be expected that in ten minutes I shall be able fully to discuss this most important question, and one in which of course my constituents feel a profound interest. I indorse to the fullest extent the able and eloquent arguments made by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] and by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS.] They have spoken with authority as to the law and the obligations of the Government under the common law and the law of nations, and I do not think what they have said can be successfully controverted.

But we have the resolution of the Committee of Claims constantly thrust forward as an impassable barrier to the just claims of loyal citizens for their property taken by the United States. The House cannot forget how that resolution was brought forward and passed. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] reported it and then forced it through under the gag of the previous question. It was never debated, never considered, and cannot fairly be taken as the judgment of this House. It has been well designated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania as an iniquitous measure. For why, sir, should all manner of claims growing out of the war be taken up and acted upon arising in the northern States, while consideration of any sort is absolutely denied to the just demands of the loyal people of my own section, who have so generally and severely suffered from disasters during the late war? Can this great Government sustain itself before the world in refusing to pay for property taken or destroyed by it from its loyal citizens who were at the time periling their lives in its defense? Give us a fair hearing; that is all we ask, and do not reject all claims because of some resolution heretofore passed on the spur of the moment.

The claim of this poor old man, Armes, has been twice passed upon favorably by Congress, and now the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] opposes it, though it is supported by some of the best talent on this floor. Let me say to the gentleman, who will leave this Hall with me in about thirty-five days, [laughter,] that I do not think he has been altogether kind. I have not the slightest reason personally or politically to disagree with him; but he has cut off all these cases since he has been made chairman of the committee. He has talked about law, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has met him ably on that. It is nothing but a resolution; it is not law. Let a claim come from Tennessee or anywhere south of Mason and Dixon's line, and it has no show here. I know what it costs those people to be loyal. When their claims are sent here they are reported against, and the other day it took two pages to carry up to the Speaker's table his adverse reports on these cases. [Laughter.]

Mr. DELANO. I call the previous question.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Will the gentleman allow me a word further?

Mr. DELANO. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, it is the furthest from my wish to interpose any objection to the payment of this claim to this old gentleman. Only put it on the ground of charity and I will not object to it at all. I will open my own hand in charity to any man that has suffered as much as he has at any time and at all times. What I object to is the precedent, the baleful precedent, that will be introduced into this Congress for the allowance of claims to the amount of more than five hundred million dollars before the conclusion of this session. I trust there is no well-read lawyer in this House who has so far forgotten the principle of law as not to understand that where property was destroyed by the Union army in endeavoring to save the life of the Republic it stands on the ground of unavoidable accident, the act of God, or of the king's enemy. That principle is spread over every common law that any lawyer in this House has ever read. There is no question about it at all.

Mr. DELANO. I yield a moment to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MORRILL. I know that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] never flinches from the logic of his position. My own idea is, that to undertake to carry out the principle which he has announced would involve the Government in an expenditure of at least $1,000,000,000. Now, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Claims what his estimate would be of the amount involved provided the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct in his position, which I do not think he is.

Mr. DELANO. I must say that it is impossible for me to approximate with any certainty to the amount that the Government would assume under the interpretation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but I think the Committee of Claims will agree with me that $1,000,000,000 would not cover it, and I have no idea that $2,000,000,000 would do it. Because the proposition, if I understand it, places the Government under the obligation of paying for all the destruction of property and for all the appropriation of property everywhere. Why, sir, there are millions in Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to say that he entirely misunderstood what I said. I spoke of property belonging to the United States destroyed by military necessity by order of the commander of our Army. Property which belonged to the enemy nobody ever thought of paying for, nor property destroyed by the enemy did anybody ever think of paying for. Why, sir, I venture to say that half of $500,000,000 would pay it all. But if it takes a little more, rather than deliberately cheat the people out of it I would steal the money to pay it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Speaker, how much more time have I?

The SPEAKER. Ten minutes.

Mr. DELANO. Then I will only ask the House, in conclusion as jurors, to bear in mind that what they do now is settling a principle. I have stated the case to the House. I know what the human heart is in a case like this, and I have endeavored so to present it to the House that it can decide intelligently.

I assure the House that I understand the gentleman correctly in reference to his rule for paying damages for the war, and I assure him, moreover, that that rule will not, in my opinion, be made available to involve the Government in a cost of less than $2,000,000,000.

Mr. KASSON. I will ask the gentleman a single question for information. A bill was reported to the House to-day, and was passed upon the gentleman's recommendation, appropriating money to pay for some property in Nashville, Tennessee, destroyed by the military. If there was any difference between that case and this I would be glad to know it.

Mr. DELANO. There was no such bill as that passed to-day; there was a bill passed which authorized the Secretary of War, if he deemed it necessary, to purchase the remains of certain property.

Mr. KASSON. I refer to a bill to pay for certain property destroyed by the United States troops.

Mr. DELANO. I know exactly what the gentleman refers to; and now I demand the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being upon its passage, Mr. ROLLINS demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 27, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Brandegee, Broomall, Campbell, Cobb, Cook, Cooper, Callom, Darling, Daves, DeLores, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Grinnell, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburt, Hunter, Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Koontz, Kuykendall, Lafin, Latham, Le Blond, Leftwich, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Myers, Niblack, Nicholson, Paine, Porham, Pike, Platts, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Starr, Stevens, Stokes, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—99.

NAYS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Bergen, Boutwell, Bromwell, Delano, Hale, Abner C. Harding, John H. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jenckes, Ketcham, George V. Lawrence, Loan, McKee, Morrill, Orth, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Sloan, Spalding, Nelson Taylor, Hamilton Ward, Wentworth, and James F. Wilson—27.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alloy, Allison, Ames, Arnell, Benjamin, Blow, Boyer, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Reuder W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Culver, Davis, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Dumont, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grossbreuner, Goodyear, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hise, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jones, Kerr, William Lawrence, Marston, Maynard, McClurg, McCullough, McIndoe, Morris, Moulton, Newell, Neill, O'Neill, Patterson, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rousseau, Schenck, Stilwell, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Williams, Windom, and Wright—65.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. WINDOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed six thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, two thousand for the use of the House, and four thousand for the use of the office of internal revenue.

The resolution was agreed to.

SURVEY OF THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. PRICE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the House a copy of the report and estimates of General Wilson in reference to the survey and improvement of the rapids of the Mississippi river, known as the Des Moines and Rock Island rapids.

And then, on motion of Mr. SPALDING, (at twenty minutes before five o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. ANCONA: The memorial of Captain John Kennedy, late of the one hundred and twenty-eighth and two hundred and thirteenth Pennsylvania volunteers, asking for an extension of the act authorizing the payment of three months' pay proper.

By Mr. BARKER: A petition from 30 citizens of Elensburg, Pennsylvania, praying that Congress will refrain from passing any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or having in view the return within a limited time to specie payments.

Also, a petition from 28 citizens of Altoona, Pennsylvania, praying that Congress will refrain from the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or having in view the return within a limited time to specie payments.

By Mr. BROOMALL: The petition of cigar manufacturers of Champaign county, Illinois, praying for a change in the law imposing tax on cigars.

Also, a petition from the citizens of Charleston, Illinois, praying Congress to pass no law reducing the volume of the currency, or compelling national banks to redeem their notes in New York.

By Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts: The petition of F. M. Holmes, and others, of Boston, Massachusetts, for reduction of tax on furniture.

By Mr. HOTCHKISS: The petition of citizens of Lansing, Tompkins county, New York, in favor of tariff on wool, &c.

Also, the petition of cigar manufacturers of Ithaca, New York, for a modification of tax, &c.

By Mr. JENCKES: The petition of the fire insurance companies of Providence, Rhode Island, for relief from the tax imposed by the seventy-seventh section of the internal revenue law.

By Mr. MARVIN: The petition of S. D. Williams, Sylvester West, D. F. Scott, and others, citizens of Saratoga county, New York, praying for the passage of the House tariff bill of the last session, now pending in the Senate.

By Mr. MERCUR: The petition of numerous citizens of Luzerne county, Pennsylvania, asking that a pension may be granted to Mary Hosea, widow of James Hosea.

By Mr. MILLER: The petition of 250 soldiers and widows of the war of 1812 with Great Britain, from different States, with their respective ages, praying for the passage of a law granting them a pension.

By Mr. PAINE: A memorial of ship-builders and owners of the State of Wisconsin, praying that Congress will not hereafter permit American registers to be granted to foreign vessels.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of William Dunham, for increase of pension.

By Mr. SCHENCK: Three petitions of the merchants, business firms, property-holders, and others, citizens of Washington, praying the removal of the railroad depot nuisance from around the Capitol and the opening of the streets and avenues communicating therewith.

Also, the memorial of Robert A. Constable, late an officer of the seventy-fifth Ohio volunteers, for relief.

Also, the memorial of tanners and manufacturers of leather, for a reduction or entire abrogation of the internal revenue tax on leather.

By Mr. STOKES: Papers in the case of John B. Cothran, of Smith county, Tennessee, applying for pension.

By Mr. TAYLOR, of New York: The petition of Captain Daniel McMahon, for pension from date of his discharge from the military service.

By Mr. UPSON: The petition of William Dougherty, and 53 others, and the petition of L. Collins, and 51 others, all citizens of Berrien county, Michigan, praying Congress to take necessary measures for the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

By Mr. VAN HORN, of New York: The petition of 47 citizens of the town of Alabama, Genesee county, New York, asking for the passage of the bill for increase of tariff on wool.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 26, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

On motion of Mr. LANE, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate, a letter of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, communicating, in obedience to law, copies of all accounts which have been received at that office from persons charged or entrusted with the disbursement of money, goods, or effects for the benefit of the Indians from July 1, 1865, to June 30, 1866, with a list of the names of all persons to whom such disbursements have been committed, the amount accounted for, and the balance of appropriation under each specific head remaining in their hands; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented a memorial of importers and dealers in China merchandise, remonstrating against the proposed prohibition of the importation of fire-crackers in the tariff bill now pending in the Senate; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

He also presented a memorial of merchants and citizens of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the provision in the House tariff bill imposing a duty of $1 50 per ton on coal mined in the British Provinces; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, now pending in the Senate; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. HENDERSON presented a petition of the North Missouri Railroad Company of Missouri, asking for a credit on the duties to be paid on the importation of certain iron rails to be used upon that road; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

CONDITION OF THE INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The special select committee of the two Houses of Congress, appointed under the joint resolution of March 3, 1865, directing an inquiry into the condition of the Indian tribes and their treatment by the civil and military authorities of the United States, have instructed me to submit the following report, with an appendix accompanying the same:

At its meeting on the 9th of March the following subdivision of labor was made: to Messrs. Doolittle, Foster, and Ross was assigned the duty of inquiring into Indian affairs in the State of Kansas, the Indian Territory, Colorado, New Mexico, and Utah.

To Messrs. Nesmith and Higby the same duty was assigned in the States of California, Oregon, and Nevada, and in the Territories of Washington, Idaho, and Montana.

To Messrs. Windom and Hubbard the same duty was assigned in the State of Minnesota, and in the Territories of Nebraska, Dakota, and Upper Montana. The result of their inquiries is to be found in the appendix accompanying this report.

The work was immense, covering a continent. While they have gathered a vast amount of testimony and important information bearing upon our Indian affairs they are still conscious that their explorations have been imperfect.

As it was found impossible for the members of the committee in person to take the testimony or from personal observations to learn all that they deemed necessary to form a correct judgment of the true condition of the Indian tribes, they deemed it wise, by a circular letter addressed to officers of the regular Army, experienced Indian agents and superintendents, and to other persons of great knowledge in Indian affairs, to obtain from them a statement of the result of their experience and information.

The committee have arrived at the following conclusions:

First. The Indians everywhere, with the exception of the tribes within the Indian Territory, are rapidly decreasing in numbers from various causes: by disease, by intemperance, by wars among themselves and with the whites, by the steady and resistless immigration of white men into the Territories of the West, which, confining the Indians to still narrower limits, destroys that game which in their normal state constitutes their principal means of subsistence, and by the irrepressible conflict between a superior and an inferior race when brought in presence of each other. Upon this subject all the testimony agrees.

In answer to the question, whether the Indians "are increasing or decreasing in numbers, and from what causes," Major General Pope says:

"They are rapidly decreasing in numbers from various causes: by disease, by wars, by cruel treatment on the part of the whites, both by irresponsible persons and by Government officials; by unwise policy of the Government, or by inhuman and dishonest administration of that policy; and by steady and resistless encroachments of the white immigration toward the West, which is every day confining the Indians to narrower limits, and driving off or killing the game, their only means of subsistence."

To the same question General John T. Sprague gives the following answer:

"The Indians are decreasing in numbers, caused by their proximity to the white man. So soon as Indians adopt the habits of white men they begin to decrease, aggravated by imbibing all their vices and none of their virtues. Other causes exist, too numerous to be detailed in this paper."

The following is the answer of General Carleton to the same question:

"As a general rule, the Indians alluded to are decreasing very rapidly in numbers in my opinion. The causes for this have been many, and may be summed up as follows:

"1. Wars with our pioneers and our armed forces; change of climate and country among those who have been moved from east of the Mississippi to the far West.

"2. Intemperance and the exposure consequent thereon.

"3. Venereal diseases, which they are unable, from lack of medicines and skill, to eradicate from their systems, and which, among Indians who live nearest the whites, is generally diffused by either scrofula or some other form of its taint.

"4. Small-pox, measles, and cholera—diseases unknown to them in the early days of the country.

"5. The causes which the Almighty originates, when in their appointed time He wills that one race of men—as in races of lower animals—shall disappear off the face of the earth and give place to another race, and so on, in the great cycle traced out by Himself, which may be seen but has reasons too deep to be fathomed by us. The races of the mammoths and mastodons, and the great sloths, came and passed away: the red man of America is passing away!"

General Wright gives his testimony to the same point, as follows:

"The Indian tribes are rapidly decreasing in numbers, especially west of the Rocky mountains, caused in some measure by the wars waged against them, and more particularly by the encroachments of the whites upon their hunting grounds and fisheries and other means of subsistence, and by the readiness with which they adopt the vices of the whites rather than their virtues; hence their numbers are rapidly diminished by disease and death."

These officers have had large experience in Indian affairs, and they are supported by the concurrent testimony of many other of the most experienced officers and civilians.

The tribes in the Indian Territory were most happily exempted from this constant tendency to decay up to the commencement of the late civil war. Until they became involved in that they were actually advancing in population, education, civilization, and agricultural wealth.

Their exceptional condition may be attributed to the fact that from their earliest history these tribes had to a considerable extent cultivated the soil and kept herds of cattle and horses; that they were located in a most fertile territory and withdrawn from the neighborhood and influence of white settlements, and to the legitimate influence of education and Christianity among them.

The war has made a terrible diminution of their number, and brought disease and demoralization in its train. A full account of the condition of the Cherokees will be found in the reply of Hon. J. Harlan, agent of the Cherokees. The recent treaties with the tribes in the Indian Territory, and the reports of their improved condition since the pacification, give strong hopes that their former prosperity will return.

The committee determined, if possible, to ascertain the real cause of the destruction of the tribes, and proposed to the officers above named, and to many others, the following most important inquiry bearing upon that subject, namely:

"What diseases are most common and most fatal among them; and from what causes?"

To this General Sprague answers:

"The children die rapidly and suddenly from dysentery and measles, and from neglect and exposure to the weather. The adults die from fevers, small-pox, drunkenness, and diseases engendered from sexual intercourse. These diseases are among the men and women in the most malignant form, as the Indian doctors are unable to manage them. Indulgence in liquor, exposure, and the absence of remedies aggravate the disease. In this, striking at the very basis of procreation, is to be found the active cause of the destruction of the Indian race."

General Pope's opinion that "venereal diseases, particularly secondary syphilis, is the most common and destructive. It is to be doubted whether one Indian, man or woman, in five is free from this disease or its effects."

Without quoting from others, it will be found by the united testimony of all that this disease, more than all other diseases, and perhaps more than all other causes, is the active agent of the destruction of the Indian race. Add to this intemperance, exposure, the want of sufficient food and clothing, wars among themselves and wars with the whites, and we are at no loss to account for the utter extinction of many of the most powerful tribes and the ultimate disappearance of nearly all upon this continent. It is a sad but faithful picture.

INDIAN WARS WITH THE WHITES.

The committee are of opinion that in a large majority of cases Indian wars are to be traced to the aggressions of lawless white men, always to be found upon the frontier or boundary line between savage and civilized life. Such is the statement of the most experienced officers of the Army and of all those who have been long conversant with Indian affairs.

Colonel Bent, who has lived upon the Upper Arkansas, near Bent's fort, for thirty-six years, states that in nearly every instance difficulties between Indians and the whites arose from aggressions on the Indians by the whites. The war with the Sioux, commencing in 1854, the war with the Arapahoes and Cheyennes in 1865, are traced by him directly to those aggressions.

Colonel Kit Carson, who has lived upon the plains and in the mountains since 1826, and has been all that time well acquainted with the Indian tribes in peace and in war, confirms this statement. He says, "As a general thing the difficulties arise from aggressions on the part of the whites." "The whites are always cursing the Indians, and are not willing to do them justice."

From whatever cause wars may be brought on, either between different Indian tribes or between the Indians and the whites, they are very destructive, not only of the lives of the warriors engaged in it, but of the women and children also, often becoming a war of extermination. Such is the rule of savage warfare, and it is difficult if not impossible to restrain white men, especially white men upon the frontiers, from adopting the same mode of warfare against the Indians. The indiscriminate slaughter of men, women, and children has frequently occurred in the history of Indian wars. But the fact which gives such terrible force to the condemnation of the wholesale massacre of Arapahoes and Cheyennes, by the Colorado troops under Colonel Chivington, near Fort Lyon, was that those Indians were there encamped under the direction of our own officers, and believed themselves to be under the protection of our flag. To the honor of the Government it may be said that a just atonement for this violation of its faith was sought to be made in the late treaty with these tribes.

Second. Another potent cause of their decay is to be found in the loss of their hunting grounds and in the destruction of that game upon which the Indian subsists. This cause, always powerful, has of late greatly increased. Until the white settlements crossed the Mississippi the Indians could still find hunting grounds without limit, and game, especially the buffalo, in great abundance upon the western plains.

But the discovery of gold and silver in California, and in all the mountain Territories, poured a flood of hardy and adventurous miners across those plains, and into all the valleys and gorges of the mountains, from the east.

Two lines of railroad are rapidly crossing the plains, one by the valley of the Platte and the other by the Smoky Hill. They will soon reach the Rocky mountains crossing the center of the great buffalo range in two lines from east to west. It is to be doubted if the buffalo in his migrations will many times cross a railroad where trains are passing and repassing, and with the disappearance of the buffalo from this immense region all the powerful tribes of the plains will inevitably disappear, and remain north of the Platte or south of the Arkansas. Another route further north, from Minnesota, by the Upper Missouri, and one further south, from Arkansas by the Canadian, are projected, and will soon be pressed forward. These will drive the last vestige of the buffalo from all the region east of the Rocky mountains and put an end to the wild man's means of life.

On the other hand, the emigration from California and Oregon into the Territories from the West is filling every valley and gorge of the mountains with the most energetic and fearless men in the world. In those wild regions, where no civil law has ever been administered, and where our military forces have scarcely penetrated, these adventurers are practically without any law except such as they impose upon themselves, namely, the law of necessity and of self-defense.

Even after territorial governments are established over them in form by Congress the population is so sparse and the administration of the civil law so feeble that the people are practically without any law but their own will. In their eager search for gold or fertile tracts of land the boundaries of Indian reservations are wholly disregarded; conflicts ensue; exterminating wars follow, in which the Indian is, of course, at the last overwhelmed if not destroyed.

The question whether the Indian Bureau should be placed under the War Department or retained in the Department of the Interior is one of considerable importance, and both sides have very warm advocates. Military men generally unite in recommending that change be made, while civilians, teachers, missionaries, agents, and superintendents, and those not in the regular Army generally oppose it. The arguments and objections urged by each are not without force.

The argument in favor of it is that in case of hostilities the military forces must assume control of our relations to the hostile tribes, and therefore it is better for the War Department to have the entire control, both in peace and in war; secondly, that the annuity goods and clothing paid to Indians under treaty stipulations will be more faithfully and honestly made by officers of the regular Army, who hold their places for life, and are subject to military trials for misconduct, than when made by the agents and superintendents appointed under the Interior Department; and thirdly, that it would prevent conflict between different Departments in the administration of their affairs.

Upon the other side it is urged with great force that for the proper administration of Indian affairs there must be some officer of the Government whose duty it is to remain upon the reservations with the tribes and look after their affairs; that as their hunting grounds are taken away the reservation system, which is the only alternative to their extermination, must be adopted. When the Indians are once located upon them farmers, teachers, and missionaries become essential to any attempt at civilization, are absolutely necessary to take the first step toward changing the wild hunter into a cultivator of the soil, to change the savage into a civilized man. The movement of troops from post to post is, of necessity, sudden and frequent, and, therefore, the officers of the Army, however competent, cannot take charge of the affairs and interests of the Indians upon reservations any longer than military force is required to compel the Indians to remain upon them, as in the case of the Navajos in New Mexico, and during that time even proper and competent persons acting as agents, farmers, teachers, and missionaries, devoting their whole time to these occupations, can serve that purpose much better than officers of the Army.

While it is true many agents, teachers, and employes of the Government are inefficient, faithless, and even guilty of peculations and fraudulent practices upon the Government and upon the Indians, it is equally true that military posts among the Indians have frequently become centers of demoralization and destruction to the Indian tribes, while the blunders and want of discretion of inexperienced officers in command have brought on long and expensive wars, the cost of which, being included in the expenditures of the Army, are never seen and realized by the people of the country.

Since we acquired New Mexico the military expenditures connected with Indian affairs have probably exceeded $4,000,000 annually in that Territory alone. When General Sumner was in command of that department he recommended the purchase of all the private property of citizens, and the surrender of that whole Territory to the Indians, and upon the score of economy it would doubtless have been a great saving to the Government.

But that policy was not pursued, and there as well as elsewhere the reservation system has been adopted. That it has and will cost the Government large sums of money is undoubtedly true, but in the end far less than the maintenance of forces sufficient to keep the peace and suffer the Indians to range at will over the Territory. When once adopted, however, the same necessity for agents, teachers, farmers and missionaries arises, both upon the score of humanity and economy—both to civilize the Indian and to teach him to raise his subsistence from the soil. The Army and the officers of the Army are not by their habits and profession well adapted to this work.

Another strong reason for retaining the Indian Bureau in the Department of the Interior is, that the making of treaties and the disposition of the lands and funds of the Indians is of necessity intimately connected with our public land system, and, with all its important land questions, would seem to fall naturally under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department.

The inconveniences arising from the occasional conflicts and jealousies between officers appointed under the Interior and War Departments are not without some benefits also; to some extent they serve as a check upon each other; neither are slow to point to the mistakes and abuses of the other. It is therefore proper that they should be independent of each other, receive their appointments from and report to different heads of Departments. Weighing this matter and all the arguments for and against the proposed change, your committee are unanimously of the opinion that the Indian Bureau should remain where it is.

In our Indian system beyond all doubt there are evils, growing out of the nature of the case itself, which can never be remedied until the Indian race is civilized or shall entirely disappear.

The committee are satisfied that these evils are sometimes greatly aggravated, not so much by the system adopted by the Government in dealing with the Indian tribes as by the abuses of that system.

As the best means of correcting those abuses and ameliorating those evils the committee recommend the subdivision of the Territories and States wherein the Indian tribes remain into five inspection districts, and the appointment of five boards of inspection; and they earnestly recommend the passage of Senate bill No. 183, now pending before the House. That bill was unanimously recommended by the joint special committee, and also recommended by the committees of both Houses upon Indian Affairs. It is the most certainly efficient mode of preventing these abuses which they have been able to devise.

The following are the four important sections of the bill as recommended by the committee:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be, and is hereby, created five boards of inspection of Indian affairs, each to consist of one assistant commissioner of Indian affairs, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall hold his office for the term of four years, unless sooner removed by the President: one to consist of an officer of the regular Army, who may be annually detailed by the Secretary of War for that purpose, and one to consist of a visitor, to be selected by the President from among such persons as may be recommended by the annual meetings or conventions of the religious societies or denominations of the United States as suitable persons to act upon said boards; or, in case of their failure to make such recommendation, from among such persons as he shall deem proper. Each of said assistant commissioners shall receive a salary of $3,000 per annum, besides necessary traveling expenses; and each of said visitors shall receive a salary of $2,000 per annum, besides necessary traveling expenses.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be established five inspection districts of Indian affairs, as follows: one to embrace the States of California and Nevada and the Territory of Arizona; one to embrace the State of Oregon and the Territories of Washington and Idaho; one to embrace the Territories of Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico; one to embrace the State of Kansas, the Indian Territory, Nebraska, and Southern Dakota; and one to embrace the State of Minnesota and that part of the Territory of Dakota north of Nebraska, and the Territory of Montana: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Interior, under the direction of the President, may from time to time change the boundaries of said Indian inspection districts.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of said boards of inspection, so far as it is practicable, to visit all the Indian tribes within their respective districts at least once in each year; to examine into their condition; to hear their complaints; to preserve peace and amity; to ascertain whether all the stipulations of treaties on the part of the United States are kept; to examine into the books, accounts, and manner of doing business of the superintendents and agents within their respective districts; to make diligent inquiry into the conduct of the officers and employes of the Indian department, and into the conduct of the military forces toward the Indians, with power to summon witnesses, and, by the aid of the military, who are hereby directed to aid them, to compel their attendance; each member of said board being hereby authorized to administer oaths; and said board shall be authorized to suspend for cause any officer or employe of the Indian department in their respective districts, and to remove them from office, subject to the approval of the President. And said board shall report annually, or as often as may be required, to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and in all cases of suspension or removal from office by said board of any officer or employe of the Indian department, said board shall make immediate report thereon in writing, stating the cause thereof, for the action of the President.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all superintendents of Indian affairs, all Indian agents, and the assistant commissioners to be appointed under this act, in addition to the powers now conferred by law, shall also possess all the powers and perform all the duties now conferred by law upon circuit court commissioners, or court commissioners in all cases or matters wherein any Indian tribe or any member of any Indian tribe shall be concerned or be a party; and that in all matters or proceedings wherein any Indian tribe or member of an Indian tribe shall be concerned or a party the testimony of Indian witnesses shall be received in all courts and before all officers of the United States.

The purpose of the bill is to provide boards of high character, and to organize them in such a manner and to clothe them with such powers as to supervise and inspect the whole administration of Indian affairs in its threefold character—civil, military, and educational.

To the position of chief of this board there should be appointed an assistant commissioner, with a salary sufficient to command the services of a man of character and great ability, whose whole time is to be devoted to this important work.

One of the board is to be an officer of the regular Army, to be assigned by the Secretary of War; (it is believed that he would be an officer of high standing in the Army;) and a third is to be selected from among those persons who may be named by the great religious conventions or bodies of the United States. It is impossible to believe that these great bodies could name any other than a man of high character and great ability. Such a board not organized upon political grounds at all, and possessing, as they will, the important powers conferred in the third section of this bill, will, in the judgment of the committee, do more to secure the faithful administration of Indian affairs than any other measure which has been suggested.

The assistant commissioner will report to the Secretary of the Interior; the officer of the Army to the Secretary of War; and the third will report not only to the Government, but to that religious body which may have recommended his appointment. Thus the treatment of the Indians by the civil authorities, by the military authorities, and by their teachers and missionaries will be subject to constant inspection and supervision.

It is urged that the expenses of these boards will be considerable; but in comparison with the greater economy and efficiency their supervision would secure, that expense will be comparatively trifling.

Such boards, charged with the duty, among other things, to preserve amity, will doubtless sometimes save the Government from unnecessary and expensive Indian wars.

As an instance bearing upon this point, when that portion of the committee who were charged with the duty of inquiring into the condition of Indian affairs in Kansas, New Mexico, and Colorado, arrived at Fort Larned, they found that the officer there in command had just issued an order to his troops to cross the Arkansas, going south into an Indian territory, where not a single white man lived, to make war upon the Camanches, a most powerful tribe, which roams over all that region from the Arkansas to Mexico. Your committee felt that such an expedition would of necessity bring on a long war with that tribe; that it was wholly unnecessary, and they took the responsibility of advising General McCook, a member of the staff of General Pope, who accompanied them, to countermand that order until he could communicate with General Pope at St. Louis. The order was countermanded; the troops then in motion were recalled; and thus by the mere presence and advice of the committee a war was avoided with the Camanches, which, had it once begun, would not have been prosecuted to a successful termination without an expenditure of $20,000,000.

Your committee took the testimony, among others, of Colonel Ford, then in command at Fort Larned, upon this subject. He says, speaking of the Camanches: "From the best information I can get, there are about seven thousand warriors well mounted, some on fleet Texan horses. On horseback they are the finest skirmishers I ever saw. How large a force, mounted and infantry, would be required to defend the Santa Fe road and wage a successful war against the Indians south of the Arkansas? It would require at least ten thousand men—four thousand constantly in the field, well mounted; the line of defense to extend from Fort Lyon to Fort Riley, and south about three hundred miles. All supplies would have to come from the States. Contract price for corn delivered at this point was $5 25 per bushel." With corn at this enormous price, and hay and wood and all supplies in proportion, the expense of such an Indian war is beyond belief. By many it was estimated that such a war would have required at least ten thousand men, and a war of two or three years' duration, to make it successful, with an expenditure of more than thirty million dollars.

It is believed that such boards of inspection, thus organized and composed of the men who should be appointed to fill them, could save the country from many useless wars with the Indians, and secure in all branches of the Indian service greater efficiency and fidelity. If such boards should cost the Government $50,000 annually, and should avert but one Indian war in ten years, still, upon the score of economy alone, the Government would be repaid five hundred per cent.

The appendix has already been published, and the report as soon as published will be placed upon the desks of Senators with the appendix.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for the printing of the report?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes, sir. An order has already been entered that the report be printed, and the same number of extra copies as were ordered to be printed of the appendix.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The same order will be entered if there be no objection.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL REVENUE LAW.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 244) to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue, to report it back without amendment, and to ask that it be considered and passed. I do not think there can be any objection to it. It is regarded as very important by the revenue department, as we are losing thousands of dollars every day on account of a practice that has prevailed and which this resolution will correct. It is very short, and I can explain it if any explanation is necessary.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It proposes to exempt from tax alcohol made or manufactured of distilled spirits upon which the taxes imposed by law shall have been paid, and burning fluid made or manufactured from alcohol or spirits of turpentine, or camphene, upon which the taxes imposed by law shall have been paid; and to repeal so much of section ninety-six of the act of June 30, 1864, as relates to alcohol and burning fluid, and all products of distillation, by whatever name known, which contain distilled spirits or alcohol on which the tax imposed by law has not been paid, are to be considered and taxed as distilled spirits. It also proposes to amend paragraph nineteen of section seventy-nine of the act of June 30, 1864, as amended by the act of July 13, 1866, entitled "An act to reduce internal taxation, and to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay the interest on the public debt, and for other purposes,' approved June 30, 1864, and acts amendatory thereof," by striking out the words "and distillers of burning fluid and camphene."

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 457) for the relief of Hiram Paulding, rear admiral United States Navy, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 540) to amend an act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster's stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States," approved July 4, 1864; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WADE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 541) to regulate the care and supervision of the Capitol and Capitol grounds, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 542) for the relief of the North Missouri Railroad Company of Missouri, by allowing a credit on duties to be paid on imported railroad iron; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 543) to abolish and forever prohibit the system of peonage in the Territory of New Mexico and other parts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 544) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Newsboys' Home," and also for the relief of abandoned children in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOWLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 545) for the relief of John F. Stewart; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 546) to increase and equalize the pay of officers in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 547) to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the time for the reversion to the United States of the lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Amboy by Hillsdale and Lansing to some point on or near Traverse bay, in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CAPTURE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to furnish for the use of the Senate the report of Major General J. M. Wilson on the capture of Jefferson Davis.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. WADE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 388.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 388) to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Ought that bill to be considered in the absence of the Maryland Senators? Neither of them is in his seat. It is a bill of some importance.

Mr. WADE. I believe both those Senators have been here this morning, if they are not here now. I do not know that they take any interest in it. I told one of the Senators from Maryland that I should call it up this morning. He was here then. I do not suppose he takes any interest.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know whether they do or not; but it is a question of some importance, and I think it had better be postponed until they are here.

Mr. WADE. It has been postponed one week because one of them was absent. They have been here to-day. I do not think they take much interest in it. I spoke to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. CRESWELL] for whose accommodation it was postponed before and he said he had no objection to my calling it up at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

COMPENSATION OF CIVIL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 224.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) giving additional compensation to certain employees in the civil service of the Government at Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Finance report an amendment to the joint resolution, which is to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert a substitute. The substitute only will be read unless some Senator asks for the reading of the original resolution.

The Secretary read the substitute, as follows:

That there shall be allowed and paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the following described persons employed in the civil service at Washington, namely: to clerks, messengers, watchmen, and laborers, and all the civil employees whose salaries are fixed by law and do not exceed the sum of $3,500 each per annum, and including temporary clerks, female clerks, employees in the Department of State, in the Treasury, War, Navy, Interior, Post Office, and Agricultural Departments; in the offices of the Attorney General, Coast Survey, Naval Observatory, navy yard, Paymaster General, including the division of referred claims, Commissary General of Prisoners; in the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands; in the office of the Capitol extension; in the city post office: to all enlisted men of the Army, Navy, Marine corps, or general service of the United States, serving as clerks, messengers, watchmen, or laborers in any bureau of the War Department; to all female clerks or employees in either of the Departments, including the Agricultural Department, or in any bureau or division thereof, whose compensation does not exceed sixty dollars per month; to the superintendent of meters, lamp-lighters, and draw-keepers employed under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, and one clerk in the office of said Commissioner, and to the detectives of the Metropolitan police, an additional compensation of twenty per cent. on their respective salaries or pay from one year from and after the 30th day of June, 1866: Provided, That the above-named additional compensation to the employees of the Patent Office be paid out of the funds of said office: And provided further, That this resolution shall apply only to such persons as may be in service at the time of the passage thereof: And provided further, That this resolution shall not be so construed as to give any greater amount as additional compensation than an increase of twenty per cent. on the salary or pay for the time of actual service during the period hereinbefore specified.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to amend the amendment in the sixteenth and seventeenth lines by striking out the words "in the city post office" and inserting the words "and also."

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to ask the mover of this amendment on what ground it is made.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have inserted them in another place.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I do not object if they are provided for in another place.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I intend to make that motion. You will see that provision is made for them according to the suggestion of the city postmaster.

Mr. MORRILL. Still I suppose it was proper to make the inquiry before the question was taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the inquiry?

Mr. MORRILL. The inquiry was as to the reason for striking this out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The city postmaster came to me this morning and told me that the clerks in the city post office were not salaried officers, and he desired to have them embraced in that part of the resolution that provides for persons who do not receive salaries; and according to that suggestion I have moved to strike out the words "in the city post office" in the sixteenth and seventeenth lines, and I shall move to insert the same words or equivalent words in a subsequent part of the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. That is satisfactory, of course.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to offer some additional amendments to the amendment. I move to amend in the twentieth line, after the word "Department," by inserting the words "and also;" and in the same line I move to strike out the words "clerks or" before the word "employees;" so that the clause will read:

And also to all female employees in either of the Departments, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to insert in the twenty-third line, after the words "per month," the words "and also to clerks and employees in the city post office, and."

Mr. MORRILL. I inquire if it is in order to amend that amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is an amendment to an amendment, and a motion to amend in the third degree is not admissible.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will it be in order to include other post offices?

Mr. MORRILL. That is just what I inquired.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If so, I thought of including the Indianapolis post office.

Mr. MORRILL. Oh, no; that is not in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is an ordinary post office, and of course if we are to provide for the post office here we ought to provide for others where living is equally expensive.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move further to amend the amendment in the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh lines by striking out the words "and to the detectives of the Metropolitan police," I do this at the instance of members of the Metropolitan police.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question upon the amendment to the amendment last offered is not yet disposed of.

Mr. GRIMES. What is that question?

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment, to insert in the twenty-third line the words "and also to clerks and employees of the city post office, and."

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is not that amendable by adding other post offices?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not at this stage. This is an amendment to an amendment, and an amendment in the third degree is not admissible; but such an amendment will be in order to the amendment of the committee subsequently.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know whether we ought to go into the general system of increasing the pay of the employees of post offices; I am not sufficiently informed on the subject; but if the clerks in one post office are provided for at twenty per cent. additional increase, it should be extended to the other cities where it is fully as expensive to live as it is in this city. These are mere post office clerks, and the same reasons will apply to other cases.

The question being put on the amendment to the amendment, there were, on a division—ayes 8, noes 3; no quorum voting.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a quorum present. I think if we have another division we can decide the question without the yeas and nays, if gentlemen will vote. I will explain precisely what this proposition is. The clerks in the city post office were included in the resolution as it came from the House, but were placed among those whose salary is fixed by law. We have ascertained that their salary is not fixed by law, and therefore we are obliged to transfer them to another portion of the resolution; and the amendment to the amendment is made necessary for that purpose. The House included these clerks in the city post office in this increased compensation, and the Senate committee agreed to it as being proper. The question now is, whether they shall be transferred to a point in the resolution where that intention can be carried out.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Will not this be made a ground upon which increased compensation will be claimed in all the post offices all over the country?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir. It only relates to clerks in the city post office in Washington.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. But will it not furnish a ground for similar claims from all the post office clerks throughout the country?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope not. We should then resist it if such a claim was made. This resolution is confined to clerks employed in the city of Washington, and is intended to be so confined, and the committee, I presume, would oppose an addition to anybody out of Washington. It stands on its own peculiar ground with reference to the expenses of living in Washington.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I have not been able to hear the explanations that have been made on the other side of the Chamber, but I find in the sixteenth line of the amendment reported by the committee these words: "in the city post office." That portion of the amendment applies to "the clerks, female clerks, and employés in all the other Departments," and includes the city post office. I should like to ask the gentleman having the proposition in charge to explain wherein his amendment differs from what is already apparently in the resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think a sufficient explanation has already been made.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I did not hear it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I said that these words were included in the first part of the amendment upon the assumption that the clerks and employés in the post office of the city were salaried officers; but I am informed by the postmaster of this city that they are not salaried officers, but that their wages are fixed by the postmaster, and he desires to have authority by this measure to increase their pay to the same extent that the pay of the other officers mentioned in the resolution is increased; and therefore the words in the sixteenth and seventeenth lines were stricken out, and I propose to transfer them to that portion of the resolution which is intended to include persons whose salaries are not fixed by law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator, before he takes his seat, whether it is not in this office just like it is in all other offices: the number of clerks is controlled by the Postmaster General, and the rates of their compensation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not hear the question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is not this an ordinary post office like the post offices in other cities in regard to its employés?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose that this post office is like any other post office in the United States so far as the employment and salaries of the clerks are concerned.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I must call for the order of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday without a motion. The tariff bill is now before the Senate.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If I can get the attention of the Senate for a few moments I will explain an amendment that I propose to move. It has reference to the amendment that was made yesterday on the motion of the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. WILLEY.] I move to strike out the word "Albertite" in the thirty-first line, on page 85.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that there is an amendment pending. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] on page 40, section eight, line sixty-eight, after the word "two" to insert "and one half;" so as to make the clause read:

On zinc, spelter, or tutenague, in blocks or pigs, two and a half cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If there is an amendment pending of course I will not interfere with it. I will move my amendment afterward.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, it seems to me if the Senate comprehended fully the facts in reference to spelter they would not hesitate to adopt the pending amendment, which is to increase the tariff from two cents to two and a half cents on spelter. This mineral is found in many parts of this country. It is found in New Jersey, in Pennsylvania, in Virginia, in Tennessee, in Arkansas, in Missouri, and in the lead regions of Wisconsin; and there are many works established in New Jersey, in Pennsylvania, in Illinois, in Wisconsin, and in Massachusetts. The increase that is asked is half a cent a pound. This article is used as a component part of brass, and the duty on brass is seven cents a pound, so that this increase would not seriously affect the value of brass. The manufacturer can afford to import this article, but it is the country that is interested in having the foreign article excluded and in having this wealth of the country developed. I hope that the Senate will adopt the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 10, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howe, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wade—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Henderson, Hendricks, Kirkwood, Morgan, Morrill, Patterson, Sherman, Sumner, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Creswell, Doolittle, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Howard, Johnson, Lane, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Yates—25.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now move, on page 85, section thirteen, line thirty-one, to strike out the word "Albertite," and I will make a statement in regard to it, unless the Senator from West Virginia is willing to agree to strike it out, so that it may come under the head of coal. If it is stricken out here it comes in under the head of coal, and pays a duty of $1 50, like other coal.

Mr. WILLEY. Albertite, as I understand it, is a species of asphaltum. Here it is what in Nova Scotia they call Albertite, and here is a specimen from West Virginia that they call asphaltum. [Exhibiting specimens to the Senate.] If there be any difference I am not able to see it. It is a species of asphaltum almost identical in quality.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator does not consent to the amendment I will state my reasons for offering it, and I would be obliged to the Senate if they would attend to me, for this is a matter of very great interest to the city in which I reside. The establishment there for the manufacture of oil from this Albertite coal is one of the few manufacturing establishments in our city that escaped the great conflagration. It employs about one hundred and fifty men. The works cost originally about three hundred and fifty thousand dollars in gold, and would now cost double that sum to erect. It employs a large number of men who have been employed there for years, and who must be thrown entirely out of employment if the rate of duty adopted yesterday is insisted upon, and for no other purpose that I can conceive, it being a manufacturing establishment, but to allow gentlemen in New York who have entered into this speculation in West Virginia at some future period to commence the manufacture. At Portland we manufacture oil out of it. I take it the Senator will not pretend that in West Virginia, where this mountain is, they can ever, while petroleum lasts, manufacture oil from coal. The petroleum wells are there, and oil sells for seven or eight cents; whereas the manufacture of this oil from coal would cost a very much larger sum on the spot. I understand (and the Senator will correct me if I am in error) that since the discovery of petroleum not an oil factory to manufacture oil from coal has been erected in that section of country or in Pennsylvania or anywhere where they have had an idea of manufacturing oil from coal; and that those which were in use in manufacturing oil from coal before that time in West Virginia have been converted into factories for the purpose of manufacturing petroleum. I believe this establishment in Portland, Maine, is the only one in the United States, unless there may be a small factory of this kind in Maysville, Kentucky.

Now, sir, it would seem very hard, even under ordinary circumstances, to visit upon any occasion so heavy a calamity to the city of Portland, in addition to what it has already suffered, as to close this factory entirely, which must be the effect of the duty as it now stands in the bill, for no other reason than the prospective opportunities for making money afforded by this company in West Virginia, which has not begun to operate at all, and which, as I believe, never can operate in the manufacture of oil from coal there—at the present time, to say the least of it.

The Senator from West Virginia is very honestly mistaken—if he is ever mistaken it is always honestly—on this subject. He has been misled by this statement which has been laid before us, which is full of errors, which he read, and upon which he founded his argument. The simple truth is, that this Albertite is coal, and the commissioner—I knew nothing about it; nobody interested knew anything about it—of his own motion, in framing the tariff put it in among the asphaltums, on which there was at that time a duty of twenty-five per cent. The fact is, it is not asphaltum; it never has been so ranked and never so considered. I was taken by surprise yesterday by these broad statements, which I had never seen or heard before, and was unable to contradict or answer them; but fortunately a gentleman connected with the getting up of that company was here, and I sent for him and consulted him as to the facts in relation to this question. He is concerned in the manufacture of iron somewhat, and came here in reference to iron matters; but he is perfectly familiar with this subject; and he is a gentleman for whose perfect integrity I can vouch.

He informs me that the question was tried—I do not know how it came up—in the supreme court in New Brunswick, and it was decided by the court that it was coal and not asphaltum. Why? I am not enough of a chemist to say why it was, but the reason he gives me is this: that when you distill asphaltum the residue is an earthy substance; when you distill this coal the residue is precisely as it is in other coals; it is carbon, just like the coal that you get from Pennsylvania; and it was decided to be coal. It is used, and can be used to advantage, for only two purposes: for the manufacture of gas and for the manufacture of oil. It is not used for any other purpose whatever.

During the existence of the reciprocity treaty, while all the coals came in free, certain gentlemen purchased a considerable portion of that mine in Nova Scotia. One of the misstatements in the paper that has been laid on our desks is that that mine is owned by foreigners. In fact three fourths of it is owned by American citizens. Believing that they could manufacture oil to advantage out of it they purchased the mine, and they established this establishment in Portland of which I speak at very great expense. As I stated yesterday, they went on for a while, and even when they got their coal in free they failed and were obliged to close up; but after awhile they settled up and went on again. So much for the large profits that have been made.

The gentleman to whom I have alluded has furnished me with a memorandum which I will read to the Senate. He is perfectly familiar with the whole subject, and knows all about it from the beginning. He says:

"Albertite, called in the Senate bill 'Albertite,' is coal, and was so decided by the courts. It was admitted as coal free of duty under the reciprocity treaty, and since has paid $1 25 per ton, gold duty, the same as other coals."

That is the fact about it. It was stated here yesterday that it paid twenty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. WILLEY. Of course, if it came in as coal it did not pay duty as asphaltum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly; but what many Senators founded their votes upon yesterday was the statement that the motion of the honorable Senator from West Virginia was only to make it pay exactly what it had been paying.

Mr. WILLEY. If it was coal, then of course it would pay a smaller duty; but if it was asphaltum it would pay more. That is the question exactly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Precisely; and I think the error arose from the fact that it was included by the commissioner under that impression without consulting anybody in relation to the matter, which was an entire mistake. It is coal, and has always been so regarded.

"This mine is of but very limited capacity. In no year has it mined and sold twenty thousand tons. It has run down eleven hundred feet, and they have to sink each year. In 1880 there were imported fifteen thousand tons, which paid a duty of $18,750 in gold, making in currency $27,000. Ten thousand tons out of the fifteen thousand were worked into oil, and paid an excise duty to the Government of about sixty thousand dollars, making a revenue to the Government on the importation of that coal of $37,000. To make that into oil there was expended on the ten thousand tons twenty-three dollars per ton in labor, iron, anthracite coal for fuel, and chemicals. Fifty thousand dollars of that expenditure was paid to Maryland and Pennsylvania for coal and iron."

"Now the Government want revenue. The prohibitory duty put on this coal shuts it out from this market, totally destroys the factory where the coal is worked, which cost $320,000 in gold, and which could not now be built for $700,000, throws out of employment one hundred and fifty men who have had steady work for nearly eight years, and compels them to seek other employment if they can get it. To protect what? Coal in Western Virginia that is lying in the ground and will have to lie there until petroleum is four times the price it is now. There have been no factories built in that section of the country for the purpose of working coal into oil since the discovery of petroleum."

If this gentleman is wrong in this statement the Senator from West Virginia can correct him.

"But all the factories that were built prior to the discovery of petroleum have ceased working coal and now work petroleum, with the exception of the Maysville Oil Company in Kentucky, which has been at times working small quantities of coal on the Kanawha."

"Now, as to the Ricker's mine, near Parkersburg, Virginia, that coal has been known since 1859. The company then owning it sold it to a company in New York in 1863. That company have not erected any works to make oil from the coal, for at Parkersburg they have the petroleum from the Burning Springs of Virginia, giving them the crude oil at their works at not over seven to eight cents per gallon. The coals of Western Virginia and Pennsylvania could not be worked into oil in competition with petroleum if they had no excise duty to pay.

"This prohibition of an article that pays the Government so large a revenue and gives labor to one hundred and fifty men, and contributes with that labor so large an amount to the industry of the country, is a thing that I cannot understand, especially when it does not interfere with the interest it is said the duty is designed to protect. Western Virginia and Pennsylvania need not fear any competition from foreign coal for the manufacture of oil, for there is no coal in Scotland or England that can at all compete with them. The Albert coal only competes to the extent of ten thousand tons. Shale can never be imported into this country. When oil was eighty cents per gallon, and there was no excise, there were about two thousand gallons imported from Nova Scotia free of duty, but as it did not pay it was abandoned."

I had the curiosity to look into the commerce and navigation returns for the amount of asphaltum imported; and the value of the whole quantity imported amounts to between eight and nine hundred dollars. And as to the shale, it could not be worked at all to any profit even when oil was eighty or ninety cents a gallon. As to bitumen, it is of so little consequence that it is not named at all in the returns; I cannot find it imported. For these reasons the commissioner, finding that these articles were of no sort of consequence, put them down at fifty cents, which is high enough for them, and as I said before, by a misapprehension the commissioner put Albertite into the same category. It had never been there before; it is absolutely coal and nothing but coal.

Now, just look at some of these misstatements to show how loosely men make their statements. The Senator from West Virginia read this paper and relied upon it for his facts—a paper got up by one of the men in this very company. It is a mistake, in the first place, to say that this article is asphaltum. It is not. In the next place it is a mistake to say that the present duty is twenty-five per cent. It is $1 25 a ton, and has always stood the same as other coal. Then it is stated that it is worth twenty dollars at the mine. It is only seven or eight dollars after it has been extracted.

Mr. HOWE. Then the duty is more than twenty-five per cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know but that it may be. It came in as coal, as I said before, at $1 25 a ton. I propose to strike this out so that it may come in now as other coal does under this bill at $1 50, making no distinction.

Let me call attention to another statement to show the way in which the person who wrote this paper tried to influence the members of the Senate:

"Albertite comes from Nova Scotia."

That is true.

"It is a vein of asphaltum, of great value, and it is largely, if not principally, owned by foreigners."

Here are two errors, intentional, or unintentional, I do not know which.

"The owners have a manufactory of oil in Nova Scotia, but the duty on the importation of crude oil into the United States being ten cents per gallon, they have established another manufactory at Portland, Maine, where, by a cheap and simple process, similar to the retorting of coal in gas-works, the Albertite is converted into oil, yielding over one hundred gallons to the ton of mineral."

Mr. WILLEY. On that point I wish to ascertain from the Senator whether it is true that this coal, as he calls it, yields over one hundred gallons of oil to the ton.

Mr. FESSENDEN. About one hundred of crude oil, not of refined oil.

Mr. HOWE. What is that oil worth?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state presently. This paper says: "The material is of such richness its conversion is made with almost the same facility that lard is converted into oil." And further on is a statement that those who distill it into oil have a great advantage over those who make oil from petroleum, because they do not pay so much internal revenue duty. Now I want to take these two things together. Albertite takes six separate distillations before it enters into oil; petroleum takes one single distillation. This article has to go through six separate processes before it is made into oil. As I said before, when we were forming the internal revenue bill the gentlemen who manufacture this oil at Portland and the men who manufacture oil from petroleum had a conference and they agreed upon what the just difference between the two was and should be, and it was so fixed by their agreement, and at that very time the men engaged in the manufacture of coal oil in West Virginia and that section of the country insisted upon it that there ought to be nothing at all upon this, it was so expensive a manufacture; and yet here is a statement that it can be converted into oil with the ease of lard. That is the fairness and honesty of this statement.

Then, it is said that these persons have been around the commissioner and around the Senate trying to get Albertite in at a low duty. That is a positive misstatement. It is evident the writer did not know anything about the facts. This charge is not true, and does not begin to be true. It was put in by the commissioner of his own motion; nobody asked him to do it; and I did not know anything about it myself until this controversy came up.

It is further stated here that the oil sells for seventy cents a gallon, and sold last year for $1 50. The agent informs me that it is selling now at sixty-three cents, and if you take off the duty it brings it down to fifty-three. It never sold for $1 50. It has been down as low as thirty cents, and may come down that low again at any time. This paper is a positive misstatement in all particulars.

Under these circumstances, I really must ask the Senate to reconsider this question so far as I have presented it to the Senate. I do not ask them to keep it at fifty cents a ton, but I ask them to leave it with other coals which they have put at $1 50 a ton. As the agent informs me, a duty of two dollars a ton put on this article would shut up the factory and compel them to cease business altogether or remove to the other side of the line and set it up in New Brunswick, thus losing to the Government eighty or ninety thousand dollars a year revenue derived from the duty on the imported coal and the internal revenue tax paid by this concern. I have no doubt the fact is so from the operations I have witnessed and what I know of the history of the company. To put anything like this duty on it would be entire destruction; and really, under the circumstances, I feel that I have a right to ask the Senate to adopt the amendment I have proposed.

Mr. JOHNSON. What does the Senator propose to make the duty?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The same as the coal duty, $1 50 a ton. I move simply to strike out "Albertite" here; and then it will come in as coal, as it has done before.

Mr. WILLEY. I know how hopeless a task it is to interpose objections on a question of this character to any position which the chairman of the Committee on Finance may deem it his duty to take in regard to a proposition; but I beg, after having listened to his statement, the Senate will have notice that, after all, the question raised by the statement of the Senator from Maine is whether, in point of fact, a rose would not smell as sweet by another name.

The proposition is to strike the word "Albertite" out of the lines alluded to and place it under the head of coal, so that it may be subject to the same duty as ordinary coal. Now let us look at the proposition, and let us look at the result of this thing. How much oil can be expressed out of ordinary bituminous coal? That depends very much upon its quality, for there is a difference of quality in the ordinary bituminous coal. So far as my experience is concerned—and living in the midst of it I have some personal knowledge in regard to that matter—forty gallons a ton is about the highest that you can get from a ton of the richest bituminous coal in our section of the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is about all they get from this after it is reduced.

Mr. WILLEY. According to the statement of the honorable Senator from Maine it is admitted that one hundred or upward of one hundred gallons of oil may be expressed out of a ton of this Albertite. Is that ordinary coal? Is that an article that ought to be placed in the category of our ordinary bituminous coal, subject to the same duty and to the same conditions, one producing at the very highest only forty gallons per ton, and this rich article producing one hundred gallons and sometimes more than one hundred gallons per ton—producing as much oil per ton as this asphaltum does, and therefore placing itself, it seems to me, upon pretty much the same reason for the same protection? It is true, you may call it by another name, but the result is the same. You may call it coal, but it produces one hundred gallons of oil, and ordinary bituminous coal only produces forty—from twenty to forty.

And now, if I can get the attention of the Senate, I beg to correct the Senator in some of his material statements. I know nothing of the character of the gentleman who placed these facts in my hands personally; but he comes to me recommended as a gentleman of the highest integrity, and I am sure that he is a gentleman of the finest intelligence. Except so far as the Senator from Maine states facts resting upon his personal knowledge, the Senate have only the written statement of one gentleman from Portland, Maine, on the one side, and a gentleman from New York on the other.

As to the allegation that nothing has been done to develop the rich mine of asphaltum alluded to in West Virginia, and that this proposition is one wholly prospective in its character, I beg to correct the Senator from Maine. Already $100,000 have been expended in building a railroad to this mine, and retorts are in process of erection at the mine for the purpose of expressing the oil. In addition to that, extensive brick buildings have been erected and are in process of erection. Many thousands of brick have been made at the place for the purpose of erecting buildings; and buildings are in process of erection, and a large and heavy amount of capital has already been expended; and this company is just on the eve of commencing operations there, unless it should be cut down by this discrimination against it. You say it is "Albertite" in Nova Scotia; you say it is "asphaltum" in West Virginia; yet the Nova Scotia Albertite is as rich in the identical article of oil as the asphaltum is in West Virginia. Whether you call it Albertite or asphaltum, the reason for protecting the one is just about the same as for protecting the other by a duty.

Now, sir, I am no mineralogist; but I have had the specimens before me, and if I were to present them to any Senator I venture to say that from the external appearance of them there could be no distinction made in them. They look precisely alike. There may be, and doubtless is, according to the statement of the Senator from Maine, a difference in them in some respects, enough to give them a different name; but the result of the manufacture of each is about the same; and now the question is, whether as regards two articles that produce the same results, although in their crude state you may call them by different names, the domestic article shall not be protected against the introduction of the foreign article; that is to say, whether coal oil, whether this oil which is identical in its character, whether expressed from asphaltum or expressed from Albertite, shall be introduced from abroad in competition with the domestic manufacture at home.

Some of the facts stated by the Senator from Maine may have their weight upon the Senate; but I am very certain that the character and standing of the Senator from Maine, the position he occupies upon the Finance Committee, and justly occupies in the estimation of the Senate and the country, is a matter much more difficult for me to encounter than the real facts and merits involved in the case. I repeat, sir, the same results accrue from the manufacture of these articles, whether you call them one name or the other. Why do you call one thing "Albertite" and the other "asphaltum"? The name Albertite is a mere compliment, I believe, to Prince Albert himself. A certain species of stone found in Nova Scotia not very long ago had the cognomen of "Albertite," given to it in compliment to Prince Albert. Compare them together and they look exactly as if they contained the same resinous qualities. The results as stated by the Senator from Maine show that such is the fact, that both produce one hundred and sometimes a little over one hundred gallons of oil to the ton, the same kind of oil, to be applied to the same purposes. Now, the question is, when our own domestic capital and our own fellow-citizens here at home and our own industry are brought into competition with the introduction from abroad of an article which, though having a different name, produces the same result, shall they not have a discrimination of protection in their favor? It is with the greatest regret imaginable that I am driven to this position as against the Senator from Maine; but looking to the interests of my constituents, and I think to the general interests of the country, and relying upon the general principles of this bill which, all through it, in all of its provisions, proposes to extend protection to domestic industry and to domestic manufactures and to domestic capital, and to protect our own interests against foreign competition, I cannot see upon what principle a discrimination in this single article producing the same results, simply because it has a different name, shall be made; and I trust that the Senate will allow the clause to remain as it is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no advantage whatever in contending with the Senator, and I do not wish any except such as facts may entitle me to. I stated that this article produced about one hundred gallons of crude oil to the ton. I have seen the gentleman since, and he says that the refined oil is about sixty or sixty-five gallons to the ton after it is rendered fit for use; and he says further that, exclusive of the cost of the coal, it costs from thirty to thirty-five cents a gallon to manufacture the oil. To impose a high duty on coal used in that way is not according to the principles of this bill. The principles of this bill are to admit raw material as low as possible for the benefit of manufactures from the raw material. But, sir, I take the Senator's own words and I put the case thus: we have put our capital into it—I say we; I do not mean myself, for I have no interest in it; we have erected our mill, if you please to call it a mill; we have been at all this expense; we employ American citizens; and the mine is owned three quarters of it by American citizens instead of by foreigners, as the Senator seems to suppose. Now, the question is whether that having been done in good faith under the reciprocity treaty, being introduced as coal and being coal, the Senate is ready to say that because it is not a native product they will break down at once and destroy all this capital and throw these men out of employment, because there is a mine in West Virginia that certain gentlemen in New York have bought, and they want to exclude everything else from the country that can come into competition with them.

The Senator says the man who works the West Virginia mine has no protection. Why, sir, in the first place there is $1 25 a ton; in the next place the coal is right there on the spot where he erects the mills; he has nothing to pay for transporting it, while we are obliged to bring ours from Nova Scotia. He has that additional protection, and then he can manufacture the oil just as cheap as we can or cheaper on account of the difference in labor and other things. Is not that protection? What the Senator demands for his constituents is that Albertite shall be excluded from the country, and that this business of ours, undertaken in good faith under the reciprocity treaty, shall be destroyed, the capital destroyed, and the men thrown out of employment. I take his own words for it. I say it is a most unreasonable demand.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment of the Committee on Finance by striking out "fifty cents" in line forty-nine of section thirteen, on page 86, and inserting "one dollar," and by striking out all after the word "foot" in line fifty.

The effect of this amendment is simply to put the second classification of marble in the bill at one dollar per cubic foot specific instead of fifty cents a cubic foot and twenty per cent. ad valorem. The amendment proposes to raise the duty provided in that paragraph to one dollar per cubic foot, leaving off the ad valorem duty entirely, which is exactly as the House bill stands; and from the investigation which I have made on the subject, and the information I have received, which is perfectly credible, I am clearly satisfied that that ought to be done.

The first clause on the subject of marble provides a duty of one dollar per cubic foot and twenty-five per cent. ad valorem on white statuary marble, brocatello, Sienna, and antique. Now, it is well known to most Senators undoubtedly that all the marble that comes into the country under that first classification is exceedingly trifling. The importations of it amount to almost nothing, for the reason that under that classification the importers are able to swear, as importers are sometimes a little loose on that subject, that the marble which they import properly belongs to the other class. If a block of marble possesses the least discoloration, no matter how large the block may be, if it is at all veined or otherwise impure in any part of it, it does not come under the head of "white statuary marble," but comes in under the head of the "other" descriptions of marble.

The classifications of marble known to the science of geology and to the trade are as follows: first, the antique, which is merely marble made from ancient monuments, the quarries of which are now entirely lost, and which so far as importations are concerned is of course of no account any way. The second is the simple or single colored varieties. That may be white or it may be yellow or any other color which is uniform and homogeneous. The third variety is the variegated, which includes all kinds of discolored marbles which are homogeneous in their composition. The fourth kind is what is called the brecciated, which includes brocatello, which is the same as the Maryland or Virginia marble of which the columns in the old Hall of the House of Representatives are made, and a very handsome marble it is. The fifth description is what is called the lumachella or fossiliferous marble. That is composed very largely of fossil shells, but is not very much used in trade. Then the kinds of marble which will come in under this second clause include almost all that is used for interior ornamental purposes, whether of the single-colored or of the variegated-colored kinds. It will all come in under this second clause. We all know that marble which is used in that way is marble that is used generally by the opulent. It is for interior ornamentation, mantels, wash-basins, and all that sort of thing which goes to make up the elegances of the houses of the rich, and therefore a tax as upon a luxury may justly be imposed upon it.

Now, the cost of that description of marble laid down in New York, according to the invoices of the importers for the past two years, has been as follows: the cost at Carrara, in Italy, from whence the largest part of this marble comes, is put down at sixty-five cents. That is the cost delivered on ship board at Carrara. The duty is fifty cents and twenty per cent. ad valorem as the law now is, equal to sixty-three cents. The premium on gold at forty per cent. would be fifty-one cents more. The freight, when it is not brought as ballast, as it frequently is, and if paid for as freight rather than paying freight for being brought, three dollars per ton, would be thirty cents per cubic foot. Then insurance, &c., amounts to two cents more. Adding up these items, you have the prime cost in the city of New York of a cubic foot of this description of marble $2 11 only. That is what it pays duty on. That marble sells in the city of New York, which is the principal market, and in Boston for just about the same; it sells to the persons who buy it from these importers from five to seven dollars per cubic foot, say an average of $5 50 a foot, which leaves a clear profit to the importer on every cargo that he brings over of $3 39 a cubic foot. Now, if you add fifty cents per cubic foot to the duty, making it a dollar, there would still be left to him a clear profit of $2 89 a foot, and with the twenty per cent. off, sixty-three cents more, would leave a profit of $3 52, and that ought to be profit enough for any importer.

Thus it appears that this amendment which I purpose, instead of increasing the cost to the consumer, really is merely a diminution of the profits of the foreign importer who brings this marble from the shores of the Mediterranean, where all our foreign marble comes from, in one place or another, either the isles of Greece or the shores of Italy; and some of the varieties come from France. It leaves him a very handsome profit still.

Now, as to the comparative cost of labor in Carrara and in the places of production in our own country, whether in Vermont, or in Maryland, or New York, or Pennsylvania, or Ohio, or Michigan, wherever marble can be worked, the cost of labor shows a very great disparity indeed. The cost of labor at Carrara, not according to the statement of any interested person, but according to the statement found in books and treatises on this subject—English books and treatises, which I have examined—is, for common labor, not over forty-five cents per day; sixty cents a day for skilled quarrymen; and from eighty-eight cents to one dollar per day for the best and most intelligent workmen. In the marble quarries in Vermont—and I have no doubt it is the same elsewhere in the United States—the cost for a common laborer is $1 75 per day, and for highly-skilled labor from three to five dollars per day.

It will therefore be perceived by the Senate that in every point of view this protection is proper upon the same principle upon which we have been proceeding in relation to coal and all other home productions, where there is an abundance of the raw material scattered all over the United States, where there are millions of capital invested in New England and in the Middle States and some in the western States in this business, and where, therefore, the whole market can be supplied at rates which will not be enhanced by this additional duty, for the reason we all understand that if the quarryman can increase his production and find a market for a little additional product of his mine he can continue to sell at the same or a lower rate and still make more profit than he did before, for the larger the production and the greater the sale the greater the gross amount of profit at a small rate.

Hence it appears to me all the considerations which have induced the Senate to protect other branches of American industry apply with greater force, if it be possible, to this case. In the case of coal, it is an article of prime necessity, used either in the form of fuel or as the means of producing light or working machinery by every interest in the land, the poor as well as the rich, while in the case of this description of marble, as I said before, it is really a luxury used by the opulent and wealthy for ornaments for their dwellings, and other things of that kind.

Perhaps it may be said that as to tombstones there may be some foreign importation; but the cases are very rare, indeed, in which the grave of any person in even moderate circumstances is marked by a stone of foreign production. In that instance it is only the graves of the wealthy and the great that are surmounted by Italian marble monuments.

The result, then, is if you wish to increase the revenue upon these articles of luxury and gain a larger amount of income to the country than you do now without increasing the price, this duty ought to be raised to the point where the House left it; and in addition to that, if you wish to encourage the production at home and to protect and develop the capital already invested by millions of dollars and by thousands of workers in it, then this amendment ought to be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The same principle upon which the committee acted with regard to many other duties governed them in fixing this duty. We looked to see whether the duties raised upon some particular materials would affect the manufacturers of those materials. We came to the conclusion that it was necessary to raise the duties on iron, though not as much as the House proposed, and on wool, which we left pretty much the same; and of course upon all those things manufactured from iron and from wool it became necessary to raise the duties somewhat. But with regard to this particular thing, we could not see where the logic was as applied to marble. In 1864 the duties were fixed exactly to suit the predecessor of the honorable Senator, Mr. Foot. Two years ago, or a little more, the Vermont marble men demanded a duty of fifty cents upon "all other marble" and twenty per cent. ad valorem, and they got it. It cannot be contended, I think, that wages are any higher now than they were then, especially in Vermont, where they work in marble. It cannot be pretended that it costs any more to work the marble in Vermont to-day than it did when the tariff of 1864 was passed, or that the necessities of life have increased in price since. If that rate of duty was satisfactory then to the predecessor of the honorable Senator and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, who look sharply after Vermont's interests, the Committee on Finance could not see why it should not be satisfactory now. We raised the duties at that time to protect what is mere labor; and having given them all they wanted and all they said was necessary to compete with foreigners then, the committee were unable to see why this duty should be raised at the present time. I am unable to perceive it now.

The same argument is made by the Senator that is made by the representatives of every other interest. Calculations are presented which nobody can answer because nobody has the data but those who make them up; and we must take them on their say-so. We had before us some of the workers in marble who say there is a very considerable interest, a large interest in the city of Philadelphia and in the city of New York, and probably in other cities. They demonstrated to our satisfaction that this increase of duty would operate very onerously upon them, and they stated the fact also that the Vermont marble works were so filled with orders that they could not supply the demand and had not been able to supply their own demand, that is the demand for marble of these men themselves, or to answer their orders.

I do not understand the honorable Senator as saying that the interest is suffering any up in Vermont. I have never heard that the marble quarries of Vermont were anything but a source of wealth. I have never heard any complaint that they suffered for want of adequate protection. Anybody may look and see how much a dollar a cubic foot would be upon a large slab of marble. It was illustrated in the room of the Committee on Finance by referring to the table before us around which we sat, and it was evident that a dollar a cubic foot on anything like a considerable block of marble would be so large that it would be almost impossible for parties of moderate means to use imported marble.

Again, there is one thing of which the Vermont marble now has a perfect monopoly, and that is for statuary purposes. No one thinks of importing marble to compete with the Vermont marble for that. It is pure white, the best that can be had. These other marbles which the Senator has referred to are expensive. They are used, as he says, rather as articles of luxury. It is not so much so with the common marbles, which are used for various purposes in connection with the building of houses and for furniture and divers things which I cannot begin to enumerate. Many import these foreign marbles for that use. They are not very high priced, and their use does not interfere, as we are told, with the sales of the Vermont marble-works, because they have as much as they can do to supply the demand, and, indeed, that is more than they can do.

I believe our marble trade is the principal trade we have with Italy. There are but two or three articles in which we have any trade with Italy. We trade there for fruits, and we trade for sulphur, most of which comes from Sicily, and we trade for marble. I do not suppose it costs a great deal for our fruit vessels to bring home marble, or that they charge a very large sum. The Senator should remember in his calculations of what the freight costs and what profit the importer makes, that the importer charges according to what he has to pay, and if he has to pay a dollar duty he charges that dollar to the consumer.

Now, sir, I hope the amendment will not be adopted, unless the Senator can give some good and sufficient reason which shows that this burden should be laid upon the many uses that are made of marble for ordinary purposes of ornament in furniture and in the building of houses, so as to give an entire monopoly of the whole matter to the Vermont marble-works and destroy the little trade we have with Italy in this matter. Unless he can show some different reason that prevails now from that which prevailed in 1864, two years and a half ago, when the duty was fixed exactly to suit these gentlemen, and was made perfectly satisfactory to them on their own motion, I really think this amendment ought not to prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Maine, if we were to judge by his debates, is unable to see any other part of the country except that rock-bound coast up there where they distill Albertine into oil. That is the only interest which really deserves the highest kind of protection, if we are to take his counsel for it, that there is in the United States. Now, I wish to inform the Senator from Maine, or rather to remind him, because he does not need to be informed, that the data I am speaking from as to the production of these marbles, the cost of them, and all that, he can find in any recent encyclopedia which contains the head "marble" or "Carrara marble;" and there he will find the cost of foreign labor, the amount of production, the classification of the marble, the markets to which it is exported; and I will read for the information of my friend from Maine a memorandum which I have made myself from the fourth volume of the American Encyclopedia, which is to be found in the Congressional Library, and which was not got up by workers of Vermont marble to the best of my knowledge, information, and belief, to show what this foreign production is, how it is classified, and what a very eminent English statistician, writing on this subject, says is done with it.

First, as to the foreign product: Carrara furnishes of statuary blocks, the kind that my friend from Maine is willing to protect against, only 2,900 tons a year. The only other foreign product of statuary blocks is Massa, which furnishes a rather inferior kind, and which only produced in 1862 or 1863 when this encyclopedia article was written, 106 tons. Of other marble in blocks Carrara produced 46,367 tons; Massa, 2,792 tons. Then in slabs Carrara produced 6,518 tons, and Massa, 1,511, making a total production of Carrara marble of 54,785 tons, of which, as I have said, only 2,900 tons were statuary, and the total product of Massa 4,409 tons.

Of this annual product from these quarries—I now quote from the English writer on the subject, and not from the Vermont marble men—"about half that in blocks" (that includes the statuary and all others in blocks, making about 50,000 tons) "is exported to the United States, which appears to be a steady and good market." Now, I quote further from the American Encyclopedia when I say that the cost of labor at Carrara does not exceed forty-five cents per day for common labor, sixty cents per day for skilled labor, and eighty-eight cents per day for the best and most intelligent workmen. The London prices for these marbles, taken from the same book, are as follows: of the highest and best quality of statuary fourteen to fifteen dollars per cubic foot; the first quality of the other kinds which come in under this proposition at fifty cents per foot, from seven to eight dollars per foot; the second quality three to four dollars per foot; and other Italian marble, not the Carrara, one to three dollars.

Thus it will be perceived that the data to which I have referred do not depend upon the statements of interested parties, but do depend upon the general information which men engaged in scientific pursuits, in getting up statistics for the general information of all countries, collect from responsible and authoritative sources. That is where the information comes from; and if my friend will inquire of his New York marble-workers, who appear to have been before him, and ask them how much they invoice this marble at per cubic foot, and how much they swear it costs them at the port of exportation, (which is what they call now-a-days the protective way of importing goods, to take the foreign cost and not the home value, which is not my doctrine,) he will find that I have not understated the cost on which they pay duty a single cent a foot, and that they only pay a duty, including charges and everything else, at such a rate as to make the cost to them in the city of New York only a little over two dollars per cubic foot. They sell it for $5 50, as my friend has the information they do, if he has had the dealers in New York before him; and I only speak of New York as one port illustrating the others, being the principal port. Can my friend tell me that I have overstated or understated this price at $5 50, the price to the trade in the city of New York?

Now, just look at it in another point of view and see how it has worked for revenue. If the Senator will turn to the volume of Commercial Relations he will discover that I have not quoted from the Vermont men for this; he will see that when the tariff which he says was made in 1864 was passed, raising the duty to fifty cents per foot and twenty per cent. ad valorem, there was imported in the year 1864 marble to the value of $108,476, the duties on which were $48,890. That of course was before the act of 1864 took effect. In 1865, under the operation of that act, while the importation was reduced in value to $84,631, the duties rose to $81,855, making an absolute increase to the revenue on this one article alone at that one port of $38,215.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How much would the revenue have been increased if the article had been excluded?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would probably have increased it to about as much as it would to exclude Albertainite from the works of Maine. I do not know how much it would increase it to exclude it altogether; but where there is a net profit of more than one hundred per cent. upon each cubic foot that the importer now brings in, I take it there is not much danger in increasing the tariff fifty cents per foot, which is just about ten per cent. on the retail price of his sales.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will notice a difference between marble and Albertainite, as he calls it. Whereas he desires a double duty to be put upon marble, we are content with an increased duty on Albertainite.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well, I am not complaining of my friend's Albertainite; I am only saying that that kind of justice which he demands for himself and for the interest that he represents he ought to be willing to extend to other sections of the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am, and if the Senator will only demonstrate that there has been any change to render it any more burdensome for the Vermont marble to contend with foreign marble since 1864, when we know there has been a fall in the prices of living and no increase in the price of wages, and it was fixed then to suit what they demanded, I shall be inclined to favor an increase of the duty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have yet to learn in my section of country that there has been any fall in the prices of wages or in the price of living.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There has been no increase since then.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will remind my friend that since 1864, when, as he says, my constituents got this fixed to suit themselves, there has been a very heavy increase of internal revenue taxes, and the marble workers of Vermont and every other State—because, I beg to remind him that this is not merely a Vermont interest—have been most heavily taxed by internal taxation. And, beside that, the difference in exchange and the price of gold have so changed from that time to this as to make an enormous difference against them in that respect, so that they do not stand anything like on the same ground that they did in 1864.

Now, therefore, if you find, as the experiment which has been tried demonstrates that you will, that by making the importer share some larger part of his enormous profits with the Government, you increase the revenue, while you still are able to supply the market from your home production and thereby increase your internal revenue by taxation and develop your industry, I think you ought to do it. It is not Vermont alone, by any means, that is interested in a question of this description. Let me assure my friend that there are a great many other places in the United States where marble not only exists, but is absolutely worked, capital is invested in it, labor is producing it. The localities of white marble in the United States are Vermont, Western Massachusetts, New York, west of the city, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, the Carolinas, Georgia, and Alabama. Pursuing down the whole eastern range of the Alleghanies, extending from the Canada line to the Gulf of Mexico, white marble exists; many quarries of it are worked, which supply the cities and the trade from place to place. This is an interest worth developing, as much so as that of coal; and as I said before, in addition to the arguments which have been so successfully urged about coal, differing from coal there enters into the production of marble when it comes to be utilized a vast deal of labor. It not only has to be quarried as coal has, but it has to be worked as coal does not have to be. Labor is expended upon it; skill is expended upon it; luxury results from it. It is therefore one of that class of productions which ought to bear out of proportion, speaking in one sense of that word, the burdens of taxation which the country must impose on its citizens.

Now take the variegated marble, where is that to be found in the United States and where is it worked? It is worked even in Maine, at Thomaston. I do not know how the quarries are going on now, but there is a good quarry, according to the Encyclopedia, of marble there.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They do not ask any increase.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that they do. Perhaps they have turned their attention, being pretty far down on the northeastern frontier, to importing coals and making oil; perhaps they find that more profitable; I cannot say. Then Vermont has exhaustless stores of it; Tennessee is full of it, and the beautiful marble which adorns many of the staircases of this Capitol is from there; California has fine quarries of it of the most beautiful description. Then when you take the prucciated marble, another description, Vermont has it, Maryland has it, and so has Tennessee. So that every description of marble which is known among men, excepting the antiques, as they are called, from the lost quarries, are to be found in abundance in this country. Every description of it is worked. Millions of capital are invested in it, and thousands upon thousands of the industrious inhabitants of this country earn their daily bread in working in it in one form or another. It is entitled to protection; it is entitled to encouragement; and let me tell my friend from Maine that it is no easy thing, no light thing to open a marble quarry. Some marble quarries, like every other description of business, are very profitable; others are not so. The general average of the marble business is not exceedingly profitable, and we must legislate for the general average of that description of occupation.

We find, then, that the importer of this foreign marble can well share his enormous profits with the Government by paying a little higher tax. We find that it will not be a tax upon the consumer, although that consumer who uses the foreign marble is your rich man and not your poor one, because there is not one house in fifty in the United States that contains any marble article of furniture or ornament whatever, unless it may be some little mantel ornament, a vase or something of that kind, that is made from a kind of stucco prepared from marble dust; but of real marble there is not one house in fifty among the habitations of the citizens of the United States that has a particle of it inside of its doors. It comes almost under the same head that champagne and claret and Burgundy and cigars do; things that the rich or those who have money to spend for luxuries, whether rich or not, choose to have. Therefore it ought to be taxed more than other articles; and as I have demonstrated, on account of the great extent of the product in this country and the great amount of capital and labor already invested in it, there is no danger that there will not be a sufficient supply, and no danger that the price will be enhanced by increasing this duty. The only result will be that while you thus stimulate to a larger degree home production, you will increase your revenue and not increase the price.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire simply to say, in reference to this amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, that the representatives of this interest and the representatives of those who are engaged in the working of marble were before the committee, and both sides of this question were there heard, and this report was fixed with reference to the interests of all concerned as well with reference to the interest of the country so far as the question related to revenue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Allow me to ask my friend a question. May I inquire what representatives of the marble-producing interest were before the committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know their names; I cannot remember their names.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can you tell where their quarries were?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose they were in Vermont, but I am not certain about that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be very glad to have more definite information on that subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think any Vermont marble men were before us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My information is that the marble-workers of New York and Philadelphia, three-fourths of whom are unnaturalized foreigners, Italians, as I am told, (and from my own experience I think that is so,) were before the committee; but the marble producers, relying upon the examination which was had upon the House bill, and not informed that there was going to be any attack upon it, had no opportunity of being heard. I am not complaining that the committee did not give them a hearing; they ought to have attended to it, I agree.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not advised as to where these men lived who appeared before the committee, but I am quite confident that the view of the subject which the Senator has presented here to-day was presented to and considered by the committee in connection with the statements made by those engaged in working marble in this country; and those persons represented in us that they were prepared with their figures (as all these persons are who come to make representations in reference to the tariff) to show that if this additional duty be imposed upon marble imported into this country it will be ruinous to their business.

It seems to me that if the object be to protect labor by the imposition of duties it is necessary that we should take into consideration the labor of the men who are engaged in working marble and making statues and furniture and other articles out of marble, as much as the interests of the particular men who are taking the marble out of the ground. They say to us (of course there is no way to verify what they say) that if we impose this tariff upon marble imported from Europe we ruin their business and drive hundreds and thousands of poor men out of employment. But the Senator comes here and says that you must impose this tariff or you will drive hundreds and thousands out of employment. Of course some decision has to be made between these conflicting interests. It may be that the report made by the committee was a mistake; but after looking into the matter, hearing all sides—I cannot remember now who presented the side that has been submitted to the Senate by the Senator from Vermont—but after hearing the whole question this report was made by the committee. I have as much reason to believe that if this amendment of the Senator prevails the workers in marble will be ruined as I have to believe that if it does not prevail those who are engaged in producing marble in Vermont will be ruined.

As has been suggested, I have not yet learned—at any rate, no such representation was made to the committee—that that business was suffering; that those who are engaged in producing marble at this time in Vermont or elsewhere are engaged in an unprofitable business. The representations made to us were that they were unable to supply the demand made upon them under the existing tariff. Under the circumstances, while I should be very happy to accommodate the gentleman and the interest he represents, it seems to me there may be danger of doing injury to others in endeavoring to accommodate the persons he represents.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Only a word. I will not occupy the time of the Senate. The trouble with my friend and the committee evidently has been this: that in the multiplicity of their occupations, and in the great number of parties whom they have had before them, they have had only one side of this question before them, and, the other side not appearing at all, they have taken the vague, general statements of these gentlemen, who do not want to part with their profits which they enjoy in Europe toward supporting this Government, for proof that there would be a great injury, a wrong to them, if this duty be enhanced.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to say, in justice to the committee, they have not taken any such foolish course. They do not take things for granted. There has been no matter that has come before the committee, whether one side or the other, but they have taken special pains to examine closely into the subject and see the true ground of the statements made, and arrive at a conclusion satisfactory to our own minds. We do not do our business in the committee in the way the Senator supposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not say the committee took anything for granted; I said that the committee evidently acted upon vague representations rather than upon data, because I invite either of my friends on that committee now to tell this Senate if they can what is the invoice cost of Carrara marble, not the statutory, but the other marble, that is imported into the city of New York. I wish to know what the data they had before them were upon which it was made manifest to them that these Italians are going to be ruined if they pay a dollar a cubic foot and diminish their profits.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say to the Senator that there was a printed memorial submitted to the committee (I supposed when he commenced the discussion that I had it in my drawer, but I am not able to lay my hand on it now); there was an elaborate memorial that contained all the figures necessary to make it appear that those persons would be ruined in case this tariff was imposed. As to their being Italians, I can only say they speak the English language and appeared to be Americans.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no doubt that they had a printed memorial, and that was the evidence upon which the committee appear to have proceeded—the statistics in this printed memorial, which is not now forthcoming. I venture to say that if my friend from Oregon, whose reputation as a good lawyer is very high, and justly, had cross-examined one of those gentlemen a little, and had asked him definitely what was the invoice price, the sworn invoice price, of these marbles in the city of New York, and then had asked him what was the price the same men got for the same marble in the city of New York, he would have found that where the invoice price may have been a little above two dollars, including all costs and charges and everything, as I have stated, the price that the dealer got for his marble exceeded five dollars. Therefore, if he had spent a little of his skill in cross-examining that man he would have demonstrated that he ought to share with the Government a little more of the enormous profits he was making. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 13, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Creswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Fogg, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Hendricks, Poland, Sprague, Wade, and Willey—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Grimes, Henderson, Lane, Morgan, Norton, Patterson, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Williams, and Wilson—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cragin, Foster, Guthrie, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Saulsbury, and Yates—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty" in line nine, page 22; so as to read:

"On Russia, Manila, Italian, and all other hemp, unmanufactured, fifty dollars per ton."

Mr. President, I take it for granted that this is a measure both for revenue and for protection of American industry. If it be so, the advantages and the burdens of the bill ought to bear as equally upon the great interests in the country as practicable, according to the particular condition of those great interests and their necessity for protection and their ability to bear taxation. I have not made the calculation myself, but a friend of mine, who is very judicious and accurate, has, and he informs me that the average rate of protection secured by this bill will amount to something like seventy-five per cent.—not less than seventy-five per cent. The amendment which I have proposed bears upon the Russia, Manila, Italian, and all other hems unmanufactured, and proposes to increase the duty from twenty-five dollars to fifty dollars per ton.

These hems are not discriminated among by the provision in the bill. We all know though, or at least persons familiar with the subject of hemp know, that by being hackled or dressed its value is greatly increased. Hemp may be produced by all the northwestern States of the United States as extensively as by Kentucky and Missouri. There is no State in the Northwest, from its climate and soil, but what is well calculated for the production of hemp and flax. The capacity of our country to produce this article is adequate to the demands of the whole world. The Kentucky and Missouri hemp at present average from two hundred and forty to two hundred and seventy-five dollars per ton. The duty imposed by this bill upon hemp amounts to about ten per cent. average, while the average duty upon the articles protected by the bill is at least seventy-five per cent. The duty upon this important article of hemp, for the production of which the capacity of the country is without limit, is only ten per cent. My proposition is simply to double the protection, which would be equivalent to a rate of about twenty per cent. on the cost of the foreign article. If the hemp-growing regions of the country and the hemp-growers of the country are to receive anything like an equal and pro rata protection the rate imposed by the clause under consideration is surely greatly inadequate.

Gentlemen who are interested in this bill, and the interests of whose country and constituents are protected by it, must consent to make the bill to some extent reciprocal. Something like the same protection, approaching it at least, which they receive, they must be willing to concede to others, or else they cannot expect the support of those Senators the interests of whose constituents they are unwilling to have protected to anything like the same degree that theirs are. I therefore hope that as the increased protection which I propose is so moderate and does not approximate anything like the average pro rata protection of the bill generally, the Senate will adopt my amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The idea which prevailed with the committee in establishing these duties can be very readily stated. This item is left where it was before. It has not been changed. We thought the true way to encourage the growing was to increase the manufacture as much as possible, and the bill was framed with a view to that. The commissioner states the facts he ascertained by an examination of the evidence on the subject:

"An inquiry respecting the development and condition of the flax-manufacturing industry of the United States instituted by the commissioner has clearly established the following points: first, that the revival of the flax culture for lint followed, and did not precede, the establishment of flax manufactories; and secondly, that an increased price and an increased demand for flax has been almost coextensive with the extension of establishments for its manufacture. Prior to 1856 the best water to 'dew-rot' flax raised in New York or New Jersey could readily be purchased for seven or ten cents per pound; the same article now commands a ready sale at from twenty to twenty-five cents per pound."

The increase in price for American hemp is even more striking. Thus, the average price of hemp from 1840 to 1850 ranged from eighty to one hundred dollars per ton; but with the establishment of manufactures for its consumption the price has gradually advanced, until it now commands from three hundred to three hundred and fifty dollars per ton.

But notwithstanding the advance during the last ten years in the price of flax and of hemp the quantity produced has never been sufficient to meet the demands of the American manufacturer; neither has it been possible within the last ten years to purchase, at any one time, any considerable amount of domestic flax in open market. The fiber of American flax is in the main adapted only for the production of the coarser yarns and fabrics; a result which follows necessarily from the conditions of its culture."

It is shown, then, that under the existing rates of duty, which were lower before 1864, I believe, than they are now, the price of American hemp has increased very largely, rising from eighty or one hundred dollars a ton to three hundred or three hundred and fifty; and the increased price is owing to the increase of manufactures. Now, is it advisable, in view of that increase, to put so heavy a duty as the Senator proposes when the American hemp is not sufficient to supply the market? If you check the manufacture of the finer articles that are manufactured from it, will you not be likely to injure the increase of the growth of hemp? The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] suggests that the production has fallen off on account of the unsettled condition of Kentucky and Missouri; but there is a very great demand for all they can raise at large prices, and they cannot supply the demand, no matter what it is owing to.

Mr. GRIMES. That is only just at this moment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But there is a demand for all they can raise, and if we undertake to check the manufacture by imposing a high duty the result will be a falling off in the price of the article. Now, while I am perfectly willing to put upon hemp any duty that it is demonstrated ought to go on to it for the protection of the grower and to have it raised in this country I do not think it advisable to place so large a duty as is here proposed.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, perhaps it would be improper in me to advocate any increase of duties whatever on the bill now pending, for the reason that I think the duties are high enough generally; but if there is to be an increase at all, I cannot see why there should not be an increase on this article. The chairman of the Finance Committee labors under some mistake in reference to the gradual rise in the price of hemp. Hemp in March, 1865, if I remember aright, could have been purchased in the western markets at from one hundred and forty-five to one hundred and fifty-five dollars per ton. Pressed hemp is now worth from three hundred to three hundred and ten dollars; and the tow of hemp is worth perhaps as much in the market at St. Louis or Cincinnati to-day as the finest article of hemp undressed in March, 1865; but if the Senator intends by his remarks to leave the impression that this increase of price is in consequence of the manufacture of the article in this country he is sadly mistaken. The manufacture of hemp in this country has not increased much, if at all, since 1865, in the sense used by the Senator. The price has been controlled by the demand. During the war hemp ruled very low. In this respect it differed from most raw materials. During the same time the manufactures of hemp ruled, and for the same cause. While the demand for cotton and woolen fabrics was great, the demand for the hemp product was light.

The very fact that gave us cheap cotton tended to advance the price of hemp. At the close of the war there was a large quantity of cotton in the southern States that had to be baled, and all efforts to procure a substitute for baling cotton having proved unavailing, when the rebellion closed the article of hemp had a demand. It was needed for the bagging and rope necessary to bale the cotton of the southern States. I am satisfied that this temporary demand which has put up the price of hemp will very soon materially fall off. I do not look to a very large cotton crop in the southern States this year under the system it now seems likely we shall adopt. My impression is that there will be a very small growth of cotton, and I think the facts will demonstrate it when the autumn of the present year shall have arrived. I believe the House bill proposes a duty of forty-five dollars a ton on Manila hemp.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, they made no change in that duty. Forty-five dollars a ton was put on unmanufactured flax and hackled flax. The commissioner proposed twenty dollars, and we put it at twenty-five dollars, where it was before. The House proposed no change.

Mr. HENDERSON. On that point I am mistaken. But if the Senator's argument is correct, that the only way to protect the raw material is to build up manufactures whereby there will be a demand created for the raw material, I would suggest that that plan be adopted in regard to wool and all other materials.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator misunderstands me. I said that was not the policy of the bill, but its policy was to put on a sufficient protection to encourage the working of the raw material. I said that while that is done the true protection is to build up manufactures to use the article—make a demand for the article, in other words. I do not reject the idea, the Senate does not reject the idea, of protecting raw materials.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think, then, we should have something like equality of taxation. I was about to remark that on manufactures in this bill there is a tax of from sixty to one hundred and thirty per cent. ad valorem, and on the raw material the tax is generally quite small. The great disproportion in rates is perhaps subject to criticism. The disproportion in this very article is too great. The Senator knows perfectly well that the increase upon many articles of manufacture is large in this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Upon some, and upon others not.

Mr. HENDERSON. It will make perhaps an average increase of not less than from twenty to twenty-five per cent. on the gross amount of importations that may be made under it. The precise increase cannot, of course, be known without actual test or trial. But while I am up I desire to express the wish that the distinguished Senator from Maine will consent very soon, at least after he shall have perfected the bill according to his notions and the wishes of the Committee on Finance, to postpone it for at least a week or ten days, until we can ascertain what the House of Representatives will do and what we ourselves intend to do upon the internal revenue policy.

Mr. SHERMAN. The House is waiting for our action on this bill to determine what they will do on that question.

Mr. HENDERSON. It seems to me strange that the House will wait for the Senate to act upon the tariff bill. I have been here for four or five years and I have been called on every year to vote for an increase of excise duties to provide the needed revenue for the Government, and immediately after voting that increase I have been called upon by the distinguished Senator from Maine and his committee to vote for advanced tariff rates to protect the manufacturer or producer against the consequences of such increase and save him from inevitable ruinous competition, and I have generally obeyed the summons and so voted. At the last session of Congress, however, a moment of relief came to my mind. The war was over. Gold had declined so as to inspire hopes of early resumption. The Government expenditures, which during the war had reached an almost fabulous sum, began now to assume more familiar proportions. The moment had arrived, in my judgment, to reduce taxation in every form. Business had groaned under its burdens for four years. The only thing that had been left to business was hope.

The crushing weight of taxation had been borne by a patriotic people in the midst of a great war because it was a duty, and they did not ask to put aside any duty. But so soon as the terrible necessity should pass away they had a right to expect and did expect relief. They expected the crushing, duplicated burdens of internal taxation to be removed, as far as could be done consistent with the public faith and the ordinary operations of the Government under a most prudent and economical administration of its several departments.

The House at the last session partially responded to that demand. The Senate promptly concurred in the bill to reduce excise duties. It was a great measure of relief even as it passed, but it should have gone further in the same direction. The taxes should have been further reduced. We do not need to extort $300,000,000 annually from the oppressed domestic industry of the country. The internal revenue law, even with this reduction, yields more money than is needed, unless we have resolved to pay off immediately the public debt.

But when this reduction had been made I had supposed that the exorbitant duties made necessary, as I had been told, by the collection of internal taxes could be reduced also; at least I did not suppose that the arguments enforced against me for four years would now in a moment be reversed, and that reduced excises must be followed by higher customs duties. But such was the fact. The tariff bill sent to us the last session proposed an advance on previous rates of not less than forty to sixty per cent. The Senate postponed its consideration until this session, and we are now considering a measure increasing existing rates, not fifty per cent., but from twenty to thirty per cent. While we thus debate the measure here, and day by day add to the rates proposed even by the committee, because of the local demands here and there—coal in Maryland, hoes in Connecticut, zinc in New Jersey, asphaltum and Albertite in West Virginia, copper and salt in Michigan, marble in Vermont, and now hemp in Kentucky and Missouri, (and this last is perhaps the most reasonable demand yet made)—we but add, in my judgment, aggravation to the evils under which the country complains. The evil, it occurs to me, is inflated prices, the cost of living. The business of the country is, as it were, on stilts, and therefore unstable and constantly struggling to preserve its equilibrium. This measure proposes to lengthen the stilts, to increase prices, to add to the expenses of the operative, making it necessary for increased wages without benefit to the laborer. The true remedy seems to be in another direction: to reduce internal taxes would seem to be the proper remedy. But now when I ask the postponement of this measure, to consider first domestic duties and then adjust the tariff accordingly, as we have heretofore done, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] tells me that the House is waiting for us to pass this, the tariff law, before they act on the question that naturally should precede our action.

Mr. President, I may not again trouble the Senate on this tariff measure, and while on my feet I wish to suggest to Senators having charge of it that the country will ask for what purpose it is pressed forward. Is it a revenue measure, as intimated by the Senator from Ohio, or is it intended, as intimated by some others, to inaugurate a policy of total exclusion of all traffic with foreign nations? If it be designed as a revenue measure, it may be well to inquire, first, what amount of revenue we need, and second, whether the pending measure is better calculated to accomplish the end than the existing law.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says we must have during the present year $140,000,000 of gold to meet interest on the public debt, and other accruing demands of about sixteen millions, that need to be paid in gold. We all know the amount of our public debt, and it is easy to ascertain the amount of interest required to be paid from year to year. The amount cannot exceed from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and thirty millions in gold at the outside—say one hundred and twenty-five millions. The Senator informed us that the present law would not furnish the needed amount. We may best judge of the future by examining the past. The Senator told us that the duties would fall off, but if he gave any reason for the statement I am not aware of it.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, the present tariff yielded a revenue of $179,046,651 58, which is $39,000,000 more, according to his own estimate, than will be needed by the Government. For the first three months of the present fiscal year ending September 30, 1866, the tariff yielded $50,843,744 24. Should the same average yield continue the amount received for the year will be upward of two hundred and three millions. But lest it be said that this argument is unfair I present the receipts for the first five months of the fiscal year ending December 1, 1866, from which it will appear that the tariff yielded $78,843,774 26. It will be seen that proportionate receipts for the remaining seven months will give for the year $189,225,058 20. But if the Senator says that the laws of trade are such as to prevent a proportionate increase for the remaining seven months, I answer that the first six months of the last fiscal year, under the present law, the customs receipts were $86,225,921 42, and for the remaining six months corresponding with the time yet to elapse of the present fiscal year our receipts were $92,820,730 16, giving an advantage to the latter half of the fiscal year of $6,500,000. I therefore conclude that, if revenue be the object, the present tariff will yield from forty to fifty millions more than is necessary for all the demands of the Government. It is certain that the present law will accomplish all that the Senator desires. He founded his argument in favor of the proposed measure upon the supposition that it will yield a larger revenue. I now ask him, if such is to be the result, whether that fact of itself is not a sufficient objection to the bill. He only wants gold enough to pay the interest on the national debt. To be consistent he must oppose any law that pays more, for his object, like mine, is to relieve the country from taxation. Others, however, may say (the Senator from Ohio does not) that the purpose is to obtain as large a revenue upon a smaller aggregate importation of goods.

This is perhaps what may be termed the principle of protection. Clearly this bill is not a revenue measure; it must be put on other grounds. From 1842 to 1846 a tariff of thirty-three per cent. was supposed to be almost prohibitive in its character, and was supplanted by the lower tariff of 1846, which, with an average duty of twenty-four and a half per cent., continued for ten years, bringing unexampled prosperity to every department of business, no less to the manufacturer than to the agriculturist. May 3, 1857, a further reduction of aggregate duties took place; and for four years, under a tariff of twenty and a quarter per cent., we enjoyed the highest degree of prosperity. During the year 1860 the cotton manufacturers of this country exported nearly $10,000,000 worth of cotton fabrics; in 1861 they exported nearly $7,000,000, while in 1866 they exported barely $1,000,000 worth. In the two years of 1860 and 1861 the copper and brass manufacturers exported near $4,000,000 worth, and in 1866 only $110,208. In the year 1860 the manufacturers of tobacco exported $3,372,074 worth of tobacco; in 1866 they exported $1,794,688. In 1860 the manufacturers of wood exported $2,703,095 worth of wares, and in 1866 $720,625. In reference to the effect on other industrial interests I submit an extract from the very able report of Mr. Wells, the special commissioner of the revenue:

"Ten years ago the American manufacturer supplied, to a considerable extent, fur hats to the Mexican, Cuban, and South American markets; to-day he supplies comparatively none. Why? Because the duty on foreign fur, the raw material of his manufacture, has prevented the American from competing with the foreign producer. Thirty years ago the manufacture of broadcloth constituted from fifty to sixty per cent. of the whole woollen business of the United States; now, it is not probably in excess of five per cent. Why? Because American legislation has not permitted the importation of broadcloth wools, and the American agriculturists have produced nothing to take their place, and never will until the successful establishment of the broadcloth industry in the United States has created a constant home demand for 'broadcloth' wools."

As to the effect of this new order of protective policy upon the commercial interests of the country I submit the following extract from the same report:

"A reference to the official returns shows the amount of American registered tonnage engaged in foreign trade in 1865 and 1863 to have been but one million and a half tons (1,492,924) as compared with two and a half million tons (2,546,237) in 1859 and 1860; which, allowing for the difference between the old and new measurements, indicates a decrease in five years of over fifty per cent. In 1853 the tonnage of the United States was about fifteen per cent. in excess of that of Great Britain, while at the present time it is estimated at thirty-three per cent. less. "An examination of the official returns of the coastwise and inland commerce, allowance being made for the difference of measurement, also shows a decrease in this branch of about twelve per cent. It should, however, be stated, that a part of this reduction is probably due to the substitution of steamers for sailing vessels.

Out of one hundred and ninety-one American vessels engaged in the Brazilian or South American trade in 1861 and 1862 but thirty are reported as remaining; while the number of foreign vessels engaged in the same trade has during the same time increased nearly threefold."

From these facts it might be inferred that the manufacturers themselves would cease to clamor for additional protection. If they prospered under a tariff of twenty per cent. it may well be asked why they complain with the present tariff, which gives them an average protection of fifty per cent. in coin. In this there is nothing strange. It might be asked why the inebriate, whose frame has been shattered by draughts from the intoxicating bowl, yet thirsts for that which has well-nigh destroyed him. Simply because he gets temporary relief. He who has a large stock of manufactured goods, or even of raw materials, on hand is always benefited by the imposition of increased duties. The yard of woollen goods now worth a dollar, with an increased duty of fifty per cent. is of course worth $1.50. Unless this be the case the whole idea of protection is utterly false and chimerical. But business, like water, soon seeks its level. The commercial and trading world is like the spider's web: touch it at one point and it trembles along the whole line.

You may temporarily legislate money from one man's pocket into another's; but as organic laws struggle against dissolution and death, so the laws of business intercourse struggle against injustice and wrong, which work its destruction. The effect of increased duties, so far as it concerns stocks of goods on hand, is to take from the pockets of the consumer and put it into those of the manufacturer, the importing merchant, and the jobber who may be fortunate enough to hold the articles affected at the moment the law is passed. But in a short time all departments of business and all classes of men begin to adapt themselves to the new order of things. To the extent of the increased tariff there is an increase of prices. To the extent that the prices of living are increased the prices of labor must be also increased, otherwise the laborer is fleeced by the operation. As there is no real wealth without labor, and as it is the essential element in the development of all material results in man's progress, whatever affects the price of labor affects also the value of every article which labor produces. If the prices of clothing are increased the wages of the operative must be advanced in the same ratio, that he may clothe himself and his family. If the farmer pays more for his axes, hoes, and trace-chains, his plows, his mowers and reapers, he expects to be reimbursed in the sale of his agricultural products. If this be not so, than all tariff laws are but legalized plunder. Indeed, those who ask for protection expect its realization in enhanced prices, and insist that the increase will be felt in every department of industry. If this argument be correct, it will be seen that what is called protection soon loses its force beyond the temporary benefits that I have already named. There is no general result except an enhancement of prices. It is apparent, then, that the first great object to be attained is uniformity in legislation. You cannot change the law of taxation without benefiting somebody, and to that very extent somebody else is injured. Change deranges the laws of trade, produces failures, destroys public confidence, and more than all decreases the citizen's respect for his Government. Not only then, the general interests of the public, but the higher claims of justice and fair dealing to each individual demand uniformity in our legislation on these delicate questions of taxation.

Another objection to an increase of the present exorbitant rates consists in the fact that when duties are so high, the slightest deviation from a rule of perfect equality is well calculated to prostrate one interest entirely, thereby destroying perhaps an important element of national wealth and individual industry while another is unduly stimulated. In this way one section of our country may even unwittingly be made to prosper while another is oppressed. Even our errors may work ruin before the cause of decay is developed and the remedy can be applied. Another objection exists which the honest manufacturer will recognize at once. It applies to all unreasonable taxes, whether excise or impost. We now have an excise tax of two dollars per gallon on whisky. It costs from twenty to thirty cents per gallon to manufacture it. Its chief cost is found in the tax. The inducements to fraud are so great that our citizens, like the Irish people, begin to burrow in the earth to make it. To such an extent is it now produced in fraud of the revenue that it can be and is purchased, I learn, in open market in New York city at from $1.60 to $1.80 per gallon with the Government brand of "tax paid." This is not exceptional, but the rule. How can the honest producer live? It is stated by the gentleman whom we appointed to investigate matters connected with this subject that propositions are made to importers to lay down stocks of dry goods in New York at twenty per cent. on the prime cost in Europe. With an impost tax of one hundred per cent. he who buys of the smuggler instead of the honest importer $100,000 worth of goods makes $80,000 clear by the transaction.

These temptations will not be resisted. The country will be filled with non-tax-paying commodities, commercial centers will reek with fraud and corruption, and the honest merchant and the tax-paying manufacturer has to choose between loss of business and loss of integrity. No doubt many will consent to lose their business and sacrifice capital invested. These will be conscientious men whom self-interest cannot tempt. But are all men beyond its reach? Unfortunately our legislation cannot yet be based on any such idea.

But, Mr. President, my chief objection to this measure is that it induces the necessity for continuing our present rates of internal taxation. It is evidently framed for that purpose. To decrease the excise taxes after the passage of this measure will in many respects aggravate present evils. To prescribe for a disease the physician must understand its character. To give palliatives may extend present relief, too often to be followed by increased violence of pain. It is best to remove the cause of disease. When that is done the patient necessarily recovers. The wise statesman must adopt the same rule. When national complaints are brought before him he should examine carefully the symptoms in order to ascertain their origin and cause. He will not indulge in temporary expedients, but proceed at once to strike at the root of the disease.

What are the complaints in this case? Our manufacturers tell us that they are oppressed by the excise taxes added to the high price of American labor to such an extent that the cheaper labor of Europe can undersell them in our own markets, even after paying our present high rates of duty.

In other words, the European manufacturer can sell his products for one half of the cost of the American product. In the first place, is this so? If it be so, what is the cause of it? The present price of gold in our market furnishes no solution of this difficulty. If gold were worth 200 instead of 134 I could readily perceive that the price of the American manufacture should be nominally double that of the European at their respective places of production. But it should be remembered that when the American importer comes to pay for the foreign article he must pay for it in gold or its equivalent. Hence if gold is worth 200 in currency, he must use two dollars for one in the payment. That it seems would put the foreign and domestic manufacturer upon an equal footing. It is true the one paid for his materials and labor in gold and hence used only one half of the amount used by the other, but the intrinsic value of each should be the same. If it be said that the European operative receives but a dollar per day, while the American operative receives two, it is to be presumed that the one dollar purchases as much food and raiment for the European mechanic as the two dollars purchase for the American mechanic. But as gold is only worth thirty-four per cent. premium, labor and materials entering into the American fabric should cost the American manufacturer only thirty-four per cent. more than they cost the European manufacturer.

If they cost him more than thirty-four per cent. advance there are causes for it peculiar to our own country, causes which do not operate in Europe. To the extent of that increased cost, over thirty-four per cent. on the European cost, the American producer has a right to ask for protection until that state of things shall cease to exist. Now, we know that the American manufacturer does pay more than thirty-four per cent. advance upon European prices, and hence he has heretofore demanded, and not only demanded but received, a tariff protection of fifty per cent. in coin, which would make a currency protection of about sixty-seven per cent., which being added to the thirty-four per cent. makes about one hundred per cent., which he can afford to pay in currency for material and labor more than the European manufacturer pays, and yet successfully compete with him in the sale of his products. With this view of the subject it will be seen that every advance in the price of gold operates as a protection to the American manufacturer, because it advances the rate of exchange, with which the foreign payment is to be met. Every decline, therefore, in the price of gold is tantamount to a reduction pro rata of the tariff. Hence, with a vacillating gold market, the manufacturer cannot thrive; he wants permanency and stability in the standard of value. The American importer may take advantage of a heavy decline in the gold market, and purchase large stocks of goods with the certainty of a future advance of gold. Not so with the manufacturer, and especially with him who uses American material. Neither the raw material nor labor invariably follow the fluctuations of gold. Gold is sensitive; it moves like quicksilver in the midst of more sluggish metals.

It should cease to be a commodity of purchase and sale, but should again take its place as the standard of value. If we intend to maintain commercial relations with the civilized nations of the world we must have their standard of value. The old adage again enforces its truth upon us, that "being in Rome we must yield to the customs of Rome." We cannot compel other nations to take our paper money, and so long as we retain it as the standard of value among ourselves we are setting up a new policy in the commercial world, and have constantly to struggle against established laws of trade. So long as we maintain commercial relations with them gold retains its value here, subject to local influences. It will continue to be bought and sold in our markets. Its fluctuations may and perhaps will depend upon our own legislation, upon our errors in politics and in business. A mere rumor will put it up and put it down. Its fluctuations cannot injure people abroad, but they do injure ourselves. The disease, I take it, then, consists, partially anyhow, in the fact that there is a difference in the nominal value of our paper money and gold. Until that difference is removed it is idle to talk about protecting American industry. Such a thing might be if our ports were closed against the world; but without it perfect protection cannot exist. No possible rate of duty will be sufficient.

Our bank-note circulation at present, including compound-interest notes and excluding certificates of deposit, amounts to-day to more than nine hundred million dollars. The entire trade and commercial business of Great Britain, perhaps double our own, are conducted with less than one hundred and ninety million dollars of paper money. At no period of our own history had bank issues in the United States previous to 1860 exceeded $215,000,000. The business of 1859 and 1860, two of the most prosperous years in American history, was safely and expeditiously carried on with a paper circulation of less than two hundred and eight millions. To me it is not at all strange that, with an inflated currency of at least three times as much as the country needs, all species of property maintain their present exorbitant nominal values. Gold is the cheapest article in the market. It is made cheap by the desperate exertions of our Government to commence the payment of the public debt. Everybody talks of speedy resumption; the Government extorts from an oppressed industry at least $500,000,000 annually, not because it is needed, but with the apparent view of hoarding coin sufficient to resume specie payments by a simple proclamation of the fact. Gold, with its sensitive nature, feels the general inclination in that direction, and seeks to take its proper place in advance of other articles. With the present policy enforced by legislation, however, gold will not only be sensitive, but sensible enough to take a different position.

The thing now most needed is to relieve industry. The heavy hand of the tax-gatherer should be removed from the productive industries of the country. The manufacturer cannot extend his business, because he cannot afford to buy the machinery necessary to do so.

His profits largely go into the Federal Treasury. If he has any remaining after the payment of excise duties he hesitates to purchase machinery at the present exorbitant rates for fear that his neighbor may in a few years purchase similar machinery for half the money. The machinist cannot furnish machinery for any less price, because of the duties on iron and steel and the high price of skilled labor. The farmer cannot afford to sell his products any cheaper, because of the high prices entering into their growth and transportation to market, and because, further, the tax-gatherer stands ready to receive the Government's share of his income.

The proposition now under consideration instead of relieving industry adds to its burdens. The evil, I have said, is inflation. What ever tends to continue this state of affairs or to make inflation a necessary condition of trade in the future necessarily aggravates the evil. If the present prices are maintained it requires an inflated currency to do the business of the country. If prices are reduced a less volume of currency is needed. As that volume is lessened, so we advance to the realization of specie payments. Until that volume is reduced specie payment is a myth, a thing to be talked of by visionaries, but not by practical men. The immediate as well as permanent effect of the passage of this bill will be to increase prices, making a continuance of inflated currency an absolute necessity. After its adoption and the consequent inflation of prices gold will rise. But men will not cease to hope still for specie payments. Having mistaken the true remedy is no reason the patient should not be further dosed. The same old treatment will be resorted to—Sangrado's bleeding and hot water.

We shall be urged still to continue the present rates of internal taxation for the purpose of paying the public debt, and thereby sustaining the public credit. In order to force our depreciated Government paper to par we must make the Government rich. To make the Government rich we must make the people poor. This policy will fail as it has already failed. This bill, I repeat, looks to increased taxation. The people of the United States are to-day the most heavily taxed people on earth. The national debt of Great Britain is nearly double our own in amount. The value of real and personal property in Great Britain is nearly twice that of ours. The amount of taxes paid by the English people in 1864-65 was $354,131,000. The amount of taxes paid by the people of the United States in 1865-66 was $561,572,266, currency value. Our people pay annually an average of $11 46 per head in gold, while the people of Great Britain, with double our wealth and means of payment, pay $10 92.

Our true policy, in my judgment, is to postpone the payment of the principal of the public debt until business shall have recovered from the effects of a long and exhausting war; until the cotton and sugar plantations of the South shall be again cultivated, and until our natural laws of progress in population and wealth shall make the payment of the debt comparatively easy. Real and personal property in the United States increased in value from 1840 to 1850 sixty-four per cent.; from 1850 to 1860 the increase in value was one hundred and twenty-nine and seven-tenths per cent.; from 1860 to 1870, had war not intervened, the same rate of increase would have been near two hundred and sixty per cent. We may well postpone, for at least ten years yet the payment of a debt which can be fully liquidated in the course of ten or fifteen years after we commence the work, without retarding the development of a single interest, and without oppression of a single individual. If we pay the interest of the debt and keep our people rich we shall maintain our credit and have a fund in the wealth of the people upon which we can at any time check for the payment of our national obligations.

If my views be correct on the policy of taxation, it only remains now to inquire what amount of revenue will likely be required to meet the expenditures of the Government. Again we must look to the past. The disbursements for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, as reported by the Secretary of the Treasury, are as follows:

For civil service.....	$41,056,961 54
For pensions of Indians.....	18,852,416 91
For War Department.....	284,449,701 82
For Navy Department.....	43,324,118 52
For interest on debt.....	133,067,741 69
Total.....	$520,750,940 48

In the items above it will be observed that the expenses of the War Department constituted largely more than one-half the entire disbursements. That Department cannot now cost more than say $55,000,000 annually. The Army is reduced to about the peace establishment, and if peace continues we shall have time to look after and cut off extravagance in the administration of every Department.

Let us take the expenditures of the first quarter of the present fiscal year. We were then approaching still nearer the normal condition of things. It embraces the period from June 30 to September 30, 1866:

For civil service.....	$11,893,736 44
For pensions of Indians.....	11,787,975 66
For War Department.....	13,833,214 03
For Navy Department.....	7,878,609 17
For interest.....	33,865,399 99
Total.....	$79,258,935 29

If the expenditure of the three remaining quarters shall correspond with this, the entire expense for the present fiscal year, including interest on public debt, will be $317,035,741 16.

With proper economy, this amount may be greatly reduced. Putting the interest on the public debt even at the estimate of the Senator from Ohio, at $140,000,000, it would leave $177,035,741 16 to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government. Taking several years preceding the war, the following table will give the ordinary expenses of the Government:

1857.....	65,032,569 76
1858.....	72,291,119 79
1859.....	65,327,405 72
1860.....	60,010,112 53
1861.....	62,537,171 62

During those years the expenses of the Navy Department averaged about $13,000,000, and the War Department about $21,000,000. I believe no one now estimates our ordinary expenses at more than $180,000,000. I am satisfied that by prudence and economy they ought to be reduced to $150,000,000. But even taking the highest estimates we shall need to meet accruing demands the following sums, namely:

For payment of interest.....	$140,000,000 in coin.
For ordinary expenditures.....	180,000,000 in currency.

I have already shown that the present tariff yielded last year $179,046,651 58, and during the first five months of the present fiscal year it yielded $78,843,774 26, which would give an aggregate for the present fiscal year of over $189,000,000 in coin. But suppose it yields no more than during the last fiscal year, it will be sufficient to pay the interest on the public debt and leave a surplus of $39,000,000 in gold. The following table exhibits the receipts for the last fiscal year:

Customs.....	$179,046,651 58
Public lands.....	665,031 03
Direct tax.....	1,974,754 12
Internal revenue.....	309,226,813 42
Miscellaneous sources.....	67,119,369 91
Total.....	$558,032,620 06

To give an idea of what the present fiscal year will likely produce, I append a table showing the receipts for the fiscal quarter of the present year:

Customs.....	$50,843,744 24
Lands.....	228,399 72
Direct tax.....	340,454 39
Internal revenue.....	99,166,993 98
Miscellaneous.....	7,981,764 24
Total.....	$158,561,386 57

For the first five months of the present fiscal year ending December 1, 1866, the receipts were as follows:

Customs.....	$78,843,774 26
Internal revenue.....	146,355,715 73

If this ratio of receipts be maintained during the year these two items alone will yield to the Government over $540,000,000.

The special commissioner estimates the receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, as follows:

Customs.....	$150,000,000
Internal revenue.....	275,000,000
Other sources.....	80,000,000
Total.....	$455,000,000

This is the lowest estimate made, and the supposed reduction from present receipts is scarcely justified by any facts before us. The commissioner simply means that the receipts cannot fall below this sum.

Now, with these facts before us, I again ask what the necessity of this continued taxation? Our public securities are now at a premium on this side of the ocean, and our people have confidence, and will continue to have confidence, in their ultimate payment. Last year we reduced the principal of our public debt at least $200,000,000, which may have advanced confidence in foreign markets; but our own people are no more certain of their ultimate redemption than they were before. The Secretary of the Treasury complains that so many of our bonds are now owned abroad. This policy of collecting large balances by taxation, to be applied to the payment of the public debt, can have no other effect than to render our own people unable to hold them and force them upon the foreign market. When once sold abroad they constitute the basis of a cheap exchange, and tempt the importer to flood the country with foreign fabrics.

I therefore insist that instead of collecting $800,000,000 from excise taxes we collect about half that amount or enough simply to meet the current expenditures of the Government. There is now a large balance of coin in the Treasury, say $80,000,000, exclusive of deposits, and also a large balance of currency, all of which is dead capital not needed for pressing demands upon the Treasury, and yet we proposed to increase instead of diminishing the burdens of taxation. For the reasons which I have stated I appeal to the chairman of the Finance Committee and his distinguished associates to let this measure be postponed until the House shall have perfected the internal revenue bill and sent it to us. Let us reduce internal taxes, a thing which will relieve every industrial interest and none so surely as the manufacturer himself, and we can then adjust tariff rates so as to wrong no interest, and best subserve the purposes of the Government. If we pass this law and then reduce the excise tax, prices will still be advanced, and that advance will not benefit the Government, but for some time at least will be a mere bonus to the manufacturer.

I did not intend to offer amendments to this bill, but I have indulged the hope at all times that its present consideration would be postponed. If, however, its consideration is to be pressed upon us, there are many inequalities which I conceive to be prejudicial to the interests of my own State, if not to the entire West, which I shall endeavor to remove. This very article of hemp presents one of them. The proposed tax on the article is not exceeding fifteen per cent., while the ruling rates on the majority of articles, and especially those in the older States, are from fifty to one hundred per cent. I discovered that the article of raw hides, produced in the West and consumed in the East, are put at ten per cent. This will not pay transportation over the railroads and is no protection against the European article.

The goat, calf, and deer skins of the West are put at five per cent.; the sole leather of Spain is placed at thirty-five per cent., and the French and German calf-skins at only thirty per cent. Flaxseed is kept at sixteen cents per bushel. Linseed cake at twenty per cent., and flaxseed oil at twenty-three cents per gallon. The manufactures of lead are put at three cents per pound, and butter is reduced from four cents per pound to three. Lithographic stones which abound in my State are placed at twenty per cent., while the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] is dissatisfied with twenty-five per cent., and one dollar per cubic foot in addition upon the marble in his State. I discover also a duty of two dollars per thousand on fencing lumber needed to open up the farms of the West, while the ship-timber, spars, oakum, and adhesive felt, and other articles entering into the construction of ships are entered on the free list; and that is not all. The Senator from Maine discovers that this vicious system of legislation is rapidly destroying the ship-building and commercial interests of his own State. To check this tendency to decay he has provided in the twenty-second section of this bill for a drawback equal in amount to the import duty paid on all iron, lumber, hemp, manila, copper, and cordage used in the construction, rigging, or equipment of sailing or steam vessels of the United States. This is a bounty of not less than twenty per cent. upon the cost of a vessel, but in my judgment the Senator will accomplish nothing by this motion. If this measure passes commerce will languish still. There is now no line of ocean steamers owned by an American company. The Senator from Connecticut says that ship-building has ceased in his own State. The special commissioner tells us that vessels can be built in Canada and New Brunswick for fifty per cent. less than they can be built in the State of Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Nearer one hundred per cent.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why is this? Ships could be built in Maine in 1860; they could be built in Connecticut. If it takes twice the amount to construct a ship in Maine that it does to construct a ship in New Brunswick it must proceed from the high prices of labor. The high prices of labor result from the high prices of commodities which the laborer must have. Does the Senator expect to build ships cheaper when the price of labor has been advanced? I have shown that this bill will advance prices, while the Senator then attempts by drawback to resuscitate a drooping industry he gives his support to a measure which will certainly neutralize the advantage he seeks. Even if this were not so twenty per cent. in the cost of a vessel will not be sufficient. If the Canadians can now build one hundred per cent. cheaper can they not build eighty per cent. cheaper even after this bounty in the name of drawback shall be paid?

Mr. President, as a western man, I would rather to-day that the Government of the United States would take in hand the tobacco and whisky interests of this country and deal it out as they do in France and England, and raise the entire revenue for ordinary expenses from those two articles of western growth and manufacture than to continue this evil system in which we are now engaged. I would positively rather that those two interests should be taken and subjected to the same operation to which they are subjected in England and France. I would rather that the Government would take in hand the whisky distilleries of the West and let the article be manufactured by the Government and sold by none except Government agents; I would rather adopt that system a great deal than to pursue this policy. It would be infinitely better; and I believe the people of the western States, at least my-section of the country, would rather see it done.

I see by the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the revenue collected on whisky in 1863-64, when the excise tax for a large portion of the time was twenty cents per gallon, was $28,000,000, and in the year 1865-66, with a tax of two dollars per gallon, the revenue collected was $29,000,000. I believe as much whisky was manufactured in the latter as in the former; surely the consumption of the article has not in the least diminished. I am satisfied that a revenue of one hundred and fifty to two hundred million dollars could be collected from this source alone without materially increasing the price to the consumer. Much of what has been said in regard to whisky is equally applicable to the article of tobacco. Frauds must be prevented or the honest manufacturer will be driven from business. The espionage necessary to prevent frauds requires Government control tantamount to ownership itself, and it is exceedingly questionable in my mind whether a radical change is not demanded in reference to these two articles.

Then what is the remedy? Let us wait on the House of Representatives, get their bill, reduce the internal revenue; and when we shall have reduced it I undertake to say it will give an impetus to trade and business in this country that we cannot realize by passing this measure. This is not going to help the manufacturers, and my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] had better vote with me to postpone this measure, because I am inclined to think that cotton manufactures will languish and die under its operation, especially if they have to pay three cents per pound on the raw material. Whether the woolen manufactures will fare any better or not I cannot say. But that is a significant fact stated by the Commissioner in his report that they were far more prosperous under low but stable and fixed duties. It seems that not only is our commerce dying, not only are our vessels driven out, not only is our registered tonnage diminishing, but our woolen manufactures are drooping, and it may be soon that the cotton manufactures will feel the blighting influences of this legislation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have attempted already to explain that a mere increase of duty is quite illusory. The law that gives nominal protection, but at the same time advances prices of the raw material, enhances wages, unsettles business, produces a feeling of insecurity, and teaches the people to pray to the Government for help instead of relying on hard work and economy, is an injury to all pursuits and a benefit to none.

Then, Mr. President, without proceeding any further on this subject, I hope that the Finance Committee themselves will adopt a course of policy that will look to the decrease of prices. If we take off these duplicated taxes that fall so heavily upon the manufacturer that $1 50 of duty only furnishes seven cents protection, as demonstrated by the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER,] and let the tariff alone, or adjust it as it may be needed after the adoption of the internal revenue law, it is my opinion that business will prosper; I think that we will give new life to manufactures, to agriculture, and to every other interest.

Why, sir, the utter fallacy of increased duties may be seen from one single article of manufacture. I allude to railroad iron. We have not protected it by increased rates for several years past; and yet the railroad iron manufacturers are more prosperous to-day than the manufacturers of other articles of iron. If not prosperous they are at least not clamorous. Why is it? Because they have contented themselves; they have gone to work, and expect by economizing to make money. They seem to be satisfied with the tariff as it is; but other iron manufacturers are continually increasing, and this tariff is an increase over the last of from twenty-five to forty per cent. The railroad iron manufacturer knows that the western people will not consent to an increase, and he has made up his mind to economize, and to make money according to the ruling prices of everything at present. Contentment is a fortune and the railroad iron man is doubly fortunate.

Now, Mr. President, I hope that the Senator from Maine and the committee will consent to this postponement, because I am quite well satisfied if the committee insist on passing the bill at present this course will not be adopted. Nothing that I can say on the subject will have any influence, I do not know that it ought to have any influence; but if in an awkward and unpremeditated way I have presented some facts that should have consideration I am content.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, this bill has been dragging on for a great while, and we do not seem to be any nearer to the end of it than we were some time ago. For three evenings successively I have been left here without a quorum, and I suppose that state of things is to continue. If the Senate mean to pass this bill, in which the majority of them seem to be so very deeply interested, I think it would be well to adopt a little different system. Now, after we get into the Senate all these amendments can be moved just exactly as well as in Committee of the Whole. The result is, that if we keep moving amendments here and making speeches upon them, it will just double the time and the labor that will be expended. I suggest, therefore, to Senators who have amendments that they desire to move to the bill whether it would not be as well to take the bill into the Senate, and after we have acted in the ordinary form upon those amendments which have been adopted in Committee of the Whole, then every Senator can offer his amendments in the first instance there just as well as in committee, and save us a good deal of time. If that is done I shall be able to accommodate the wishes of Senators who desire to have an executive session this evening. The bill will then be out of committee and we can take it up on Monday, when I hope it may be finished. I suggest this for the purpose of expediting business, and I hope that the Senate will agree to it. After the pending amendment has been disposed of one way or the other, I suggest that the bill be taken out of committee and into the Senate, and I will then yield to the motion to go into executive session; otherwise I shall be obliged to continue. This way of moving amendments twice, once in committee and once in the Senate, is very burdensome and takes up a great deal of time. I believe there is an amendment pending which must first be disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I supposed it was the intention of the Senator from Maine to close this bill to-night, and I think he might just as well do it.

Mr. HENDERSON. That cannot be done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should be very glad to do it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will cheerfully stay here until we close the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But gentlemen would not be willing to stay here after twelve o'clock, as it is Saturday night, and we should then find ourselves still not out of committee with these numerous amendments and all these speeches; and I will say to the Senator that if he had stayed here so as to make a quorum the three last nights, and enabled us to go on with business we should not be in the position we are now.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I stayed here to keep a quorum every evening until yesterday.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And I suppose somebody else stayed every evening but the night before.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And on yesterday evening at half past five o'clock I left. But supposing that the Senator intended to bring the bill to a vote to night, I am prepared now to stay with him.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would have tried very hard last night if the Senator had stayed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And I will now cheerfully go on with the bill until we bring it to a close. I do not suppose there will be very much general debate upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. DAVIS. I will say a word or two on this amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I suggest to the Senator that he can offer his amendment in the Senate when the bill is reported, and make his remarks then.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to allowing the question to be taken on my amendment now, and making the few remarks which I intend to make upon it in the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If it should not be adopted now, the Senator can move it again in the Senate and take the yeas and nays upon it, if he desires to do so at that time.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now let the bill be reported to the Senate, if there be no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRIMES. Now, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the Senator will allow me to make a report, which will take but a moment.

Mr. GRIMES. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

PRESIDENTIAL TERM OF OFFICE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 33) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to limit the tenure of office of the President to one term, have instructed me to report the resolution back to the Senate with an amendment.

Mr. WADE. I wish to give notice to the Senate that I shall avail myself of the first opportunity to call up that resolution and have it acted upon. I hope it will not be debated long, and I do not believe it will be, because the subject has been so long before the public that everybody's mind is made up upon it, and I am anxious it should pass while the State Legislatures are in session that they may adopt it.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. LANE. The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions, having met, after full and free conference have agreed on a report which I now present. They recommend:

That the Senate recede from their first amendment to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out the word "October" and insert "July;" and strike out all after the word "act" in line eleven of the House amendment to the end of said amendment.

That the Senate recede from their second amendment to the amendment of the House, and in lieu thereof agree to insert the words: "and the commissions of all other pension agents now in office shall continue for four years from the passage of this act, unless such agents are sooner removed."

The only important change from the bill as it stood by the action of the Senate, effected by this report is to strike out "October, 1866" and insert "July, 1866," making the last provision go back three months. The other amendment is as to the power of the President to remove these officers at his discretion, providing that the officers shall continue in office for four years unless sooner removed. That is inserted out of abundant caution. We supposed he had the power under existing laws.

Mr. SUMNER. If I understand the operation of this bill now, it vacates certain offices from the 1st of July, 1866.

Mr. LANE. Yes, sir; that is it.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 16) for the relief of Josiah O. Armes;

A bill (S. No. 410) for the relief of Solomon P. Smith;

A bill (S. No. 446) for the relief of George W. Fish; and

A bill (S. No. 511) for the relief of Mrs. Mary E. Finney, widow of First Lieutenant Solon H. Finney, late of the sixth regiment Michigan cavalry.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following Senate bills, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 454) for the relief of the widow of Jacob Harmon;

A bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of the widow of Henry Frye; and

A bill (S. No. 476) for the relief of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw, deceased.

The message further announced that the House had receded from its amendment to the bill (S. No. 253) to incorporate the "First Congregational Society of Washington."

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 380) to incorporate the Washington County Horse Railroad Company in the District of Columbia.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1051) for the relief of Henry P. Blanchard;

A bill (H. R. No. 1052) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Clements;

A bill (H. R. No. 1053) granting an increased pension to John J. Sohan;

A bill (H. R. No. 1054) for the relief of Hiram Hedrick;

A bill (H. R. No. 1050) for the relief of John Moreau, of Machias, New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 1056) for the relief of Lemuel Worster;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 246) for the relief of Townsend Harris; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 247) for the relief of James Keenan.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. No. 112) for the relief of Mrs. Abby Green; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

WIDOW OF JACOB HARMON.

Mr. PATTERSON. The House of Representatives have just returned to us three little pension bills, with some verbal amendments, inserting the Christian names of the parties; and I hope the Senate will indulge me in acting upon those amendments at once. It will take but a moment to dispose of them. I will first move to take up Senate bill No. 454, for the relief of the widow of Jacob Harmon.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House to the bill. The amendments were in lines four and five to strike out the words "Mrs. Jacob Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee," and to insert "Matilda Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon," and also to amend the title of the bill so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Matilda Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon."

The amendments were concurred in.

WIDOW OF HENRY FRYE.

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of the widow of Henry Fry. The amendments were in line four to strike out the words "Mrs. Henry Fry," and insert "Barbury Frye, widow of Henry Frye," and also to amend the title of the bill so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Barbury Frye, widow of Henry Frye."

The amendments were concurred in.

CHILDREN OF JACOB M. HINSHAW.

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 476) for the relief of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw, deceased. The amendment was to strike out all of the bill after the word "roll" on the seventh line, and to insert in lieu thereof "subject to the privileges and limitations of the pension laws in regard to orphan children, and to commence on the 27th day of November, 1861."

The amendment was concurred in.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. No. 1052) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Clements;

A bill (H. R. No. 1053) granting an increased pension to John J. Sohan;

A bill (H. R. No. 1064) for the relief of Hiram Hedrick;

A bill (H. R. No. 1055) for the relief of John Moreau, of Machias, New York; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1056) for the relief of Lemuel Worster.

The following bill and joint resolutions were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

A bill (H. R. No. 1051) for the relief of Henry P. Blanchard;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 246) for the relief of Townsend Harris; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 247) for the relief of James Keenan.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 26, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

Mr. KOONTZ. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table, for reference to the Committee for the District of Columbia, the bill (S. No. 507) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the extension, construction, and use by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, of a railroad from between Rockville and the Monocacy Junction into and within the District of Columbia,'" approved July 25, 1866.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object; and lest this objection should seem discourteous on my part, I desire to explain the reason of it. This bill contemplates an enterprise of considerable importance to the Government of the United States; and I think it should be passed without delay rather than be referred. I fear that the Committee for the District of Columbia may not be called again for reports during the present session. If the bill remains upon the Speaker's table it may be disposed of at some time when business on the Speaker's table shall be taken up.

MARY BOND.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Invalid Pensions be instructed to inquire into the justice and expediency of granting a pension to Mary Bond, widow of John Bond, deceased, late of the United States Army, who died in the Army service of the United States.

SALES OF CONFISCATED WHISKY.

Mr. DARLING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to suspend the sales of confiscated whisky, unless the price offered is equal to the tax upon the same.

Mr. DARLING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RIVER THAMES, CONNECTICUT.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting an appropriation recommended by the engineer department of the United States, for the dredging and maintaining of the channel of the river Thames, near Norwich, in the State of Connecticut.

BOUNTIES.

Mr. ANCONA, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations, &c.," approved July 28, 1866, giving additional bounties to discharged soldiers in certain cases; which was recommitted and ordered to be printed.

PACKAGE POST.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing, under the charge and direction of the Post Office Department, a package post on the several railway and steamboat mail routes of the United States for the conveyance of parcels of money, merchandise, &c., at such rates of compensation and under such regulations as may be established by law; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

WISCONSIN AND LAKE SUPERIOR RAILROAD.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting lands to the States of Wisconsin and Michigan to aid in the construction of the Wisconsin and Lake Superior railroad; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN PEORIA, ILLINOIS.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to provide for the erection of a building in Peoria, Illinois, for the accommodation of the post office and internal revenue offices; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order during the morning hour is the call of committees for reports of a private character, beginning with the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

GEORGE W. FISH.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back Senate bill No. 446, for the relief of George W. Fish, with a recommendation that the same do pass.

The bill was read at length. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to George W. Fish the sum of $1,825 04 in full pay for consular services as United States consul at Ningpo, China, and for exchange due him.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. CULLOM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TOWNSEND HARRIS.

Mr. RAYMOND, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a joint resolution for the relief of Townsend Harris; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. The preamble sets forth that Townsend Harris, of New York, while holding the office of consul general of the United States at Simoda, Japan, under instructions from the State Department of October, 1856, opened diplomatic negotiations with the Japanese Government, and continued the same until January, 1858, which negotiations resulted in the conclusion of the convention of Simoda and the treaty of Jeddo, which diplomatic services were beyond the sphere of his duties as consul general, and for which he has received no compensation.

The joint resolution directs the payment to Townsend Harris of the sum of $4,645 83, for such services, as compensation from October 1, 1856, until August 18, 1857, at the rate of $9,000 per annum, first deducting therefrom his salary as consul general for the same time; and from August 18, 1857, until January, 1858, inclusive, compensation at the rate of $2,500 per annum, in addition to his salary as consul general as provided by law.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RAYMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES KEENAN.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a joint resolution for the relief of the legal representatives of James Keenan; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury, in the settlement of the accounts of James Keenan, late consul at Hong Kong, China, to pay his legal representatives the amount of exchange to which he would have been entitled had he drawn the several balances due him on the adjustment of his accounts.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAWSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HENRY P. BLANCHARD.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Henry P. Blanchard; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Henry P. Blanchard, for his services as marshal at the port of Canton, in China, from February 22, 1858, to the 1st of July, 1860, the sum of $2,354 24.

The report was read.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MRS. L. HOUTON.

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported adversely upon the application of Mrs. L. Houton for a pension; which was laid upon the table.

ALLEN WILSON.

Mr. PERHAM, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back, with a recommendation that it do not pass, House bill No. 1036, for the relief of Allen Wilson, of Wilson county, Tennessee; and the same was laid upon the table.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

On motion of Mr. PERHAM, the Committee on Invalid Pensions were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of General C. W. Van Wyck, of Orange county, New York, asking that pensions may be increased, and the laws so modified that persons entitled thereto may obtain the same with less delay and perplexity than at present; and the same was laid upon the table.

MRS. LYDIA WINTER.

Mr. PERHAM. I ask that the Committee on Invalid Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Mrs. Lydia Winter for a pension, and that the same be laid upon the table.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I would ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PERHAM] what are the grounds for reporting against this petition.

Mr. PERHAM. The subject of the memorial is embraced in the provisions of a general law.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I think this case of Mrs. Winter is a meritorious one, and I would like to have the committee consider it still further.

Mr. PERHAM. Very well; I will withdraw the report in this case for the present. The report was accordingly withdrawn.

SOLOMON P. SMITH.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, also reported back Senate bill No. 410, for the relief of Solomon P. Smith, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill provides that there shall be paid to Solomon P. Smith, late a captain in the one hundred and fifteenth regiment of New York volunteers, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $260 for his pension from the 14th of January, 1865, when he was mustered out of the service, until the 15th of February, 1866, the date of the filing of his application for a pension with the Commissioner of Pensions.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REUBEN CLOUGH.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, also reported back adversely Senate bill No. 171, for the relief of Reuben Clough, and moved that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM A. HINSHAW AND J. M. HINSHAW.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, also reported back Senate bill No. 476, for the relief of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, of Green county, Tennessee, with the recommendation that it do pass, with an amendment.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the names of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw, of Green county, Tennessee, upon the pension-roll at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence on the 27th of November, 1866, and to continue until they severally obtain sixteen years of age.

The amendment of the committee was to strike out all after the word "roll" in the seventh line, and insert in lieu thereof:

Subject to the privileges and limitations of the pension laws in regard to orphan children, to commence 27th November, 1866.

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PETER ANDERSON.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, also reported back adversely Senate bill No. 79, for the relief of Peter Anderson, and moved that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. BARBARA FRY.

Mr. PERHAM, from the same committee, also reported back Senate bill No. 455, for the relief of the widow of Henry Fry, with amendments.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mrs. Henry Fry upon the pension-roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence the 27th of November, 1861, and to continue during her widowhood.

The committee's amendments were to strike out "Mrs. Henry Fry" and insert "Mrs. Barbara Fry," and to amend the title so as to read, "A bill for the relief of Mrs. Barbara Fry."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the same committee, reported back the following adversely; and the same were laid upon the table.

Petition of William McBryan, of Jay county, Indiana, for a pension.

House bill No. 955, for the relief of John B. Cothran, of Tennessee.

MRS. JANE CLEMENTS.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, from the same committee, reported a bill granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Clements; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mrs. Jane Clements, of the District of Columbia, widow of Ignatius Clements, deceased, upon the pension-roll at the rate of eight dollars per month during her widowhood, to commence on the 1st of August, 1864, the date of her husband's death; and it also provides she shall have the benefits of the second section of the act approved July 25, 1866, in regard to minor children of deceased soldiers, if she shall show, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner on Pensions that she has such minor child or children as will entitle her to the same.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN J. SOHAN.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, from the same committee, also reported a bill granting an increased pension to John J. Sohan; which was read a first and second time.

The bill allows John J. Sohan, in consequence of total blindness resulting from disease contracted in the line of duty as a marine in the United States Navy, a pension of twenty-five dollars per month, to commence 16th August, 1866, and to continue during said disability; and to be in lieu of the pension heretofore allowed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, from the same committee, made an adverse report on House bill No. 870, for the relief of Charles McCarty; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LEFTWICH, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the memorial of George H. Finley for a pension; also on the memorial of Lewis M. Luckett, a soldier during the Mexican war, asking for a pension; also on the petition of James Fregate; which were severally laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

HIRAM HEDRICK.

Mr. LEFTWICH, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Hiram Hedrick; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes the payment of a pension at the rate of twenty-five dollars per month in lieu of the pension now received.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LEFTWICH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. VAN AERNAM, from the same committee, made an adverse report on the petition of J. M. Miller; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Also on the petition of Henry Coleman, late seaman on board the United States steamer McClellan; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MELINDA HARMON.

Mr. VAN AERNAM, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill No. 454, for the relief of the widow of Jacob Harmon, with an amendment.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mrs. Jacob Harmon, of Greene county, Tennessee, on the pension-roll at eight dollars per month, commencing from the 7th of December, 1861, and to continue during her widowhood.

The amendment reported by the committee was to strike out the words "Mrs. Jacob" and insert "Melinda," and to insert the words "widow of Jacob Harmon."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended by striking out the words "the widow of Jacob" and inserting "Melinda."

Mr. VAN AERNAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed and the title amended; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the same committee, made an adverse report on House bill No. 469, for the relief of Rebecca Bower; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAWYER, from the same committee, made an adverse report on House bill No. 163, for the relief of A. W. Fleming; also on the petition of Mary C. Booz, praying for a pension on account of services of her husband; also on the petition of Ellen Hayes, widow of John Hayes; also on the petition of Henry W. Earl, jr., praying for a pension; also on the memorial of Elizabeth W. Stiles for relief; also on the petition of Jackson Squire, asking for a pension, &c.; which were severally laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LEMUEL WORSTER.

Mr. SAWYER also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Lemuel Worster; which was read a first and second time by its title.

The bill was read. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall place the name of Lemuel Worster, of Machias, York county, in the State of Maine, upon the pension-roll, and pay him at the rate of eight dollars per month.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, asked for the reading of the report.

The report was read.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SAWYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MINOR CHILDREN OF SOLOMON LONG.

Mr. SAWYER also, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of the minor children of Solomon Long; which was read a first and second time.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll the names of the minor children of Solomon Long, with the same benefits and subject to the same restrictions as other orphan children of deceased soldiers, the act to take effect in 1865.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. SAWYER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a bill to amend the act to establish a Department of Agriculture; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Agriculture, and ordered to be printed.

SYLVANUS SAWYER.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill for the relief of Sylvanus Sawyer; which was read a first and second time.

The bill authorizes an extension of the patent of Sylvanus Sawyer for the cutting of rattan.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, asked that the evidence in the case be read.

The evidence was read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF THOMAS W. HARVEY.

Mr. BROMWELL, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill extending certain letters-patent for the benefit of the heirs of Thomas W. Harvey; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length. It directs the Commissioner of Patents to receive and consider an application for, and if in his opinion correct and expedient to grant, extensions of the patents for improved machinery for cutting screws and improved machinery for drawing screw-heads, for the benefit of the heirs of Thomas W. Harvey, the inventor and patentee of the same.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROMWELL] if these patents have not been extended once already?

Mr. BROMWELL. They have.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Then I hope they will not be extended again.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will give to those gentlemen who desire to say anything in opposition to this bill the greater part of the time I shall be entitled to, after the previous question shall have been seconded, which I propose to call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROMWELL] that even should the call for the previous question be sustained, a motion to lay the bill on the table would have the priority, and the gentleman might be prevented from saying anything on the bill.

Mr. BROMWELL. Then I will not call the previous question, but will proceed to state briefly the facts in this case. It is true, this inventor has had his patents for twenty-one years. But the nature of the inventions is such that many years must necessarily have elapsed in bringing the business under the patents into such a condition that any emoluments could be derived from them. The expense of setting up that business must have been very great. One machine by itself is of no use, but hundreds of them are necessary in order to enable the manufacturer to fill the commonest order. The inventions are exceedingly ingenious; not the results of a lucky thought, but evidently of long study and experiment. Those inventions have revolutionized the mode of making screws, and have reduced their price. There are many other machines by which wood-screws are made besides the machines covered by these patents. The extensions asked for by this bill relate only to two of a great number of patents, for the purpose of conferring some small benefit upon the widow and heirs of the inventor, Thomas W. Harvey. The inventor spent a large fortune and many years of his life in bringing these inventions to perfection, and when he died he left his family not one cent remuneration for them, for he had received none himself, either from the patents themselves or the money he had invested in putting them into operation.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over to the next Friday morning hour.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (S. R. No. 112) for the relief of Mrs. Abby Green; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on Senate bill No. 69, providing for the payment of pensions.

PETITION PRINTED.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent to present a petition from loyal colored people of North Carolina, and to have it printed.

No objection being made, it was ordered to be printed.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order after the expiration of the morning hour is the consideration of House bill No. 543, to restore to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, upon which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROSS. In view of the magnitude and importance of the legislation proposed by the bill now before us I have thought it my duty to submit a few considerations to the House upon the subject. The objections which I shall present to this bill will be, first, that there is no constitutional power or authority in the Congress of the United States to pass such a measure as this; second, that it is in conflict with the principles and doctrines enunciated by the Republican party during the progress of the war; and third, that if these objections did not exist, it would be unwise and inexpedient to act upon the subject in the manner proposed.

First, then, upon the question of the power and the right of Congress to pass the bill before the House: I hold that the powers of Congress are limited by the Federal Constitution; that while the General Government is supreme and paramount to the extent of the delegated powers, it is equally clear that the powers not conferred upon it are by the express terms of the Constitution reserved to the States and the people thereof respectively. The national Government has supreme authority to the extent of its delegated powers; but those powers are defined in the written Constitution establishing the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I do not recognize the soundness of the doctrines enunciated by the able and distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND], who discussed this question the other day, that we have an unwritten Constitution by which we are to be governed. I am somewhat relieved, however, to find that gentlemen on that side of the House are inclined to thus justify their action. I had felt some apprehension that in our congressional action here we might be trenching upon the Constitution of our country. But when I learned from the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] that all these measures which we suspected to be infringements upon the Constitution are to be passed under the authority of an unwritten Constitution I felt greatly relieved, at least upon that particular point.

I do not recognize any such doctrine. The written Constitution of our country is the guide by which we are to be governed and controlled in our action. I am aware that this is a doctrine which commands but little attention in Congress at the present time. But a few days ago, when a distinguished and able member from the State of Kentucky was discussing a constitutional question, a gentleman near me said, "Why, he must evidently be a new member; if he had been here any length of time he would have learned long since that no attention is paid by this Congress to the Constitution of the United States."

Having said this much upon the constitutional question, I propose briefly to call the attention of the House to what I suppose will be arguments of greater weight with the majority in this House than the Constitution of the country. I submit that this bill is in clear conflict with the action of the party in power during the entire progress of the war; it is in conflict with the clearly-expressed opinions of the Executive of the nation, the Supreme Court, and the Congress of the United States. If I succeed in satisfying the majority in this House that their policy is in conflict with the teachings and principles of the party in power during the last six years, I am satisfied that as honorable men they will refrain from pressing this measure upon the consideration of the House.

The first evidence to which I desire to call the attention of members is the resolution which has been so frequently alluded to in this House, known as the "Crittenden resolution." I do not propose to give the language of the various public acts to which I may refer, because they are not before me; but it is well known that the honorable Speaker who presides over the deliberations of this House, as well as a large number of the gentlemen upon this floor, gave their solemn pledge to the country that they would stand by that Crittenden resolution, which declared in substance that the war was to be waged for the purpose of maintaining the national authority and putting down the rebellion; not for the purpose of subjugation or to overthrow any of the States of this Union, but to guaranty to them their equality and rights within the Union. That resolution, Mr. Speaker, was a national pledge made to the country by the party in power, declaring the purposes and objects for which the war was prosecuted.

The second evidence which I present for the consideration of the House, showing that it was never contemplated by the party in power during the progress of the war that States engaged in the rebellion were out of the Union and not entitled to representation, is the fact that they permitted Senators and Representatives from those States to retain their seats in Congress until the time for which they were elected had expired; and there was no complaint upon that subject from any member of either House. Congress continued during the whole progress of the war to recognize the right of those States that were in rebellion against the national authority to send Senators and Representatives to Congress. The present President of the United States continued to hold his seat as a Senator from Tennessee; a Senator from the State of Virginia continued to represent that State; and there were several other such instances which I do not now recollect. I ask, Mr. Speaker, whether this would have been the fact if it had been contemplated during that time that the war was to sever the bonds of the Union.

The third proposition to which I call the attention of the House is, that in 1862 or 1863, during the progress of the rebellion, Congress passed an act by which they assessed taxes upon the States which were in rebellion. This would certainly never have been done had it not been clearly recognized that those States were within the Union. Now, sir, it could not have been expected that in so brief a period of time you would have abandoned the doctrines for which our fathers fought the battles of the Revolution, and imposed upon eight million people taxation without representation. This could not have been contemplated by the Congress of the United States in the passage of the act apportioning taxation among the States in rebellion.

The fourth proposition to which I propose to call the attention of the House is, that in 1862, if my memory serves me right, Congress passed an act apportioning representation among the several States of this Union; and in that act about fifty members of Congress were assigned to the ten States which now, according to the theory of this bill, are outside of the national Union. Sir, those acts apportioning taxes and representation were concurred in by the two branches of Congress. Nor is this all. They had the approbation of President Lincoln, who signed and approved them. Thus, in addition to the congressional recognition of the right of representation as belonging to those States, there was executive action equally emphatic in the same direction.

The fifth evidence is, that the action of the Supreme Court is against this bill. The order of that court last winter to take up the cases from these States upon the docket and dispose of them is evidence that it does not consider this Union dissevered. The action of Congress assigning circuits to the judges of the Supreme Court is additional evidence of the opinion of Congress on this subject. And, in addition to this, the civil rights bill, giving power to these courts within those States, shows that the action of Congress contemplated these courts were to be in existence to exercise these powers during this time.

The sixth evidence I will offer to the House will be found in the correspondence of our Government with the French Government, in which President Lincoln, through the Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, informs the French Government this was a mere rebellion in this country, and that the seats of the southern members are awaiting their return to be occupied by them. I say this is the opinion, not of the Secretary of State, but of the President of the United States through his chief clerk, the Secretary of State, enunciating the doctrines of the American to the French Government.

In the seventh place I refer to the fact that the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery in this country was submitted for ratification to the States which had been in rebellion as well as to those which had not. Gentlemen cannot avoid the force of this position by saying with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] it was the Secretary of State who published this. He acted under the authority and direction of the Congress of the United States, which determined this measure should be submitted to all these States.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman when Congress so determined?

Mr. ROSS. I have so understood.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is mistaken, as we have passed no such resolution.

Mr. ROSS. I think otherwise. I will not stop here to inquire as to the taste of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] in his criticism of the action of the Secretary of State. I would have thought, taking everything into consideration, he would have treated him a little more tenderly. He ought to have taken into consideration that Mr. Seward for twenty-five years furnished the brains for the gentleman's party. He denounced him as a trickster, as a man hostile to the Government; and he compared him to a dog. It created considerable amusement among the grave and distinguished gentlemen who sat near him when the leader of their party, who furnished it with brains for twenty-five years was compared in ridicule to a dog. I suppose it is all right. Congress can speak of the President as a usurper, compare the Secretary of State to a dog, and deride the authority and views of the Supreme Court, but when one member intimates another has not squared the mark on the subject of telling the truth, it is a grave question for the immediate action of this House.

The eighth and last evidence I shall furnish to my Republican friends is the proclamation of emancipation. I do not profess to give it with accuracy, but it will be found in that proclamation issued by Abraham Lincoln, he gave notice that unless within a certain period the rebel States grounded arms, on the 1st of January, 1863, their slaves should be declared to be emancipated. He said he would regard it as an evidence of their return to the national authority that they should have representatives here on the 1st of January, 1863. Was Abraham Lincoln opposed to their representation in Congress? Did he believe the result of this war was to give us a dissevered Government? I do not think he did.

I proceed now to show that if this were a new measure and were not a violation of the Constitution and of the principles of the Republican party during the four years' progress of the war, it would still be unwise and inexpedient for us to adopt it. And in this connection I propose briefly to call the attention of the House to some of the provisions of this most extraordinary bill.

The fifth section provides—

That the word citizen, as used in this act, shall be construed to mean all persons (except Indians not taxed) born in the United States or duly naturalized.

The seventh section provides—

That no constitution shall be presented to or acted on by Congress which denies to any citizen any rights, privileges, or immunities which are granted to any other citizen in the State. All laws shall be impartial, without regard to language, race, or former condition. If the provisions of this section should ever be altered, repealed, expunged, or in any way abrogated, this act shall become void and said State lose its right to be represented in Congress.

I understand from this section that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] means to incorporate a new doctrine, a doctrine that from his known gallantry it is to be presumed he would favor, namely, female suffrage. It declares who shall be citizens, and that if any State shall deprive any of its citizens of the right of suffrage it shall lose its representation in Congress. I do not object to the bill on this score, only it is a little in advance of the party, I suppose, to confer suffrage on females now.

But I call attention to the latter part of the seventh section:

If the provisions of this section should ever be altered, repealed, expunged, or in any way abrogated, this act shall become void, and said State lose its right to be represented in Congress.

What is that provision? Why, that if by any future amendment to their constitutions any of these States shall deprive any black man of the right of voting in those States, then they are to be deprived of representation in Congress. Now, I submit to the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he would apply a rule to those States which he is not willing to apply to his own State. Why, sir, the rule laid down in this bill for the government of these southern States would, if applied to Pennsylvania, deprive it of representation in Congress. Is it possible that we will enforce upon the people of these States a doctrine so odious? I understand when States come into this Union they come in upon an equality, but here it is proposed to make an odious distinction between the States. While the gentleman from Pennsylvania will represent his district where the black man is still deprived of what the gentleman terms this invaluable right of casting his ballot for the choice of his own rulers and of those who make laws to govern him, when he comes to apply a rule to the ten States lately in rebellion he makes an entirely different one.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to some of the provisions of the sixth section. That section goes upon the hypothesis that Congress possesses the power to determine who shall be citizens of the United States, or in other words to deprive individuals who are citizens of the United States of their citizenship by a mere statute. I do not think we have any such right. I think it is only upon due trial and conviction that these rights can be taken from individuals.

Now, suppose this doctrine is maintained, what will be the result during a high state of political excitement? The party coming into power will hold that all those who voted against them are not citizens of the United States, but must remain for five years in tutelage before they shall be permitted to exercise the right of suffrage and other rights pertaining to citizenship. At the next election that takes place the opposite party gets into power, and those who voted against them will be declared to have forfeited all their rights as citizens. In this way the great mass of the people of this country might be cut off from the right of suffrage and representation.

I object to the latter part of this section on the ground that it will encourage perjury by leading men to swear falsely in relation to these matters. Now, for these reasons I judge that the calm and dispassionate consideration of this House will show in its action that they do not regard this bill as worthy of the American Congress.

Now, for what object was this war prosecuted? Was it prosecuted to overthrow or to save the nation? I understand that the vast sacrifice of men and money which we have made during the terrible struggle of four years was to save and not to destroy. That I understand to be the opinion of the officers and soldiers of our Army, of the men who went to the front. It was their intention to preserve and perpetuate and hand down unimpaired this glorious legacy to those who come after us.

But according to the theory of this bill the war destroyed this Union, at least to the extent that we should not, if the doctrine be true, continue upon the flag that waves over your desk, Mr. Speaker, the six and thirty stars which now adorn it. But I care not what may be the views of others upon the subject; I will never consent to blot out one star now upon our national banner. I believe this war was fought for the purpose of supporting and maintaining the national authority, for the purpose of preserving and not of destroying. Shall we now by act of Congress strike down ten States of the Federal Union, four of the ten having been of the original States which formed the Constitution? I hope not.

In this connection let me read a short extract from the opinions of General Grant upon this subject. He says:

"My observations lead me to the conclusion that the citizens of the southern States are anxious to return to self-government within the Union as soon as possible; that while reconstructing they want and require protection from the Government; that they are in earnest in wishing to do what they think is required by the Government not humiliating to them as citizens; and that if such a course was pointed out they would pursue it in good faith. It is to be regretted that there cannot be a greater comingling at this time between the citizens of the two sections, and particularly of those intrusted with the law-making power."

Ah! General Grant; you think there should be a comingling between the people of the two sections, and especially between those intrusted with the law-making power. But Congress does not think so; Congress says that these people shall knock for eighteen months and two years at our doors and still be refused admission. Congress not only puts itself in conflict with the principles enunciated in the messages and proclamations of Abraham Lincoln, the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States, but also the opinions held by General Grant, and also, too, by General Sherman. I have not the letter of General Sherman before me, but I recollect that he says that as a man and a soldier he would never strike a disarmed foe standing before him. I think that is a good sentiment; I think this is the sentiment of a brave man. Where is the man who would desire to strike a fallen foe, lying prostrate and disarmed before him?

Perhaps there are some who may desire further strife and further conflict; if so, they are the men who were hunting for cotton and silver spoons; not those who went to the front to fight the battles of our country.

I desire to call the House to another consideration in this connection. I hold that if the bill now under consideration should be adopted by the American Congress it will recognize a theory which will make this country responsible, at least to foreign nations, for the evidences of confederate debt held by their citizens. If these southern States are conquered provinces, then by the laws of nations we are responsible for all the debts and liabilities of the conquered country. I ask gentlemen to pause before we take so great a responsibility as this upon us.

There are influences not made apparent in the House to keep these men out of Congress. I have noticed that the "high tariff" men are most anxious to exclude southern men from Congress. Why is this? They know that the great Northwest are "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to New England. I do not wonder that they like to keep out these fifty members from the South. Their object is to perpetuate the power of the Northeast, and derive profit as long as they can from it. But the question is seriously mooted in this House that if we admit these fifty southern members it is going to endanger the perpetuity of our free institutions; that our Government is going to be overthrown. Now, can the presence of fifty members here, added to the vote here already, either vote to indorse the confederate debt or to vote down the national debt.

Our friends upon the other side tell us that by the abolition of slavery these rebellious States are entitled to twelve more members than they had before the war. Well, sir, we are not to have an apportionment of representation before 1870, and before that time the black men of the South will abandon their present position and flock like doves to the Northeast. They will then be counted as a basis of representation, not in the southern States, but in the Northeast. In the apportionment of 1870 where will the black men be? They will not be counted anywhere until 1870.

But the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SULLABARGER] amazed the House by a new constitutional amendment, which he got up, as applicable to the views of this side of the House, and he read it in the presence of his friends who surrounded him. I would ask you if any member upon this side of the House has at any time at this or at the last session of Congress advocated the admission of disloyal men upon this floor. I say that you can find no such instance. I defy the gentleman to show any instance in which the question of the right of representation upon this floor was not left free and untrammelled for the consideration of the House.

After 1870 we shall have five members to their one. Hence I conclude there would be no danger by admitting loyal representatives to their seats in Congress to deliberate upon these great questions which are claiming the attention of the country.

But the Supreme Court of the United States does not escape the denunciation of the party in power; and an especial victim of this denunciation is the individual who delivered the opinion of that court in vindication of the great principle of constitutional law and individual right. Who is this man who is being denounced upon the other side of the floor as plotting to overthrow the Government?—Why, sir, I have had the pleasure of knowing Judge Davis for a quarter of a century. He and I have always differed upon political questions; yet I have always recognized him as an honorable, high-toned gentleman; and, sir, permit me to say that there was no man in all this country upon whom Abraham Lincoln more confidently leaned for counsel and advice than he did upon David Davis, of Illinois, the man who is now denounced by the other side of the House for making a decision which nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand lawyers in this country would have made before this rebellion took place.

The war is also carried on against the President. He is a "white-washer;" he is a "usurper;" a man who is plotting to overthrow the liberties of the country. Why, sir, what object has he in being untrue to his country? From the time when he attained manhood he has stood by the people. He has uniformly revered and venerated the Constitution of the country; and during the recent rebellion he manfully stood up and cast this Constitution in the teeth of southern rebels when they were attempting to overthrow our institutions. You may go on and pass your resolutions of censure, but I tell you, gentlemen, there is a day of reckoning coming. This is not the first time that a President of the United States has been maligning by a Congress of the United States. If memory serves me right about 1833

the Senate of the United States passed a resolution of censure upon Andrew Jackson. That resolution stood for some time; but, sir, the "sober second thought" of the American people at length prevailed, and when it did prevail what was done? Why, sir, in 1837, through the exertions of Thomas H. Benton and other able statesmen of those days, that insult to the nation, that stigma upon the name of the great Jackson was wiped out. That resolution was expunged. The Journal upon which it was recorded was brought into the Senate Chamber, and in the presence of the Senate black lines were drawn around that resolution; as black as the iniquity of those who had concocted that slanderous resolution. I trust, sir, in God's name, that if liberty still lives in this country there will come a time—perhaps when we shall have passed away—when the ignominy and contempt sought in this hour of trial to be fastened upon the Chief Magistrate of the Government will be wiped out and atoned for. Such is my faith, such my confidence in free Government, and the "sober second thought" of the American people.

The Senate of the United States in these days is in the habit of rejecting the nominations of men whose opinions do not accord with theirs, and for no other reason. Why, sir, this experiment was tried once before by the Senate. When Mr. Van Buren was nominated as minister to the Court of St. James the Senate of the United States rejected the nomination; and his unwarranted rejection by a partisan Senate caused Martin Van Buren, who otherwise would probably never have been thought of in connection with the Presidency, to be nominated and elected by the American people to the first office in their gift.

Gentlemen are mistaken if they imagine that the people of this country are going to give up free government. They intend to stand by the Constitution of our fathers. They intend to let well enough alone, rejecting the revolutionary schemes of agitators and fanatics. They revere and venerate the memory of the patriotic men who established the form of government under which we live; and, in my judgment, they will still come to the rescue and maintain and uphold our institutions. This is my hope. Still, I am frank to confess, Mr. Speaker, that I have my fears; I have my apprehensions. This country is now passing through a most terrible ordeal. The great question whether civil liberty and the capacity of the people for self-government can be maintained is now being tested.

If the Congress of the United States can usurp three departments of the Government; if they can depose the President, paralyze the Supreme Court; if they can destroy civil liberty in this country, then when I look back into the history of the French revolution I sometimes think I see a little "mountain" on the other side, and I think sometimes I can pick out the Robespierres, the Dantons, and the Murats. I sometimes feel there is fear civil liberty is to be crucified in the house of its pretended friends. In my judgment the time has come when the American people should be aroused to the impending danger which hangs like a dark pall over our political institutions. The time has come, sir, when we must maintain and uphold and perpetuate those great principles of civil liberty for which our fathers fought.

I appeal to my brother members, let us pause, let us reflect, let us consider that we have lived for a long time under a Government which has given us protection in our persons, our property, and in all that we hold dear. Shall we imperil it? Where can we find a better one? Cast your eyes over the Governments of the world. Where can you find another comparing with this glorious Government of ours? Shall we experiment with it? Let us leave well enough alone. I would—

"Rather bear those ills we have Than fly to others that we know not of."

I ask gentlemen to be careful how they strike down the great landmarks of constitutional government. See what a magnificent future we have before us! No such country was ever given to any other people. Look at its vast resources! It was a Government that rested so easily upon our shoulders that we hardly felt we were governed.

Now, what is the change? In a time of profound peace we have ninety thousand soldiers in the field to support whom the people are heavily taxed. It used to be the pride of the American people that the humblest citizen in the country was protected. What is it now? A few days ago what did we do? We passed a law through Congress by which the acts of all our officers of every kind, including petty larceny and crimes of every description, are to be forgiven. All record of them is to be obliterated, so that hereafter no one can prosecute those who committed them. Every man who during the war unjustly took away the property of a private citizen is to be protected under the bill of my colleague [Mr. COOK] from being called to account.

Indeed, in that bill it has also been held that where any of these offenses have been committed it must be taken for granted that the party who committed the offense had full authority to do so. Is this the feast we have been invited to? Are we to ignore the rights of private citizens? Is there to be no redress, and are you not to stop even to inquire because the offense was committed by some officer with epaulettes on his shoulders or by some sergeant or corporal? I tell you, gentlemen, it is time the American people were aroused to the impending dangers which imperil the liberties of this country.

Mr. COOK. I desire to make a suggestion, as my colleague has referred to a bill reported by me from the Committee on the Judiciary. It is very apparent from what he has said that he has not read it so as to understand it.

Mr. ROSS. I think I understand it very well. I think my colleague will not deny the commission of the offense is made prima facie evidence of authority to commit it. That is the bill I know. I say it is trampling upon the right of the private citizen.

Mr. COOK. There is no such provision in the bill.

Mr. ROSS. It is only part of the legislation which has been pushed through this Congress by the gentleman's entire party. I appeal to members that we shall act as wise men. I ask why, having the vast responsibility imposed upon their shoulders to preserve the liberties of the country, the other side will continue to strike them down? Why do you want to destroy the Government? Why do you want to create confusion?

You say that you will impeach the President of the United States. What has he done? Some gentlemen intimated to me the other day that the President would be impeached, to which I replied that it seemed to me a man who left so many disunionists in office throughout the land when he had the power to remove them deserved impeachment. He has held in office men who contend that the Government is dissevered, and that I think is the strongest objection I have ever heard urged against Andrew Johnson. He has not turned out one tithe of the men who were turned out by Abraham Lincoln. Why should we attempt to make this kind of example. I trust it will not be done; that we will not create such commotion and discord and establish such a precedent. We do not set precedents for ourselves alone; we may reasonably expect they will be followed by others.

Gentlemen, let us now harmonize; let us act like wise men. Do you expect these southern men to love us any better by abusing them? They will not do so. They have got to live in this country. Do you want an Ireland, a Hungary, a Poland in your midst? I confess I do not. I want the American people to revere and venerate the Government under which we live. I want to see a people who will rally at the call of the Government to protect and defend it against all its enemies under all circumstances. In my own judgment a lenient policy, such as has been recommended by General Grant, General Sherman, and the President of the United States, and such as Mr. Lincoln would have adopted in all probability, would be the best, would give peace, harmony, and perpetuity to this Government. We want this Government to live, to endure as long as water runs and grass grows. Let us act like wise men in so shaping our legislation as to attain this very desirable end.

Mr. Speaker, I have occupied about as much time as I had intended. I have thrown out brief and disconnected remarks on the spur of the occasion. If they are worthy of consideration I hope they will be considered. I have an anxious and ardent desire that this country should be restored to harmony and peace, that we should go on in the highway of national greatness for years and centuries to come, that it should continue to be the asylum for the down-trodden of the nations of Europe, where they may come and seek protection and share with us the benefits of a great, glorious, and free Government.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to mention now what conclusion I have come to with regard to the management of this bill. I shall not attempt to take a vote upon it to-day. There are several gentlemen who wish to speak; but I desire to have the floor when the House adjourns to-night, so that on Monday I can call the previous question. I will mention, however, that before I call it, I intend to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] and his colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] to withdraw their motions, which prevent amendments, so as to enable the House to go on under the five-minute rule, as in Committee of the Whole, and try to amend the bill before taking final action on it. If they will do that I shall not call the previous question on Monday morning, but allow amendments to be made until the House is satisfied one way or the other with the bill. If not satisfied the motion may be renewed.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent now, or by a suspension of the rules on Monday.

Mr. CONKLING objected.

The SPEAKER. Then it can only be done on Monday.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the motion of my colleague to refer the bill now under consideration, with the pending amendments, to the joint Committee on Reconstruction. I am also opposed to the motion which the gentleman from Pennsylvania gave notice of the other day, to lay these bills on the table. I hope the motion to refer them, or lay them on the table, will not be adopted. If either of these motions should prevail it would operate practically as a declaration on the part of the House that no action may be expected during the remainder of this Congress upon the great question of reconstruction. I accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and now withdraw my amendment to his substitute; and, so far as I can, I will sustain the motion which he proposes to make on Monday, that the House consider these bills as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, and try to perfect a bill so as to be able to send it to the Senate within the next two or three days.

Gentlemen at all familiar with the legislation of the House, and the manner in which its business is now blocked out, will comprehend at once that unless some speedy action is had by the House, and the bill sent to the Senate, so that they may have time to examine it, and to review the veto message in case it shall come in, during the life of this Thirty-Ninth Congress, there can be no act passed that will bring relief to the loyal men of the South or carry out the pledges which the Thirty-Ninth Congress made to the country and to the loyal men of the South, that loyal and constitutional State governments shall be established there on the reassembling of Congress.

As the gentleman from Pennsylvania has just remarked, there are but twenty working-days practically left of this session. The Thirty-Ninth Congress went to the country in opposition to the policy of the President, and to what we were pleased to denigrate his usurpations. The people in generous confidence have sustained Congress and returned to the Fortieth Congress by majorities unprecedented men pledged to the abolition of the governments established by the acting President of the United States, in violation of all law, and, as I claim, in clear violation of the Constitution. A large majority on this side of the House were returned to the next Congress under the express pledge that they would not permit these rebel State governments to exist a single hour after this Congress had been in session long enough to declare them abolished. If this Congress fails to redeem that pledge it will commit a blunder which, in such an hour as this, is worse than a crime.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the gentleman to state his objection to having a subject like this, with regard to which a number of bills have been brought forward, committed to a committee which has now no work upon its hands and which has a right to report at any time.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. My answer to the gentleman from New York is, that the Committee on Reconstruction have held no meetings during this entire session up to this hour. Several bills proposed by gentlemen have been referred to that committee during this session upon which they have taken no action. If the committee ever gets together again, which I doubt, as it is a large committee composed of both branches of Congress, I have but little hope of their being able to agree. The chairman of the committee on the part of the Senate, as is well known, is absorbed in his efforts to perfect the financial measures of the country, and I fear that if this bill goes to that committee it will go to its grave, and that it will not during the life of the Thirty-Ninth Congress see the light. If I were opposed to these bills I would vote to send them to that committee as sending them to their tomb. That is my answer to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not know whether the gentleman from Ohio would like my opinion as to whether that is a good answer or not.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I have no objection to the gentleman giving his opinion.

Mr. CONKLING. I think it is not very good considering that it comes from such a distinguished source. There is no difficulty in having prompt consideration of anything which may be sent to the committee. It was created originally solely to deal with this subject. It was at first broken into four sub-committees that the work of gathering evidence might be more advantageously and speedily carried on. It became one committee, usually working together, only during a few weeks immediately preceding the bringing forward of its ultimate propositions. It would not be decorous for me to praise the committee or the work it did; but I may say with propriety that if it ever was a good committee, if it ever should have been created and composed as it was, it is a good committee now—better than it ever was before; better, because more familiar with this subject, because its members having now become acquainted with each other's views, and having become accustomed to act with each other, and having studied the whole subject committed to them, can proceed with much more hope of good results than ever before. Having a right to report at any time, and being led, on the part of this House, by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] I see no reason why it cannot consider and digest wisely and promptly whatever may be referred to it and make report.

I did not intend to say one word about this, and do not intend to rise again in regard to it. I beg now to say, however, that I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] will not withdraw his motion to refer this whole subject to the joint Committee on Reconstruction; on the contrary, I trust the majority of this House will promptly refer all these bills with all cognate propositions to that committee, and give them at least one opportunity at this session to show whether they can produce something for action or some reason for not acting.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I have as much confidence in the joint Committee on Reconstruction as any gentleman on this floor; but the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] will remember that the propositions which they brought forward near the close of the last session, simultaneously in both branches, were propositions which demanded a two-thirds vote of each branch of Congress, and did not require the signature of the Executive. Had they required the signature of the Executive, and been returned by him without his signature, as any reconstruction bill undoubtedly will be, the time to which Congress had limited its session would have expired before we could have reconsidered and passed them over his veto.

Upon this subject of reconstruction the great body of this House have given much thought, and I believe we can arrive quite as speedily and quite as surely at a result here in the House, under the five-minute rule of amendment and debate, as we can by referring this subject to any committee.

Mr. STEVENS. I will reply, in answer to what my colleague upon the joint Committee on Reconstruction [Mr. CONKLING] has said, that he seems not to be aware that we are now considering a report from that very committee. That committee made a report, and I have offered a substitute for the bill which they reported. If the gentleman thinks the report of that committee is best, then let him vote against my substitute. But why send this subject back again to the committee? The gentleman knows as well as I do how many different opinions there are in that committee; some of us believe in one thing and some of us in another; some of us are very critical and some of us are not. The idea that we can consider anything in that committee, constituted as it is, in less than a fortnight, it seems to me is wholly out of the question; and as we have only about some twenty working days in which to mature this bill in both branches of Congress, if we send this subject to that committee and let it take its time to consider it, and then have it reported here and considered again, I certainly need not say to gentlemen that that would be an end of the matter, at least for this session. I do not believe the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] desires to accomplish that result; though I believe some gentlemen do. I believe that will be its fate as inevitably as it goes there.

Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] I trust, will allow me a remark in reply.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] inquires why this report, emanating originally from the Committee on Reconstruction, should now be sent back. Let me answer: the gentleman from Pennsylvania concurred in that report; he had his full share in molding it and making it precisely what it was. He supported it then; now he offers a substitute for it. Why? Because the time which has elapsed since then and the events which have transpired have modified, he thinks, the exigencies of the case. Is not that as applicable to the judgment of the committee as to his own? And if it be necessary for him now to offer, as he has offered, a different series of provisions in order to express his views, matured as they are by the intermediate experience, is it not necessary, or if not necessary is it not proper, that it should have the opportunity of acting for once in the light of all the facts and circumstances as they are to-day? By as much as those circumstances involve the necessity of the substitute emanating from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, by so much in my judgment they invoke the renewed action of this committee.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is aware, I suppose, that two or perhaps three bills on this subject have been referred during this session to that committee. Why has not the committee acted on them?

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Speaker, if I were the chairman of the committee on the part of this House I should be able to answer that question, because then I could tell why I had not called the committee together. But as I am only a subordinate member of the committee, whose business it is to come when I am called and never to call others, I am entirely unable to give the information for which the gentleman inquires.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, if I could have any assurance that this committee would be able to report promptly a bill upon which this House could probably agree, I would not hesitate a single moment to vote for the reference of this measure to that committee, including the several bills before my own committee, because, as I said in the outset, I have entire confidence in the gentlemen who constitute that committee. But, believing that they will be unable to agree, I shall vote against a recommitment.

One word more with regard to this matter. This House has on two different occasions by resolutions instructed the committee of which I am chairman—the Committee on Territories—to report to the House bills on this subject. Some half dozen bills have been prepared and sent to that committee. And when the committee is called, unless the House shall already have acted on some proposition looking to the reorganization of loyal governments in the late rebel States, we intend to report a bill and to insist upon a vote. So far as I am concerned I do not intend that the Thirty-Ninth Congress shall adjourn without some effort to provide governments which shall secure justice and equality to all loyal men in the southern States.

Mr. BLAINE. With the gentleman's permission I desire to ask him, in regard to those bills now before his committee, whether, when they were introduced here for reference, the point of order was made upon them that they had no business before that committee, but belonged, under the rules of the House, to the Reconstruction Committee.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. No, sir; one of those resolutions was introduced before this House galvanized into life again the Reconstruction Committee for the remainder of the session.

Mr. BLAINE. And all the bills that have been referred to the gentleman's committee since then were referred in direct violation of a rule of this House; and if the point of order had been made upon them they would not have been referred to that committee. I do not think that the gentleman's committee ought to take advantage of the neglect of members to make the point of order.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If this House has by unanimous consent, since the adoption of the resolution reviving the Reconstruction Committee, sent bills to the Committee on Territories, it is no fault of the latter committee.

Mr. BLAINE. Unanimous consent, in nine cases out of ten, is only another name for negligence on the part of the House. It was gross negligence in this case.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Very well, sir, that may be the opinion of the gentleman; but so far as the House is concerned its action, before the Reconstruction Committee was reconstituted for this session, authorized the committee of which I am chairman to report a bill, and we intend to do it.

Now, sir, I wish to examine briefly one or two of the provisions of the amendment which I have offered to the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Substantially this bill will be reported by the Committee on Territories if no bill is previously acted on by the House.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to ask my colleague whether he can tell the House and the country what the plan of congressional reconstruction is?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope to be able to do so before I take my seat.

Mr. FINCK. We shall be very glad, indeed, to learn it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. At any rate, I shall show that a majority of the Republican Union party by their votes in the Thirty-Seventh and Thirty-Eighth Congresses are committed to the plan of reconstruction now proposed.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] in his speech on the day before yesterday, made an objection to the amendment which I have offered because it abolishes unqualifiedly the de facto State governments established by the acting President in the late rebel States, and claimed that in the interim between the organization of the provisional committees provided for in the bill and the passage of the act abolishing these governments anarchy would reign supreme in those States, and he claimed that any government is better than no government. Now, sir, the gentleman from New York was mistaken. It is true that there would be no local civil government left in those States if the bill should pass abolishing the present governments; but there is a provision directing the President of the United States to see that the laws of the United States are executed in those States and the lives and property of our citizens protected.

Mr. BINGHAM. What laws of the United States to protect life and property?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. No law of the United States now on the statute-books; but the President is required by the provisions of my bill to use the entire military and naval force of the nation to protect the lives and property of the citizens in those States during the interim. So far as that subject is concerned the lives and property of the people will be just as safe as they were during the interim between the surrender of Lee and Johnston and the organization of the present governments.

With the whole force of the United States at the President's disposal, he can if he will protect the lives and property of the people quite as well as he did after the surrender and until the establishment of the governments now existing there.

Mr. BINGHAM. What provision is there in this act for the protection of life and property?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The bill provides that the force of the United States shall be at the disposal of our military commanders in those States just as it was at the suppression of the rebellion.

Mr. BINGHAM. What provision is there to punish any acts of petit larceny?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. There is none. If any act of petit larceny is committed in those States during the short interim contemplated it will not materially damage the loyal men who have been exiled or despoiled of all they possess. If such acts are committed upon Union men under the present governments there is no chance for redress under these de facto rebel governments. So far as I am concerned, if I were a southern loyalist, I would rather have no government at all than the infernal despotism which to-day crushes the loyal men of the South.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman tell me what laws of the United States he considers applicable to this country?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I have provided in this bill for that.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand the gentlemen to say he expected the people of these Territories to be protected by and under the laws of the United States, enforced by the President. Will the gentleman tell me what laws he purposes shall be enforced?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. My colleague has just propounded the same question, and I have just answered it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I was not able to hear what occurred between the gentlemen and his colleague.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The whole machinery of the bill is to compel the President of the United States, with the Army and Navy and the whole force at his disposal, to see to it that this act and all acts of the provisional governments organized under it shall be enforced in those States.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] made the objection that there would be an interval of time when there would be no government in these States. I reply again that the interim would be no longer than that which occurred after the suppression of the rebellion and the setting up of the provisional governments now existing there, and the time would not ordinarily be longer than sixty days.

As I intend to withdraw this bill, as requested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will not take up the time of the House in discussing its provisions.

Mr. BINGHAM. Can that be done while my motion is pending to refer?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Yes, sir, it can; but I yield to the gentleman to make his point of order if he desires.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the gentleman has not withdrawn it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If I have not, I withdraw it now.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in reply to some of the arguments addressed to this House by gentlemen on the other side, I want to say that the great body of Union men deny that during the entire war there has been any constitutional State government in any one of the States in rebellion. Tennessee has been readmitted, or its reorganized State government has been recognized by Congress since the war. The gentlemen who have served with me here during the entire war recognize the fact that the great body of men constituting the Republican-Union party have held that opinion since the outbreak of the rebellion.

At the first regular session of the Thirty-Seventh Congress I introduced a bill to establish temporary provisional governments in the then eleven rebellious States. The Committee on Territories authorized me to report such a bill, and on the 12th of March, 1862, I did report such a bill to this House, which was laid on the table by a small majority, the great body of the Union members present and voting voted against laying the bill on the table. At the commencement of the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress a special committee was organized on the subject of reconstruction, of which the late Henry Winter Davis, of Maryland, was chairman, and of which I also was a member. They proposed to this House, and the House and Senate passed, a bill again recognizing the principle on which the Union-Republican party have acted during the entire war, declaring there were no constitutional State governments in those States. These bills recognized the fact that the sovereignty of the nation was in the people residing in States which maintained constitutional State governments, acting in practical relations with the Government of the United States. They held that Congress as the representative of the sovereignty of the nation had the right to legislate on all subjects in States where constitutional State governments had been overthrown or destroyed. That bill passed both Houses, but failed to become a law because Mr. Lincoln declined to sign it, although he said he was acting and intended to follow practically the principles contained in the bill.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will my colleague yield for a question? I understand him to say that from the outbreak of the difficulties to the present time this Congress entertained the views he has just advanced. If that be so, I would like to know how it came that the Congress passed in 1862 the Crittenden resolution, which is in direct conflict with the theory the gentleman has announced. I believe my colleague voted for that resolution.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The Crittenden resolution was passed at the extra session of Congress in July, 1861, immediately after the battle of Bull Run. I voted for the first proposition in the resolution, which declared that this war had been inaugurated by the southern people who were then in arms around the national capital. I did not vote for the second proposition; I declined to do so although the great body of the party to which I belonged did vote for it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. You did not vote against it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I did not vote at all. There were only two votes in the negative on our side, if I remember rightly, my then colleague, Mr. Riddle, of Ohio, and Mr. Potter, of Wisconsin.

Mr. DAWES. And two on the other side.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. And two on the other side. But that resolution did not commit this House nor the Republican party to any settled policy in regard to the state of things now existing. If the rebellion had been suppressed at once, if the people in rebellion had laid down their arms, then every gentleman here and all who served with me in the Thirty-Seventh Congress knows very well that they would have been welcomed back to their former position at once. But the rebellion having been continued during the entire four years, the local governments in those States having been destroyed or their constitutional relations with the national Government suspended, when the people residing in the States which maintained constitutional State governments, and who during these four years constituted the Government of the United States and represented its sovereignty, crushed the rebellion, they had a right under every law, human and divine, to prescribe terms of restoration to the States lately in rebellion; and I tell gentlemen on the other side that the men who crushed the rebellion intend to prescribe terms of restoration to those States. I know gentlemen of the Opposition insist with great pertinacity on the abstract proposition that there is no power in the people of a State to sever their constitutional relations with this Government; but, sir, there stands the fact against this theory. I admit, and every gentleman on this side of the House admits, that the people in a State have no constitutional power to destroy their State governments or dissolve their constitutional relations with the national Government; but that they have nevertheless done so the history of the country for the past four years is the best evidence.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question? If what the rebels did previous to the passage of the Crittenden resolution did not break their relations with the United States, how could they have done it afterward?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If the gentleman knows anything of the history of the country he comprehends very well that a majority of the people in the North, even as late as July, 1861, were unwilling to believe that such a formidable insurrection and rebellion was before them, and that we were to have a bloody war of four years after the disaster at Bull Run.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then will the gentleman allow me to ask whether the United States have any power or authority by which they can allow a State to break its relationship with the Union?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I suppose there is no one in this House who would claim or admit that the Government of the United States has any constitutional power to authorize or recognize the right of a majority of the people of a State to dissolve their constitutional relations with the General Government. So far as I am concerned, and the great body of the men with whom I act, we utterly deny it. But, sir, if the people of a State do the act, what then? Who is there to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which these States shall be restored when these acts are consummated?

Sir, I hold as my distinguished colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] holds, and as the great body of the Republican-Union party hold, that the Government of the United States under its present Constitution can only exist where constitutional State governments are maintained, and that the sovereignty of the people of this country reposes in the people who reside in States which maintain constitutional State governments in practical relations with the national Government, and exists nowhere else. I hold that the people of a State may, and all know that eleven States did, in violation of the Constitution, dissolve their practical relations with the national Government. As an individual citizen may, in violation of law, commit crime, so may a political community, in violation of law, refuse or neglect to discharge their constitutional obligations. If they do this thing, I hold that the States which remain loyal must always represent the national sovereignty and have the right to dictate such terms as they may see fit to revolting States, and to compel the people of the States so violating the Constitution to accept those terms, or to remain during the pleasure of the conqueror in the condition in which we now find the late rebel States. No, not in such condition, but in such condition as the Congress which represents the nation may dictate.

I have regretted to find, since this Congress came together, so many gentlemen here doing all they could to inflame the passions and prejudices of the great body of the people who were recently in rebellion in the United States. I have regretted to find them forming alliances with rebels and justifying the President of the United States, who has become the leader of a negative rebellion as hostile and as dangerous to the United States, and I fear far more so than an open armed rebellion would be if he were at the head of it. I am anxious, and the great body of those with whom I act are today most anxious, that the people who went into the rebellion (many of them honestly and thousands of them reluctantly) should be restored to their practical relations with this Government upon the mildest and most merciful and forgiving terms which it is possible for us, a conquering people, to impose upon them, looking to our own safety, the stability of the national Government, and the rights of loyal citizens in those States.

Mr. FINCK. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. For a question.

Mr. FINCK. This is the very place for my question. What are the terms you propose? What is the congressional plan for restoration?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The gentleman will find an answer if he will read those bills; he will have his answer when this House has agreed upon some practical measure of restoration, which I trust we shall do within ten days.

Mr. FINCK. I ask the gentleman which of these bills presents a fair congressional plan of restoration?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will learn that fact when the majority of this House comes to vote upon these measures next Monday.

Mr. FINCK. I suppose so.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. And he cannot learn before.

Mr. FINCK. One more question, and I am done. I want to know of my colleague, whom I recognize as the leader on that side of the House on this question, whether he admits that his party have not yet come to an agreement upon their plan of restoration?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. So far as I know they have not. The Union party practically committed themselves to a policy of restoration, and they went so far as to admit the State of Tennessee upon the proposed terms of that restoration policy. I voted for the admission of Tennessee, and do not regret having voted for the admission of that truly loyal State.

If any other State recently in rebellion had come to this House under the same conditions in which Tennessee came, ratifying the amendment to the Constitution and having adopted a State constitution securing the control of the government of the State to loyal men, I should, although it might not have come up to all my requirements, have voted for the admission of its members; so anxious was I then and so anxious am I now to see the States recently in rebellion restored to their former position in the Union. But the great body of the men recently in rebellion, under the lead of the Executive, have rejected these mild terms, and it now rests with Congress to say upon what terms they shall be admitted.

Mr. HISE. I desire to ask the gentleman one question, inasmuch as he asked me some questions while I was speaking the other day.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I believe I did not ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HISE] any question at all. I merely declared in my seat in a word or two that I dissented from his views.

Mr. HISE. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Very well; I will allow the gentleman to ask me a question.

Mr. HISE. The gentleman has said that there has not been a definite plan of restoration adopted by the majority of this House. I wish to ask the gentleman if he will go so far as to state that the majority of this House concur with him in refusing admission into the Congress of the United States of representatives from these ten States now unless they agree to the condition of branding all who have held either civil or military office under the confederacy as traitors, and as such are to be excluded from the right to hold office under the United States, and regarding the whole body of the people of those States who sympathized with or cooperated with those who endeavored to establish the confederacy as disloyal, and that none are to be regarded as loyal except the negroes and interlopers there?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. In all of the measures proposed by this Congress the great body of the men who were in the confederate army and supported the rebellion have been granted entire forgiveness. In the propositions which were submitted by Congress to the people only certain parties were excluded from holding office. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman [Mr. HISE] whether he is willing that men, who while members of this House and of the Senate and of the Government of the United States and of the several States, plotted treason against this Government and went into a war and maintained it for four years to destroy this Government should now be received here without conditions with his vote?

Mr. HISE. I will answer that question. I am of the opinion that all of the distinguished men, both civilians and those who held commissions and authority in either army, in the suppression of the rebellion, in putting down this secession, or opposition to the Government, were citizens of States in the Union. I deny the authority of the Government to demand as a condition precedent to admission to representation upon this floor a right to inquire into the conduct of, to convict, and to condemn these men so as to denationalize them or to deprive them of the right to hold office either under the national Government or under a State government. I should oppose that as a usurpation of power.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The answer of the gentleman amounts to this: that so far as he and the party he represents are concerned they would not object to Jeff. Davis or any of the men whose hands are red with the blood of my loyal countrymen coming into this Hall and taking seats along side of them as Representatives. But the gentleman goes further, and says this is a proposition to clothe the black population with the franchise and interlopers with the right of the franchise in States. All I demand, all the loyal men of the nation demand, in the reorganization of State governments in the late rebel States, is that we protect the rights of those who during the war were our friends and allies, and I claim we can only do that by securing every loyal man the right of the ballot.

But, Mr. Speaker, my time is passing and I must return to the point which I was about to notice when interrupted. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Ross,] like many other gentlemen upon that side of the House who have spoken before him, asked why we permitted Senators and Representatives from these States to remain in these Halls after the rebellion if we recognized the principle upon which we now profess to act? Why, sir, the answer is obvious, and I am surprised that any intelligent gentleman should ask such a question. When those men were elected they came here from States recognized as constitutional States, in practical relations with the national Government. A Senator of the United States is elected for six years, and a member of the House for two years. They came here and took their seats because they had been constitutionally elected before their States went into rebellion. Every gentleman knows that there is no authority under the Constitution which would authorize the House or the Senate to exclude a member duly elected and qualified, unless they committed some overt act of treason or violated the rules prescribed for the government of the House or Senate, and the gentleman ought to understand this matter quite as well as I do.

Mr. CHANLER. I want to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Very well; I will hear it.

Mr. CHANLER. It is this: if the loyal population of any State should be found to consist of negroes alone, does the gentleman mean to say that he would recognize that as a State, its organization being based upon negro population alone, excluding the white race?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. The gentleman has asked me a question which he knows very well—

Mr. CHANLER. You cannot answer it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. It has no practical application so far as it relates to any of the States recently in rebellion.

Mr. CHANLER. You dare not answer it. Answer "yes" or "no," and do not falter about it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. When the gentleman talks about my faltering and not daring to answer he assumes what he has no right to assume.

Mr. CHANLER. Well, give us an answer.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If the gentleman will take his seat and remain quiet for a moment I will give him an answer. If there were a single State in the American Union in which there was not a single white man and all were black men, I would clothe its population with the right of the franchise, and with every other right of an American citizen under this Government. [Applause in the galleries.] Does the gentleman regard this as an answer?

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] and those who sustain him have asked the question repeatedly with an air of assumed innocence why we do not admit loyal Representatives from the recent rebel States upon this floor and upon the floor of the Senate. Why, sir, I would not vote to-day to admit Horace Greeley as a Representative in this House from South Carolina, nor would I vote to admit any other man, however loyal, as a Representative from that community. Why? The gentlemen on the other side comprehend this matter quite as well as I do. They know that no political community under our form of government has the right to representation on this floor or in the Senate of the United States, unless it has a constitutional State government organized and recognized by Congress as in practical relation with the Government of the United States. The admission of Representatives and Senators in Congress is a practical recognition of the State government from which they come.

Mr. HISE. With the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, I will say that I do not think he has met the interrogation submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER.] The gentleman from Ohio has said that if the population of a State were composed entirely of black men, no white men residing in the State, he would recognize those black men as entitled to the right of suffrage and every other right. But the question of the gentleman from New York, as I understood it, was, whether the gentleman from Ohio would recognize as entitled to representation a State where suffrage was confined to the negroes, the white population being excluded from the exercise of that right.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Well, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is anxious for my views on this point, I will explain. I am willing to forgive, though I can never forget the crimes committed by those who attempted to destroy this Government. I am willing to walk backward and with the broad mantle of charity cover the political nakedness of the men recently in rebellion. My anxiety for the restoration of the southern States is such that I am willing that all men, even those who held subordinate civil positions and positions in the army of the rebellion shall have the ballot, excluding only the more important and leading men from holding office—those, for instance, who were above the grade of colonel, and those who held positions under this Government before the rebellion. Every bill ever introduced by me for reorganizing these States has proposed to extend the right of the ballot to the great body of the white as well as the black people. My friend from Kentucky says—and if I held his opinions I would say—that the rule I have suggested would exclude the very best men in the South. Undoubtedly it would exclude those whom he and his friends regard as the best men in the South. If my friend from Kentucky had resided in South Carolina during the war I suppose he would never have been upon this floor. I respect him for standing up here and maintaining his opinions, erroneous as I deem them. I prefer an open, manly opponent to a pretended friend. A large majority of those with whom I act are anxious for the restoration of loyal State governments in the South. They are willing to go so far as to extend forgiveness to the great body of the people guilty of the great crime of treason, and admit them to the ballot-box; but at the same time they demand that every loyal man, every "interloper," as my friend from Kentucky terms the white Unionist, every man, however dusky his skin, whose heart beat true to the old flag and the Union during the entire war, shall be the equal of any traitor, however white.

Mr. HILL. I desire to ask my friend from Ohio whether his last expression is to be taken as indicating his conversion to the doctrine of "universal amnesty and universal suffrage?"

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. No, sir; I do not know that I have ever been in favor of that doctrine. As a practical man, however, I want to see the Union restored; and if the members of the Opposition would come to this question with the earnestness of the men of New England and the men of the West, the work of restoration would have been accomplished before now. Why, sir, the assumption, the brazen-faced assumption, of men who during the entire war were in open or secret alliance with the rebels coming here now and joining hands with the apostate at the other end of the avenue, who is the leader, the recognized leader, of a counter-revolution—a negative rebellion, as I said awhile ago—passes comprehension.

Why, sir, suppose that in 1860 John C. Breckinridge had been elected President of the United States; suppose the anti-slavery men of the country had rebelled against his election, and their cause for rebellion would have been far greater than the cause which impelled the southern men into their rebellion; and suppose that after four years of bloody war this anti-slavery rebellion had been crushed and Mr. Breckinridge had been again elected President and in an hour of weakness you had taken an apostate abolitionist from the North for Vice President, to show your love of the North you had conquered, to show them that you had no feeling of hatred toward them, and that in one short month after the inauguration, by a conspiracy of anti-slavery men in the North, Mr. Breckinridge had been assassinated as Mr. Lincoln was assassinated, and the apostate abolitionist had come into the presidency as Mr. Johnson came into it, and he had pardoned and appointed throughout the North and the entire country the men who had been chiefs of the rebellion, turned out the men who had elected him, and appointed their unrelenting enemies, what would have been your denunciations? Sir, I know the denunciations on this side of the House are mildness in comparison with the terrible denunciations which would have been hurled at this apostate and usurper by the men on that side of the House. And they would not have stopped with denunciations; he would have been impeached and deposed before to-day.

Sir, all I ask, and all the loyal men of this country ask who have sacrificed so much in blood and treasure in putting down the rebellion, is that in the restoration of these States care shall be taken that the national Government shall not again be imperiled by a counter-revolution, in which the apostate President shall be the leader, aided by the late rebels and their northern allies. Hence I am in favor of prompt and vigorous action by this Congress. I hold that these governments set up by Mr. Johnson are illegal, and I want them declared illegal and void before this Congress adjourns. I do not care if for a period of sixty days or more or less, as alleged by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] there should be an interregnum in which there would be no local civil governments in those States. If you had been loyal men in New Orleans and Memphis during the late massacre you would have welcomed anarchy, anything, instead of the governments which planned and executed the murders there enacted. I would rather have every man stand upon his own responsibility as a man than to have governments which exiled me from my home, confiscated my property, or murdered me or mine with impunity. In this city there are men to-day who have been exiled from their homes, not able to return, because of their fidelity to the flag of the Union, and the Government of the nation which they served during the war refuses them protection in their homes.

What I want is not oaths; I have not much faith in oaths. I would trust some men on a simple declaration, such as I quoted in a speech on this subject at the last session, much sooner than I would trust those who hesitate at no oath; such a one, sir, as was made by a distinguished gentleman in North Carolina, Mr. Reid, who presided over their recent reconstruction convention, and who had been himself a rebel. His declaration was such that when I read it in California I said in my heart there is a man I can take by the hand and welcome back to the old family mansion. Bad men will take any oath under the advice and lead of unscrupulous politicians. We have witnessed its fatal workings in Maryland.

I want peace. I want unity, I want the Government restored, but I do not want the men who conquered the rebellion proscribed and the governments of the rebel States carried on by the men who have been waging bitter war against us for the past four years. I utterly repudiate the assumption of the President that he can parole armies and then authorize these paroled prisoners of war to form constitutional State governments for the loyal men in the States recently in rebellion. I know very well if gentlemen on the other side had been in power in the case supposed by me a while ago what they would have done. There would have been no let up on their part. There would have been no such mercy as we have shown: no such mild terms of restoration submitted as we have proposed. There would have been no such forgiveness. But they would have proscribed, and proscribed to the bitter end. They would have maintained their party organization in every rebel State against any and all attempts to overthrow it by those who had so recently been their enemies and the enemy of the nation. I say we are ready to forgive the great body of the southern people, we are anxious to forgive them; but we are determined, by the grace of God, that these rebel State organizations shall not be recognized, come what may; that disloyal Representatives shall not appear upon this floor, nor shall the electoral votes of such States be counted in any presidential election until constitutional governments have been organized and recognized by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. JULIAN obtained the floor.

Mr. WINFIELD. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] will permit me, before he commences his address, to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] to an expression in the remarks he has just made. I understood the gentleman to use this language, and I desire to ask him whether I quote correctly or not:

"Why, sir, the assumption, the brazen-faced assumption of men here, who during the entire war were in secret alliance with the rebels, coming here now and joining hands with the apostate at the other end of the avenue, who is the leader, the recognized leader of a counter-revolution—a negative rebellion as I said awhile ago—passes comprehension."

I desire to ask the gentleman to whom he refers?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Well, sir, I intended to refer to the great body of men in the Opposition, to every man who was opposed to the war and opposed to the draft; who discouraged enlistments, who harbored deserters; who went into secret societies in order to organize conspiracies in the North, whether they were in this House or in any other place.

Mr. WINFIELD. The gentleman used the expression "men here." I desire to know whether he intends to charge that there are men here who were in secret alliance with the enemy during the rebellion.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Well, sir, I am unable to say from any personal knowledge whether any such men are here. But, sir, from general representation and from the votes of gentlemen in opposition to the war—"not another man, not another dollar"—from speeches made by gentlemen on the other side of the House, I have no doubt some of them are here and have been here during the war.

Mr. WINFIELD. I do not propose to be tried on general reputation. I desire to say for myself, and so far as I know from my associates on this floor of my own school of politics, that the insinuation that we are or ever have been in alliance with the rebels is utterly untrue, and, if intended to apply to us, is a base and unfounded slander.

Mr. HUNTER. I say that, so far as I am concerned, it is a base lie.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is out of order.

Mr. HILL. I ask that the words of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUNTER] be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The words will be taken down and the Chair will rule upon them.

The Clerk read the words taken down, as follows:

"Mr. HUNTER. I say that, so far as I am concerned, it is a base lie."

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that they are out of order.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. They are nevertheless true.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is not in order in interposing that remark, because the Chair rules on a parliamentary question.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask that the additional words of the gentleman from New York be taken down.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman allude to what I said?

Mr. KELLEY. I speak of the gentleman from New York, and I ask that the additional word that he spoke—"Nevertheless they are true"—be taken down.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I made that remark, and if the gentleman wants to hear it again I will repeat it.

Mr. KELLEY. I want his words taken down.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Speaker, I move a vote of censure, and I will prepare a resolution for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I demand that the connection of the remarks excepted to be also taken down.

The Clerk read the words of Mr. RANDALL as taken down, as follows:

"Mr. RANDALL. They are nevertheless true."

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that is also out of order. The Clerk will report Rule 61, to be found on page 76 of the Digest.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgresses the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate. If there be no appeal the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to. If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise he shall not be permitted to proceed in case any member object, without leave of the House; and if the case require it he shall be liable to censure."

Mr. HILL. Of course, Mr. Speaker, in the hurry of the scenes now transpiring it is impossible for me to present in writing a resolution of censure; and I understand that only a written resolution can be presented for action.

The SPEAKER. And it must be presented at this time if at all.

Mr. HILL. I suppose time will be allowed me to prepare a resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can move a vote of censure; then if any member demands that it shall be reduced to writing the gentleman will have reasonable time allowed him to do so.

Mr. HILL. Very well; I move a vote of censure upon the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HUNTER.]

Mr. WARD, of New York. I ask that the motion be reduced to writing.

After some pause,

Mr. HILL said: Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, upon which I call the previous question:

Resolved, That the gentleman from New York, Hon. Mr. HUNTER, in stating, during debate in the House, that the assertion of the gentleman from Ohio, Hon. Mr. ASHLEY, is "a base lie," has transgressed the rules of this body, and that he be censured for the same by the Speaker.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HUNTER] qualified the remark by saying, "if applied to himself."

Mr. HILL. I will incorporate the exact language in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The modification should be incorporated in writing in the resolution.

Mr. HILL. I will make the change.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to make a single suggestion. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILL] and of gentlemen around me here to the fact that the gentleman from New York [Mr. WINFIELD] first stated that if the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] were intended to apply to him during the time he had been a member of Congress, then they were untrue. Then the other gentleman from New York [Mr. HUNTER] added that if they were intended to apply to him they were a base lie. Now, I submit that the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WINFIELD] should be taken in connection with the remarks of his colleague, [Mr. HUNTER.]

Mr. HILL. I cannot yield for that. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JOHNSON] desires to censure his associate [Mr. WINFIELD] I have no objection to his bringing in a resolution for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILL] desires to censure anybody upon an unfair statement he is welcome to take the responsibility of it.

Mr. HILL. I am willing to assume the responsibility of the motion I have made. If the gentleman desires to except to it I have no objection to his expending his vials of wrath upon me.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have stated the fact, which the gentleman cannot dispute.

Mr. WINFIELD. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILL] indulge me with a single remark?

Mr. HILL. For what purpose?

Mr. WINFIELD. I desire simply to state that the remarks I made were simply upon the hypothesis that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] intended to impute this treason to me, and I certainly think the remarks of my colleague [Mr. HUNTER] were made upon the same hypothesis. I had no intention of arraigning the assertion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] as a falsehood if it did not apply to me; and that I understand to have been the intention of my colleague, [Mr. HUNTER.]

Mr. HILL. I have yielded to the gentleman who gave occasion for the remark to which I took exception. It was such a remark as if made between gentleman and gentleman would be regarded as in the highest degree offensive. I know of no reason why its use upon this floor should not be regarded as equally offensive and as a violation of the rules of this House. It was for that reason that I have offered the resolution now awaiting the action of this House. That resolution I have modified so as to embrace the exact words of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HUNTER.] The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That the gentleman from New York, Hon. Mr. HUNTER, in declaring, during the debate in the House, in reference to the assertion of the gentleman from Ohio, Hon. Mr. ASHLEY, "I say that so far as I am concerned it is a base lie," has transgressed the rules of this body, and that he be censured for the same by the Speaker.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILL] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HILL. I cannot yield further. I think the matter is sufficiently understood; and I now insist upon the previous question.

The question was upon seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. ANCONA. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question was taken upon the motion to lay the resolution upon the table; and upon a division there were—ayes 32, noes 64.

Before the result of the vote was announced, Mr. ANCONA called for the yeas and nays upon laying the resolution upon the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.
Mr. KASSON. I rise for the purpose of obtaining information which may be necessary to enable us to vote intelligently on this subject. I as well as many gentlemen around me have failed to understand the alleged provocation for the words which it is proposed to make the subject of censure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILL] insists on the demand for the previous question, and debate is not in order.

Mr. FINCK. I ask that the language of my colleague [Mr. ASHLEY] as brought to the attention of the House by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WINFIELD] be read.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I object.
The question being taken on the motion of Mr. ANCONA that the resolution be laid on the table, it was decided in the negative—yeas 32, nays 75, not voting 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Campbell, Chandler, Cooper, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Goodyear, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Johnson, Latham, Le Blond, Lettwich, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, and Winfield—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos B. Ashley, Baker, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Cobb, Conkling, Cullom, Daves, Deming, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kootz, Laflin, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McKee, McKuer, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, Stokes, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—75.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Culver, Darling, Davis, Defrees, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Dumont, Farnsworth, Glossbrenner, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hart, Hawkins, Henderson, Hise, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburt, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jencks, Jones, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McIndoe, Morris, Moulton, Newell, Noell, O'Neill, Patterson, Phelps, Plants, Radford, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Spalding, Stilwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Whaley, Woodbridge, and Wright—84.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

On the question there were—ayes 57, noes 32.

Mr. ANCONA. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ANCONA and ORTH were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 33.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. HILL. A number of gentlemen who did not hear the words of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY], as brought to the attention of the House by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WINFIELD], desire that they may be again reported. I therefore ask that, by unanimous consent, the language may be reported.

Mr. STEVENS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, it can only be done by reconsidering the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to reconsider that vote.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. I now ask that the Clerk read the language of the gentleman from Ohio as read to the House by the gentleman from New York.

A MEMBER. Let it be read as taken down by the reporters.

Mr. HILL. I will state what occurred. At the close of the speech of the gentleman from Ohio the gentleman from New York [Mr. WINFIELD] rose with a paper in his hand and asked the gentleman from Ohio whether a part of his language, as it had been taken down, was correct; and he proceeded to read the language, which I presume had been taken from the reporters' notes, although the gentleman from New York did not so state. The gentleman from Ohio then proceeded to make an explanation. Now, what I desire to have read is the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, as first read by the gentleman from New York, and the explanation of the gentleman from Ohio with reference to that language. This explanation was followed by some remarks of the gentleman from New York, and afterward came the remarks of the other gentleman from New York [Mr. HUNTER] to which I have taken exception. This is what I desire to have read.

Mr. HALE. Let me make the suggestion that there be read the debate from the time when my colleague from the Orange district took the floor down to the present time.

The SPEAKER. The stenographers inform the Chair that the debate has not yet been written out.

Mr. HILL. I suggest that the reporters read it from their own notes.

The SPEAKER. Reporters, by the rules, are not allowed to speak in the House.

Mr. HILL. Let the Clerk read again the remark of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Why, sir, the assumption, the brazen-faced assumption of men here who during the entire war were in secret alliance with the rebels, coming here now and joining hands with the apostate at the other end of the avenue, who is the leader, the recognized leader of a counter-revolution—a negative rebellion as I said a while ago—passes comprehension."

Mr. LE BLOND. As the Clerks are not able to report at present the other portion of the debate, the gentleman from Indiana yields to me for a few moments, and I avail myself of the opportunity to offer a few remarks on the pending proposition.

Mr. Speaker, I want it distinctly understood I do not approve of the use of language in this Hall which is in the least indecorous or out of character and in conflict with the rules of the House. There has been too much of it already. It was but a short time ago when the distinguished member from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and my colleague from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] indulged in remarks from this Hall which would injure almost any community to listen to them.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the gentleman to order. [Laughter.] He is not speaking to the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman must confine himself to the question.

Mr. LE BLOND. I am confining myself to the question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's remarks are out of order.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then I will go no more in that direction. When you come down to the debate to-day in which my colleague participated, using the language which has been just read from the Speaker's desk, I ask gentlemen what more offensive language could be used to any man who was an American citizen and willing to abide by the laws and the Constitution of his Government.

[Applause in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair has repeatedly stated these manifestations of applause or disapprobation cannot be tolerated in the galleries.

Mr. NIBLACK. Good; the applause is on our side now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has always made the same statement no matter what debate was going on, and the gentleman who made the remark which the Chair only partially caught has done the Chair injustice.

If there be any repetition of the offense in the galleries the Chair will order the doorkeepers to clear them entirely.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I think it is due to those in the galleries to say that it did not all come from the gentlemen's galleries. I do not charge it on the ladies, for there are gentlemen in the other galleries.

Mr. NIBLACK. I suppose the Chair heard an undertone remark made by myself. What I meant was that the applause was on our side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will bear testimony that the Chair has always on all occasions suppressed these manifestations of applause or disapprobation.

Mr. NIBLACK. I willingly bear testimony to the invariable impartiality of the Chair on all occasions coming within my knowledge.

Mr. LE BLOND. I was alluding to the offensive language used by my colleague from Ohio. Now, sir, we did not rise in our places to call the gentleman to order, for that kind of language has become so common on that side we have got used to it, and we listen with patience. We knew there was no use to take exception, for on that side, whatever may occur, they stand up in vindication of themselves, be the matter right or wrong.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me a single question? I have endeavored to comprehend the reason why the remarks were made by the gentleman on the other side. I voted to rescind the order for the previous question to get that information. I now ask what was the language of the gentleman from Ohio which justified the member from New York, or any other one, applying the offensive language to himself?

Mr. WINFIELD. Let me answer the question.

Mr. HILL. I shall be compelled to resume the floor to prevent an apparently indefinite and interminable controversy between gentlemen on both sides of the House; and therefore, with one or two remarks, and after what has been desired to be read shall have been read, I will again call the previous question.

What I desire to say is, that happening to be passing in the immediate vicinity of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HUNTER,] I heard distinctly the language which he used. I recollected the similar occurrence which happened only the day before yesterday, which was yesterday brought to the attention of the House, and which it was then ruled was improperly brought before the House for the purpose of censure, because the words had not been taken down and excepted to at the time. That occurrence was not regarded, I think, by any gentleman of this House as reputable, as comporting with the dignity of this body or the proprieties of debate; and, hence, when I heard distinctly the language of the gentleman from New York, I deemed it important that proceedings of this sort should be stopped. I thought they had gone far enough; that when we had reached such a point that every day or two we must hear the epithets "lie" and "liar" bandied in this House it was time some one should interpose.

Mr. NIBLACK. If my colleague will allow me, I desire to ask him how much worse it is to impute falsehood to a man than to impute treason to him?

Mr. HILL. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not prepared to weigh and determine precisely the relative merits of the two kinds of epithets. Different individuals would doubtless decide the question in different ways. The epithet "traitor," when it has come to be perhaps the usual designation of a party, might be regarded by some as a reproach and by others as complimentary. At any rate, if gentlemen object to the use of the term "traitor" and other terms offensive to them, it is their own fault that they have neglected to raise the point and take the sense of the House on a motion to censure a member for the use of such language.

I do not, however, desire to enter into any comparison of the relative merits of the two classes of epithets. They are terms which in the discussions on this floor I never permit myself to apply to any gentleman on either side of the House. But, sir, to characterize a man as a "liar" or his assertion as "lies" is by all men everywhere and under all circumstances regarded as peculiarly offensive. Hence, having heard so distinctly the language of the gentleman from New York, and desiring to do my part toward putting a stop to the practice of indulging in such language in this House, I at once took exception to the words and proposed a resolution of censure, fearing that if I did not do so the occasion might pass for censuring language so highly objectionable—language which I think no man on this floor will justify, certainly not my colleague, [Mr. NIBLACK,] whom I know to be a gentleman of too high a sense of honor to approve words so indecorous and offensive. Deeming it high time that the House should put a stop to language of this sort between members of this body, I have submitted my resolution. If the House should think it best to tolerate such language as a necessary incident of freedom of speech on this floor, I shall very cordially acquiesce in the decision. But I desire that the House shall express its judgment on the question one way or another.

As the reporters have now transcribed the portion of the debate, the reading of which has been called for, I yield that it may be read; and when the reading shall be concluded I shall insist on the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Well, sir, I intended to refer to the great body of men in the Opposition—to every man who was opposed to the war and opposed to the draft; who discouraged enlistments; who harbored deserters; who went into secret societies in order to organize conspiracies in the North, whether they were in this House or in any other place.

"Mr. WINFIELD. The gentleman used the expression, 'men here.' I desire to know whether he intends to charge that there are men here who were in 'secret alliance' with the enemy during the rebellion.

"Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Well, sir, I am unable to say from any personal knowledge whether any such men are here. But, sir, from general reputation and from the votes of gentlemen in opposition to the war—not another man, not another dollar—from speeches made by gentlemen on the other side of the House, I have no doubt some of them are here and have been here during the war.

"Mr. WINFIELD. I do not propose to be tried on general reputation. I desire to say for myself and so far as I know for my associates on this floor of my own school of politics, that the insinuation that we are or ever have been in alliance with rebels is utterly untrue, and if intended to apply to us is a base and unfounded slander.

"Mr. HUNTER. I say that so far as I am concerned it is a base lie."

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. FINCK and Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be excused from voting on this resolution, and I request permission in one minute to give my reasons for it.

Mr. SPEAKER. No debate is now in order except by unanimous consent.

No objection was made.

Mr. HALE. I cannot vote against this resolution without seeming to imply that under any circumstances or considerations would a member on this floor be justified in giving the lie to another, a thing which I can never vote to sustain. I cannot vote for it with no word of explanation without perhaps seeming to imply that I justified the language of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY,] which I certainly do not.

The question being taken on excusing Mr. HALE from voting, it was not agreed to.

Mr. FINCK. I ask to be permitted to give my reasons for voting against the resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. I object.

The question was taken on agreeing to the resolution; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 33, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, James M. Ashley, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Cobb, Conkling, Cullom, Dawes, Delano, Deming, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Griener, Griswold, Hale, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Koontz, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Starr, Stokes, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—77.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Baker, Bergen, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Hise, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Johnson, Le Blond, Leftwich, Niblack, Nicholson, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, and Winfield—33.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Benjamin, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Culver, Darling, Davis, Defrees, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Farnsworth, Glossbrenner, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hart, Hawkins, Henderson, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Loan, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, Morris, Moulton, Newell, Neill, O'Neill, Patterson, Phelps, Plants, Radford, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Schenck, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stilwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Whaley, Woodbridge, and Wright—81.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. I now move that the Speaker proceed to execute the order of the House.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I wish to inquire whether it would be in order for my colleague to address a few remarks to the Chair?

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent he may do so.

Mr. HILL. I trust there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. He does not wish it.

Mr. CHANLER. I object.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I desire to say in explanation of my suggestion that I asked the question of my colleague [Mr. HUNTER] whether he would like to make a few remarks on the subject before the Chair administered the rebuke, and I understood him to say he would. Hence it was I made the suggestion.

Mr. HUNTER. The gentleman misunderstood me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will present himself before the Chair and the order of the House will be executed.

Mr. HUNTER accordingly came forward before the Speaker's desk.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HUNTER, no deliberative body can preserve its self-respect or command the respect of its constituents which tolerates the use of offensive language, condemned by gentlemen everywhere, as well as by parliamentary law. For having transgressed its rules, this House has resolved that you shall be censured by the Speaker. The Chair having thus declared the censure of the House, you will resume your seat.

Mr. HUNTER. May I be allowed to make a single remark?

The SPEAKER. Certainly, if there be no objection.

No objection was made.

Mr. HUNTER. Allow me to say that in using the language which I did, in a moment of irritation at what I considered a false charge, I meant no disrespect to this House.

Mr. HILL. In consideration of the statement just made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HUNTER,] if there be no objection, I will move that no entry be made upon the Journal of this House of these proceedings of censure.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. HILL. As objection is made I will not make the motion.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask permission of the House to make a statement.

No objection was made.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in the heat of debate men often utter words without weighing them well. I have been a member of this House for eight years, during which time I never uttered a word for which I was called to order, or which was regarded as improper until to-day. I have intended to apply unparliamentary or offensive language to no gentleman. I intended to have my remarks of to-day apply generally to all persons, whether here or elsewhere, belonging to the Opposition, who during the war or since were either in open or secret alliance with those engaged in rebellion, who voted against a man or a dollar to prosecute the war, who discouraged enlistments and encouraged desertions, and who were members of secret or open societies to organize conspiracies for the purpose of overthrowing the Government of the United States. I apply those remarks to no other persons, and intended to apply them to no other persons.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. McDONALD, its Chief Clerk, notifying the House that that body had passed a joint resolution and bill of this House, of the following titles, namely:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 244) to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue, without amendment; and

An act (H. R. No. 388) to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia, with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

It further announced that the Senate had indefinitely postponed a bill of the House of the following title, namely:

An act (H. R. No. 522) for the relief of Nathan Noyes.

RECONSTRUCTION—AGAIN.

Mr. JULIAN obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. MYERS, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. ALLISON: The petition of Albert Clark, and 50 others, citizens of Buchanan county, Iowa, against contraction of currency.

By Mr. ANCONA: The petition of Captain George W. Knapp, late of company A, eighty-eighth Pennsylvania volunteers, by his trustee John E. Hook, asking for the passage of an act granting him a pension from July 28, 1862, the date of his discharge, to June 12, 1865, the date of his application for and from which time he receives a pension.

By Mr. BUCKLAND: The petition of Benjamin Sumners, and 65 others, citizens of Erie county, Ohio, for an increase of duty on foreign wines.

By Mr. COBB: A petition of citizens of Richland county, Wisconsin, for the improvement of the channels of water communications between the valley of the Mississippi and the Atlantic sea-board.

By Mr. DAWSON: The petition of James Whaley, Alexander McClean, and Charles Williams, asking an increase of pensions.

By Mr. DRIGGS: The petition of E. S. Ingles, S. W. Abbott, and 228 others, citizens of Menominee, Green Bay, Michigan, for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at the mouth of Menominee river, in said State.

Also, the petition of Loud, Priest & Shepard, with 70 others, citizens of Iosco county, Michigan, praying Congress to make an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Au Sable, Lake Huron, Michigan.

Also, the petition of L. L. McKnight, J. J. Whiting, and 20 others, ship-owners of Detroit and Lake Superior, praying Congress to make an appropriation to improve the harbor at Ontonagon, Michigan.

By Mr. FERRY: The petition of Richard Payne, N. L. Bird, and 46 others, citizens of Mason county, Michigan, praying for relief for improvements of lands occupied upon reservations for the Flint and Pere Marquette railroad, which reservations have been continued by recent legislation.

By Mr. KETCHAM: The petition of W. A. Wheeler, of New York, for relief upon his contracts with the Navy Department.

By Mr. KOONITZ: The petition of John H. Thompson, first sergeant company E, fifteenth Ohio volunteer infantry, and 114 others, officers and privates of regiments from different States, asking for equalization of bounties.

By Mr. LAFLIN: A remonstrance of citizens of Copenhagen, Lewis county, New York, against the passage of an act curtailing the national currency.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: A petition from citizens of New Brighton, Beaver county, Pennsylvania, asking the passage of an act giving adequate protection to all the industrial interests of the country.

By Mr. McINDOE: A petition of citizens of Grand Rapids, Wood county, Wisconsin, in relation to the curtailment of the national currency.

By Mr. MORRILL: The petition of Simmons & Staifer, and 24 others, cigar-makers of Leavenworth, Kansas, asking for specific tax of five dollars per thousand on all domestic cigars.

Also, the petition of C. C. Hoffe, and 20 others, cigar-makers of Utica, New York, asking for a specific tax of five dollars per thousand on all domestic cigars.

Also, the petition of George Reiter, and 25 others, cigar-makers of Fort Wayne, Indiana, asking for a specific tax of five dollars per thousand on all domestic cigars.

By Mr. PAINE: The petition of G. W. Allen, of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for modification of tax on leather.

By Mr. RAYMOND: The petition of Peter Clark and George Mackay, praying for the transfer to them and their associates on suitable terms of Governor's Island, in the bay of New York, to be used as a site for a World's Exchange.

Also, a petition of citizens of Tuckhannock, in Pennsylvania, protesting against the passage of any law compelling the national banks to redeem their notes in New York.

By Mr. WARD, of Kentucky: A petition of sundry citizens of the counties of Pendleton and Brecken, Kentucky, for establishment of mail route from Falmouth, Pendleton county, to Milford, Brecken county, with post office at Flinnsville.

Also, the petition of the Covington Gas-Light Company, asking a modification of the internal revenue laws as amended July 13, 1866, imposing a tax on gas.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 28, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. On motion of Mr. WADE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of Saturday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE. I have a petition from Ohio, numerously signed, setting forth a great many reasons why the capital should be removed nearer to what will be the center of the population of the country in a very short time. The petitioners state that the political opinions prevailing in this part of the country are not so much in accordance or in harmony with our institutions as they would be nearer the center. For these, and a great many other reasons which are here set forth, and some of them very cogent ones, the petitioners ask that the capital may be removed to such a place. I hardly know to what committee this petition should be referred; but I move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I have another petition, numerously signed by cigar-makers in the State of Ohio, setting forth that the duty on cigars is so levied as to do great injury to that business, and they want it so modified that they can afford to live under it. I believe that subject has been acted upon, and I therefore move that the petition be laid upon the table. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I have seven petitions, very numerously signed by citizens of Ohio, praying that the tariff on wool may be increased, approving of the bill passed by the House on the subject at the last session, and asking that it may be passed by the Senate. As that subject has been reported upon, I move that these petitions lie upon the table. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I present two petitions of citizens of Iowa, praying that the Constitution of the United States may be so amended as to provide that there shall be no inequality among citizens on account of birth, race, color, previous inequality, or previous non-residence beyond the present year; and also praying Congress to remove by immediate legislation any such inequality in the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the ten unrestored States, and to take all necessary measures for peace, order, justice, and security of life, liberty, and property in the same. I ask their reference to the joint Committee on Reconstruction. They were so referred.

Mr. GRIMES. I also present the petition of the president, trustees, and overseers of the Burlington University, in the State of Iowa, who pray that Congress may pass an act releasing the right of the United States to a small tract of land unoccupied and unclaimed, as they allege, in that city, to that university for educational purposes, and remonstrating against the memorial of the city council of the city of Burlington, who asked it for similar purposes. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Public Lands. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of John Kirkwood, of Arkansas, praying for a grant of seven sections of land as compensation for services and sacrifices rendered the Government during the rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOWE. I also present a petition from the president and officers of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin, setting forth the great value of the library now owned by Mr. Peter Force, of this city, and urging upon Congress the propriety of purchasing that library. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Library, which has that subject under consideration, and which, I believe, will report a bill for the purchase of the library alluded to. It was so referred.

Mr. HOWE. I have been furnished with some resolutions adopted at a national convention of colored soldiers and sailors on the 10th of January, 1867, and have been asked to present them to the Senate. I have read them. They are very well expressed. They set forth views with which in the main I agree entirely, and I am very glad to be made the medium of communicating them to the Senate. I believe such resolutions are not entitled to be printed under the rule. Am I correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no rule directing the printing.

Mr. HOWE. They can be printed upon motion I think?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to print would go to the Committee on Printing under the rule.

Mr. HOWE. Well, I will move that these resolutions be printed and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be so referred, and the motion to print will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a memorial of citizens of Illinois, remonstrating against the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or a return within a limited time to specie payments, and against compelling national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances, and recommending the withdrawal of all national bank currency and the substitution of United States Treasury notes in their place, and that all Government bonds be taxed as any other property; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Troy Grove, La Salle county, Illinois, praying that the circulating notes of private and national banks may be retired from circulation and replaced by legal-tender notes of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POLAND. I present the petition of William Harris and several other citizens of Windham, in the county of Windham, in the State of Vermont, praying that Congress will refrain from the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency or having in view the return within a limited time to specie payments. They also pray that Congress will refrain from the enactment of any law compelling all national banks, wherever located, to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting national banks from paying or receiving interest on bank balances. They represent that any law compelling national banks to redeem their circulating notes in New York would prove onerous to them, injurious to the business men of their locality, and would ignore the just claims of other sections of the country. They also represent that as the business of nearly every bank in the United States requires it to keep deposits at one of the national banks located in New York, any law prohibiting the receipt or payment of interest upon balances by such banks would operate harshly upon all like institutions located out of that city, and would render wholly unproductive a considerable portion of their capital.

I also present a similar petition from John H. Butler and a considerable number of other persons, residents of Jamaica, in the county of Windham, Vermont, to the same effect.

I also present a similar petition signed by A. B. Foster and various other persons, citizens of Weston, Windsor county, Vermont, to the same effect.

I move that these petitions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

They were so referred.

Mr. POLAND. I also present resolutions, in the nature of a memorial, from the Caledonia Agricultural Society, urgently requesting the congressional delegation from Vermont to exert themselves to the utmost to secure the passage of a bill as favorable to the wool interest as that passed by the House of Representatives during its last session. That subject having been reported upon by the Committee on Finance, I move that these resolutions be laid upon the table. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. YATES presented the petition of J. Nolestine and others, mail route agents on the western division of the Ohio and Mississippi railroad, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Illinois, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, now pending in the Senate; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented a petition of citizens of Vermont, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, now pending in the Senate; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of citizens of Charlton, Saratoga county, New York, praying for the imposition of an increased duty on foreign wool; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. SHERMAN presented three petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, now pending in the Senate, so far as the same relates to duties on wool and woolen manufactures; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. HARRIS presented two petitions of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, now pending in the Senate; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have received a communication from Rev. George W. Hoss, superintendent of public instruction in the State of Indiana, inclosing a memorial to Congress from the commissioner of common schools of Ohio, the superintendent of public instruction of Illinois, and the secretary of the State board of education of Vermont, on the subject of the establishment of a bureau of education. I present this communication more for the purpose of having the views of the writer of the letter to myself go before the committee than the memorial itself. Mr. Hoss has long been connected with the school system of our State. I ask that the communication and memorial be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which I believe has charge of the subject.

They were so referred.

Mr. FESSENDEN presented resolutions of a convention of the sheep-growers of Maine, in favor of an increase of the duty on imported wool; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. CONNESS presented a petition of Joseph Boston, praying for a settlement of the claim of Pablo del a Toba, of Monterey, for cattle furnished for the Indian service in California in 1851; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 820) for the relief of Henry S. Davis, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 543) to abolish and forever prohibit the system of peonage in New Mexico and other parts of the United States, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Jacob Shavor and Albert C. Corse, asking compensation for past use and purchase of an invention for post-marking and cancellation of postage stamps on letters, made by and patented to Marcus P. Norton, of Troy, New York, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

COPYRIGHT BOOKS FOR THE LIBRARY.

Mr. CRESWELL. I am instructed by the joint Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 491) amendatory of the several acts respecting copyrights, to report it back with an amendment, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that every proprietor of a book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph, for which a copyright shall have been secured, who shall fail to deliver to the Library of Congress at Washington a printed copy of every such book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph, within one month after publication shall, for every such default, be subject to a penalty of twenty-five dollars, to be collected at the suit of the Librarian of Congress as other penalties of like amount are now collected by law.

Every such proprietor may transmit any book, pamphlet, map, chart, musical composition, print, engraving, or photograph, for which he may have secured a copyright, to the Librarian of Congress by mail free of postage, provided the words "copyright matter" be plainly written or printed on the outside of the package; and it is to be the duty of the several deputy postmasters when such package shall be delivered to them, to see that it is safely forwarded to its destination by mail without cost or charge to the proprietor.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Library was in lines eleven and fifteen of the first section, to strike out the words:

At the suit of the Librarian of Congress as other penalties of like amount are now collected by law.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

"By the Librarian of Congress, in the name of the United States, in any district or circuit court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the delinquent may reside or be found.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 548) to amend section forty-one of an act to provide a national currency, &c., passed June 30, 1864; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 549) for the establishment and maintenance of a public park in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

RAILROADS IN CALIFORNIA.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, the bill (S. No. 461) to aid in the construction of the San Francisco Central Pacific railroad was recommended to the Committee on Public Lands.

TERRITORIAL OFFICERS.

Mr. WADE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the President be requested at his earliest convenience to inform the Senate how often the present Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs of Colorado Territory has been absent from his post of duty in the Territory since his appointment, what part of his time since the date of his commission has been spent in such absence from the Territory, whether his absence from the Territory has been previously authorized by leave granted in each instance, what was the public necessity for such absence in each case, and for his presence at the national capital at this time, and also whether any part, and if so how much and what part of the expenses of his several trips from the Territory have been charged to the Government.

No objection being offered, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not know that I have any especial objection to the passage of this resolution; but it would please me much more if the honorable Senator, instead of offering such a resolution as this, would call up the bill before the Senate to prohibit the absences of territorial officers from the place of the performance of their duty, and by passing that bill we should have an end to these pilgrimages made by territorial officers, mostly appointed from the East to govern the Territories of the West, to engage in mining speculations, and come back as great men to forward those speculations, and finally occasionally to take a hand in the general politics of the country. If there is any part of the administration of government in the United States that is worse than another, it is the government of the Territories of the United States. An inquiry into their condition, made by Congress, would have a salutary effect with reference to who constitute their officers, where those officers come from, how they came to be appointed, their fitness for the duties to which they have been appointed, and the degree to which they have remained endeavoring at least to perform those duties.

This resolution perhaps will have a salutary effect in one particular case; but it seems to me to be a most shameful waste of the public money and promotion of the abandonment of public duty on our part not to stop the whole abuse to which I have referred, and which this resolution points at.

I believe the honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. WILLIAMS] has charge of the bill of which I have spoken, and I called his attention the other day to the subject and asked him why it was not called up. I believe that his answer was that there was no prospect of its passage. Why, sir, I think upon a presentation of facts demanding the passage of such an act no Senator would vote against it. The Territories of the United States that are to be the States of the future in their infancy are crippled, demoralized, often degraded by the class of men who are sent out to govern them, and the Treasury is plundered in addition.

Mr. WADE. I was under the apprehension that such a bill had been passed.

Mr. CONNESS. It has not been.

Mr. WADE. I know the committee of which I am a member has recommended the passage of such a bill, and I was under the impression that the bill had been passed. If not, I am as much in favor of it as the honorable Senator from California can be. I certainly gave my assent to it in committee, and I supposed it had passed, but it seems I was under a misapprehension. I am in favor of that bill, but I do not think that interferes with this resolution at all. I think it ought to be passed, and I am for the bill also. I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I introduced at the last session the bill to which the Senator from California has referred. It was reported back by the Committee on Territories. I called it up at the last session, and endeavored to procure its passage; but objections were made by several members and amendments proposed, and I found at that time that there were obstacles in the way of its passage. I supposed that at this session the same objections would be made, although I have made no determination as to what I would do in reference to the bill. I supposed that the usual course was, where a bill was referred to the Committee on Territories and reported back by the committee, the chairman of the committee would rather have charge of it. I am not particularly advised as to the practice in that respect. I am desirous that the bill should be passed. I think it will correct a very great and growing evil in this country, and it was with that view that I introduced it at the last session; and if an opportunity affords, and nobody else calls up the bill, I will take occasion to bring it before the Senate at an early day.

Mr. WADE. I do not know what the practice of the Senate has been or if there is any settled practice about the point suggested by the Senator from Oregon; but when a gentleman sends a bill to our committee and we report it back favorably I suppose he is to see that it is called up, though I have not acted myself on that supposition always. It may be in this way it has slipped my mind. I thought that bill had passed.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope between the two Senators the bill will be called up at an early day for action.

Mr. WADE. Very well.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It seems to me that it would be rather a small business to make inquiry about some particular man when we all know that this is an abuse from all the Territories; it is not confined to any one. It is a crying abuse, and I think this resolution ought to be amended so as to include all the territorial officers. I am not willing to vote to inquire into the conduct of any one particular officer when we all know that he is as little to blame as others. I move to strike out the name of the particular officer there and insert "Governors, secretaries, and judges of the several Territories." Then we shall have some information that will be useful.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection to the amendment, only I want to specify the delinquencies of each.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It will have that effect.

Mr. WADE. I have no objection to make it general.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, at his earliest convenience, to inform the Senate how often the Governors, secretaries, and judges of the several Territories have been absent from their posts of duty in the Territories since their appointments; what part of their time since the date of their commissions has been spent in such absence from the Territories; whether their absence has been previously authorized by leave granted in each instance; what was the public necessity for such absence in each case and for their presence at the national capital, if any of them have been there or are there at this time; and also whether any part, and if so how much and what part, of the expenses of their several trips to the seat of Government have been charged to the Government.

PRESIDENTIAL TERM OF OFFICE.

Mr. POLAND. On Saturday the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary reported a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States restricting the presidential office to a single term. I intended at that time to give notice that when the resolution is brought up for consideration I shall move to amend it by extending the term from four to six years. A majority of the committee did not deem it advisable to make that amendment to the resolution; but I feel authorized to say that that change will probably be satisfactory to a majority, perhaps to every member of the committee. I am in favor of the principle of the resolution, but in favor of extending the term from four to six years.

WILLIAM D. NELSON.

Mr. LANE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 160. It is a resolution which passed the House at the last session, and will not take a moment to pass it.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 160) for the relief of William D. Nelson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to William D. Nelson of $1,000 for his services in recruiting for the Union Army in East Tennessee during the years 1861 and 1862.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. LANE. I will explain in a moment the circumstances of the case. The joint resolution is accompanied by a long report from the Military Committee of the House of Representatives; but the facts may be briefly stated. Mr. Nelson was a citizen of East Tennessee at the beginning of the rebellion; and without having any commission he recruited a thousand men, made sixteen trips over the mountains of East Tennessee to Kentucky, and put his men into the Army at the expense of his property and the hazard of his life. He never received a commission in the Army. These recruits were all forwarded to the Army without any expense of transportation to the Government, he bearing the whole responsibility. Our committee thought that for a thousand men $1,000 was the least possible compensation he ought to have. The proof was positive as to all the facts.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that we may possibly establish a very bad precedent in this case. If every person who was instrumental in securing the recruitment of individuals during the war is to be paid a dollar a head we may deplete the Treasury to a greater extent than is apparent on the face of the resolution or than anybody may suppose who is in favor of its passage. I think it is a new principle. We have never done such a thing before, and it would be well for us to ponder on the subject a little before we agree to do it. I apprehend that there are thousands and tens of thousands of cases that stand precisely on the same principle; and unless there is something very extraordinary in this case which has not been detailed to us by the Senator from Indiana, and which we do not know as yet, it seems to me we ought not to pass the resolution.

Mr. LANE. I know of no other single case having been presented to any committee embracing any of the facts substantially that are embraced in this case. This is the case of a Union man doing all he could to sustain the Union cause, driven out from home, carrying refugees from the mountains of East Tennessee to Kentucky, making sixteen trips as is shown by the papers, and only asking $1,000 for it. I do not think it is possible that very many similar cases will be presented, but just as often as a similar case is presented I shall be in favor of allowing compensation.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, the proof shows, in addition to what has been stated by my friend from Indiana, that after he had carried upward of a thousand troops to the Union Army, Mr. Nelson himself, being fifty-five years of age, entered the service with four of his sons, two of whom were killed in battle, and the father and the two surviving sons served three years and were honorably discharged. I think the compensation proposed is very inadequate for the services of Mr. Nelson; but I had nothing to do with getting up the bill. If I had introduced it I should have asked for a greater sum.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CATHERINE WELSH.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the bill (H. R. No. 486) for the relief of Catherine Welsh was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that Catherine Welsh, widow of private John Welsh, late of company E, twenty-sixth regiment of Illinois volunteer infantry, shall be authorized to receive the bounty, back pay, and allowances due to John Welsh, without being required to make other or further proof of his death than that already furnished.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1058) for the relief of the minor children of Solomon Long;

A bill (H. R. No. 1059) for the relief of Sylvanus Sawyer and William E. Ward; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1079) to provide for examinations of the Treasury Department and other Executive Departments.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 244) to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

HABEAS CORPUS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 605, which we had up in the morning hour a few days ago, and which was laid over at the request of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 605) to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789.

Mr. TRUMBULL. When this bill was up the other day the Senator from Maryland suggested that under it a judge of a United States court in one part of the Union would be authorized to issue a writ of habeas corpus to bring before him a person confined in another and a remote part of the Union. I do not think the bill is susceptible of that construction. I think the judges and courts would under the bill be confined to their respective jurisdictions; but if the language is so broad that the Senator from Maryland thinks it may be susceptible of that construction, I shall have no objection to amending it by inserting after the word "courts" in the fourth line of the first section the words "within their respective jurisdictions;" so that it would then read, "that the several courts of the United States and the several justices and judges of such courts, within their respective jurisdictions," &c. If that will meet the views of the Senator from Maryland, I will move that amendment, or if he prefers, he can move an amendment in such form satisfactory to him as will accomplish the same object.

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment proposed by the honorable chairman is entirely satisfactory to me. I suggested the necessity of an amendment the other day because I know that the late Chief Justice of the United States decided that under the laws as they stand process issued by a judge of the Supreme Court in cases where those judges have a right to issue process extends all over the Union. That I am satisfied might lead to a practical evil. The amendment proposed by the honorable chairman is entirely satisfactory to me and removes that difficulty.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill read the third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

COUNTERFEITING, ETC., PUBLIC SECURITIES.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 719.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 719) to punish certain crimes in relation to the public securities and currency, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section provides that if any person or persons shall buy, sell, exchange, transfer, receive, or deliver any false, forged, counterfeited or altered bond, bill, certificate of indebtedness, certificate of deposit, coupon, draft, check, bill of exchange, money order, indorsement, United States note, Treasury note, circulating note, postage stamp, revenue stamp, postage stamp note, fractional note, or other obligation or security of the United States, or circulating note of any banking association organized or acting under the laws of the United States, which has been issued or may hereafter be passed under any act of Congress heretofore issued, or which may hereafter be passed, with the intent, expectation, or belief that the same shall or will be passed, altered, published, or used as true and genuine, such person or persons so offending shall be deemed guilty of felony, and on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned not more than fifteen years, or fined not more than $10,000, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The second section makes it unlawful to design, engrave, print, or in any manner make or execute, or to utter, issue, distribute, circulate, or use any business or professional card, notice, placard, circular, handbill, or advertisement, in the likeness or similitude of any bond, certificate of indebtedness, certificate of deposit, coupon, United States note, Treasury note, circulating note, fractional note, postage stamp, note, or other obligation or security of the United States, or of any banking association organized or acting under the laws thereof, which has been or may be issued under or authorized by any act of Congress heretofore passed or which may hereafter be passed. Any person or persons offending against the provisions of this section shall, on conviction, be fined $1,000, to be recovered by an action of debt, one half to the use of the informer.

The third section makes it unlawful to write, print, or otherwise impress upon any bond, certificate of indebtedness, or other instrument specified in the preceding section, any business or professional card, notice or advertisement, or any notice or advertisement of any goods, wares, or merchandise, or of any drug or medicine, or of any invention or patent, and prescribes a penalty of $300, to be recovered by action of debt, one half to the use of the informer.

Section four provides that if any person shall, without authority from the United States, take, procure, make, or cause to be taken, procured, or made, upon lead, foil, wax, plaster, paper, or any other substance or material, an impression, stamp, or imprint of, from, or by the use of any bed-plate, bed-piece, die, roll, plate, seal, type, or other tool, implement, instrument, or thing used or fitted or intended to be used in printing, stamping, or impressing, or in making other tools, implements, instruments, or things to be used or fitted or intended to be used in printing, stamping, or impressing any kind or description of bond, bill, note, certificate, coupon, or other paper, obligation, security, or instrument now authorized or hereafter to be authorized by law, to be executed, altered, delivered, given, issued, or put in circulation by, for, or in behalf of the United States, such person shall be deemed guilty of felony, and, on conviction, be punished by imprisonment not more than fifteen years nor less than five years, or by fine not less than $5,000, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The fifth section provides the same punishment for any person who shall have in his possession, keeping, custody, or control, without authority from the United States, any imprint, stamp, or impression, taken or made upon any substance or material whatsoever, of any tool, implement, instrument, or thing used or fitted, or intended to be used for any or either of the purposes mentioned in the preceding section, or who shall sell, give, or deliver any such imprint, stamp, or impression, to any other person.

The sixth section provides for the same punishment for any person, whether employed under the United States or not, who shall, without authority from the United States, secrete within, embezzle, or take and carry away from any building, room, office, apartment, vault, safe, or other place where the same is kept, used, employed, placed, lodged, or deposited by authority of the United States, any bed-piece, bed-plate, roll, plate, die, seal, type, or other tool, implement, or thing used, or fitted to be used in stamping or printing, or in making some other tool or implement used, or fitted to be used, in stamping or printing any kind or description of bond, bill, note, certificate, coupon, postage stamp, revenue stamp, fractional currency, note, or other paper, instrument, obligation, device, or document, now authorized or hereafter to be authorized by law to be printed, stamped, sealed, prepared, issued, uttered, or put in circulation by or on behalf of the United States; or who shall, without such authority, so secrete, embezzle, or take and carry away any paper, parchment, or other material prepared and intended to be used in the making of any or either of such papers, instruments, obligations, devices, or documents; or who shall, without such authority, so secrete, embezzle, or take and carry away any paper, parchment, or other material printed or stamped, in whole or in part, and intended to be prepared, issued, or put in circulation, by or on behalf of the United States, as one of the papers, instruments, or obligations hereinbefore named, or printed, or stamped, in whole or in part, in the similitude of any such paper, instrument, or obligation, whether it be intended to issue or put the same in circulation or not.

Section seven imposes the same punishment on any person who shall take and carry away, without authority from the United States, from the place where it has been filed, lodged, or deposited, or where it may for the time being actually be kept by authority of the United States, any certificate, affidavit, deposition, written statement of facts, power of attorney, receipt, voucher, assignment, or other document, record, file, or paper, prepared, fitted, or intended to be used or presented in order to procure the payment of money from or by the United States, or any officer or agent thereof, or the allowance or payment of the whole or any part of any claim, account, or demand against the United States, whether the same has or has not already been so used or presented, and whether such claim, account, or demand, or any part thereof, has or has not already been allowed or paid; or any person who shall present or use, or attempt to use, any such document, record, file, or paper, so taken and carried away, in order to procure the payment of any money from or by the United States, or any officer or agent thereof, or the allowance or payment of the whole or any part of any claim, account, or demand against the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDRICKS subsequently said: I desire to make a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of House bill No. 719. It is a bill that was reported at the last session by the Committee on the Judiciary. I am of the impression, and I think the chairman is also of that impression, that the penalties are left higher than the committee intended. I wish to interpose the motion to reconsider now to avoid the engrossment of the bill, and we can examine it and see if that be the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 1058) for the relief of the minor children of Solomon Long—to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (H. R. No. 1059) for the relief of Sylvanus Sawyer and William E. Ward—to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

A bill (H. R. No. 1079) to provide for examinations of the Treasury Department and other Executive Departments—to the Committee on Finance.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 486) for the relief of Catherine Welsh; and the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 160) for the relief of William D. Nelson; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

ABSENCE OF TERRITORIAL OFFICERS.

On motion of Mr. WADE, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 32) to prevent the absence of territorial officers from their official duties.

Mr. GRIMES. I would suggest that some of the words in the first line of the first section be transposed so as to read "no person now in office in any Territory," instead of "no person in any Territory now in office."

Mr. WILLIAMS. The phraseology used in the bill is intended to include persons who are now in the Territory in office, and the subsequent portion of the section is intended to embrace persons who may hereafter be appointed to office by the President. If the phraseology be changed as proposed, it will not apply to persons now in office.

Mr. GRIMES. I inquire whether, if the bill stands as reported, it will include persons who hold a commission for an office who are now outside of the Territory?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think there is some force in this phraseology. Suppose a man is in the city of Washington now who has been appointed to office in a Territory. He holds the office in the Territory, but he is not in the Territory, and if he is not there within thirty days then he is to be, by the terms of this bill, removed from office. The bill, as it was originally prepared was intended to apply to persons now in the Territory holding office, and to provide that any such persons who should absent themselves from the Territory for thirty days should be removed; and this provision is made for persons who may be hereafter appointed to office. The object is to allow persons who are now appointed to office, but have not yet assumed the performance of the duties, time to go there and enter upon the discharge of their duties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I call for the order of the day, the unfinished business of Saturday.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

During the consideration of the tariff bill, the following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. W. G. MOORE, his Secretary:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I am directed by the President to return to the Senate, in which House it originated, the bill (S. No. 462) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union, with his objections thereto in writing.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President had approved and signed on the 22d instant the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 177) to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of James Pool;

A bill (S. No. 388) for the relief of Lewis Dyer, late surgeon of the eighty-first regiment Illinois volunteers; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 151) appropriating money to defray the expenses of the joint select Committee on Retrenchment.

TARIFF BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of Saturday, which is the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes. This bill has been reported to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole, and the question is in concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before that question is put, I should like to have certain amendments that were made in committee rejected. I cannot enumerate them all; they are simply as to sums or rates, and I should like to have the corrections made now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that there is but one amendment which was made in Committee of the Whole. It is true that amendment was amended in divers particulars, but the question is simply upon concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole; and if the amendment be concurred in it will not then be in order without a violation of the rules to amend it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. But there are several amendments made at the suggestion of the Committee on Finance which we do not wish the Senate to concur in, because they were moved under a mistake. I cannot enumerate them all now, but they are very slight generally. If there is no objection I should like to dispose of them before the general question of concurrence is put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair meant to suggest that the mode which the rules prescribe is that the amendment must be corrected before it is concurred in, because after the amendment shall have been concurred in it will not be in order to alter or modify it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I wish to make my corrections now. I call attention first to page 47, line one hundred and fifty-six of section nine. The Committee on Finance moved to strike out "forty" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to read "on bromine, seventy-five cents per pound." We do not wish that amendment concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that in the line referred to by him "seventy-five" be stricken out and "forty" inserted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My motion is that that amendment be not concurred in. I wish to except it from the general amendments. In Committee of the Whole we struck out "forty" and inserted "seventy-five." Now I wish to restore "forty," and I suppose that can be done by simply not concurring in that amendment made in committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The object can only be attained by amending the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. The Senator from Maine moves to amend that amendment by striking out "seventy-five" in the line referred to and inserting "forty," so as to read:

On bromine, forty cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; I do not care how it is put so that the original amount is restored.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the next line, one hundred and fifty seven, "sixty-five cents" was stricken out and "one dollar" inserted; so as to read:

On bromide of potassium, of sodium, and of ammonium, one dollar per pound.

I move now to strike out "one dollar" and insert "sixty-five cents."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line five hundred and seventy-two of the same section, on page 64, I move to amend the amendment by striking out "forty" and inserting "thirty-three," so as to restore the item to what it was originally:

On quinia, quiniidia, and all their salts, thirty-three cents per ounce.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line six hundred and fifty-two of the same section, on page 67, I move to strike out "and twenty-five cents;" so as to read:

On strychnia and salts of strychnia, or strychnine, one dollar per ounce.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line seven hundred and seventeen of that section, on page 70, the word "chemicals" was struck out. I wish it to be restored, and I therefore move to insert it now.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a very considerable number of amendments that the committee wish to make to the text by way of correcting, phraseology, &c. I suppose that can be done after the general question is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In strictness, if the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, they will be understood as concurring in it as it stands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will it not then be open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Only by way of addition. The amendment will then have become the text of the bill, and no corrections or alterations can be made in it, inasmuch as the Senate will have concurred in it as it stands.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that so far as the Senate have gone they have made amendments to an amendment. Now, if we concur in the amendments made to the amendment that amendment will still be open to correction and amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. The whole proposition is but one amendment. The Committee of the Whole amended that amendment or substitute in various forms, but it is still all one amendment; and if the Senate concur in it they concur in it as one amendment, and it then stands as the text of the bill, not subject by the rules to alteration, having been concurred in in a certain form.

Mr. SHERMAN. The difficulty can all be avoided by simply postponing the question of concurrence until the last stage. The amendment made as in Committee of the Whole is still open to amendment, and the question of concurring in it can be postponed until all the amendments to be moved to it are offered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose of course the amendment is open to amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now. Any amendment to the amendment is proper now, and then the question will be taken on the amendment as amended.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand we can go on and make amendments now to the original amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I will propose my amendments now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Allow me to inquire whether it would not be in order to concur in the amendments to the amendment in the Senate, and then leave the amendment open to be amended hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not the question. The question now is, whether the Senate will concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, and that amendment is a substitute for the whole bill. If the Senate concur in the amendment made as Committee of the Whole it will not then be susceptible of amendment, being an amendment already agreed to and concurred in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not wish to take anybody by surprise, and it would not be right to do so upon any bill, and more especially upon a bill of this character. When I moved on Saturday evening to take the bill out of committee I had reference simply to taking the amendment out of committee, considering that in fact as the original bill. I do not want anybody to lose any rights he may have had previous to that time to offer amendments. If the amendment is still open to any amendments to be proposed in the Senate it is all right. I understand the Chair to rule that it is still open to amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is, certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well, I have amendments to offer.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the Senator proceeds I should like to have an understanding with regard to the amendments to the amendment which have already been acted upon. There are some of those, certainly one, on which many of us would like a separate vote. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio was to the point that we should proceed to complete the amended bill on the motion of the Senator from Maine, go as far as we can in that, reserving the amendments which have already been acted upon for consideration at the end.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose any amendment to the amendment that was adopted in committee may be reserved from the general vote on all the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Any alteration of the present amendment is perfectly in order being moved as an amendment to the amendment. Anything may be stricken out, anything may be inserted, as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then we can move to strike out amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole, or can offer any amendment now.

Mr. WADE. I think we had better reconsider the vote taking the bill out of committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, no, because it is all open to amendment yet.

Mr. WADE. Then it does not vary it at all, and I do not see that we gain anything by considering the bill in the Senate instead of in committee. But if there is no embarrassment attending the bill in its present stage I shall not press my suggestion; otherwise I think we had better put the bill back in committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The President rules that any amendment may be proposed to the amendment.

Mr. WADE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is perfectly in order for any Senator to move any amendment to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. Any motion to strike out or alter any part of it, or to add to it, is perfectly in order.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 4, section one, line sixty-nine, the word "cacao" where it occurs should be "cocoa."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made, it being a clerical mistake.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On the same page, line sixty-nine, I move to insert the words "of all kinds" after the word "bitters," and to strike out the words "of all kinds" where they occur after "spirits;" so that it will read:

On cordials, liqueurs, and bitters of all kinds containing spirits, and on arrack, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 102, section eighteen, line ninety, I move to strike out the letter "i" in the word "litchens."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 4, section one, line eighty-three, after the words "bay water," I move to insert "containing fifty per cent. or less of alcohol;" so that the clause will read:

On bay rum or bay water containing fifty per cent. or less of alcohol, $1 50 per proof gallon.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 17, section four, line twenty-seven, after the words "Italian cloths" I move to strike out the words "and lastings."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 32, section seven, line one hundred and seventy-two, I move to strike out the words "one and" before "three fourths," and after three fourths to insert "of one;" so that it will read:

On cast-iron, steam, gas, or water-pipe, three fourths of one cent per pound.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 56, section nine, I move to strike out lines three hundred and seventy-six and lines three hundred and seventy-seven, in these words:

On all extracts of litmus, extracts of orchil or archil, or other lichens, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

They are already provided for in another part of the bill.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 65, section nine, line five hundred and ninety-one, I move to insert the word "crystalized" after "salts;" so that it will read:

On Glauber salts, crystalized, one half cent per pound.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 101, section eighteen, line sixty-eight, after the word "long"

I move to insert the word "drawn;" so as to read:

Hair of the horse, long drawn, and used for weaving, &c.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Does that change the duties?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; it is merely a more accurate definition.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 102, section eighteen, line ninety-two, after the word "lichens" I move to insert "prepared or;" so as to read:

Litmus and lichens, prepared or not prepared.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 12, section three, line seven, after the word "goat" I move to insert the word "camel;" so as to read:

All wools, hair of the alpaca, goat, camel, and other like animals, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 20, section four, lines one hundred and eleven, one hundred and seventeen, and one hundred and nineteen, I move the same amendment, to insert "camel" after "goat."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 49, section nine, line two hundred and six, I move to strike out the word "or" after "word," and to insert "and."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 49, section nine, line four hundred and twenty-one, after the words "salad oil" I move to insert "or table oil."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 75, section ten, line one hundred and twenty-six, I move to strike out the word "exclusively" at the end of the line.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 84, section twelve, lines thirty-seven and thirty-nine, I move after the word "of" to insert "goat or," so as to read, "on mats of goat or sheepskins," &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 88, section fourteen, line thirty-seven, after the word "pack" I move to insert "of not more than fifty-two cards."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 89, section fifteen, line twenty-four, I move to strike out the word "or" before the word "oats," and after the word "oats" to insert "or other grain not herein otherwise provided for;" so that the clause will read:

On flour and meal, middlings, and mill feed of wheat, rye, oats, or other grain not herein otherwise provided for, fifteen per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 106, section nineteen, line seventeen, after "fire-crackers" I move to insert "double-headers, rockets, and fire-works."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 80, section eleven, I move to strike out the proviso in lines twenty-two, twenty-three, and twenty-four, in these words:

Provided, That the true allowance for boxes or other packages containing the same shall be twenty per cent. of the gross weight.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 17, section four, line forty-two, after "wool" I move to insert "or worsted;" so as to read, "on hosiery, composed wholly or in part of wool or worsted, comprising shirts," &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the duty imposed by this bill on various kinds of saws. I do not profess myself to be very much acquainted with the subject, but I was requested by a gentleman who is extensively engaged in the manufacture of these saws to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the duties as fixed in the bill will destroy the business in this country entirely. The gentleman was a Mr. Hoe, celebrated, I believe, for his invention of a printing-press, who is now extensively engaged in this business, and he has furnished me with some tables on the subject. It seems to me, if his estimates are right, that the duty is altogether too low, and I call the attention of the Senate to it, and will state what he thought it ought to be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In what part of the bill is it?

Mr. WADE. It is on page 34. The first amendment that he suggests is in line two hundred and twenty-four of section seven. The bill now reads, "on cross-cutsaws, twelve cents per lineal foot." He wants to make it twenty-five cents instead of twelve. Then in line two hundred and twenty-five, "on mill, pit, and drag saws, not over nine inches wide, fifteen cents per lineal foot," he proposes to insert thirty-five cents, and instead of a duty of twenty-five cents per lineal foot on those saws over nine inches wide he proposes forty cents. The next clause of the bill reads now in this way:

On all hand-saws not over twenty-four inches in length, $1 25 per dozen, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem; over twenty-four inches in length, two dollars per dozen, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

He proposes to amend that clause so as to read:

On all hand-saws not over twenty-four inches in length, two dollars per dozen, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem; over twenty-four inches in length, three dollars per dozen, and, in addition thereto, forty per cent. ad valorem.

Then the next clause reads in this way:

On all back-saws not exceeding ten inches in length, one dollar per dozen, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem; over ten inches in length, $1 50 per dozen, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

He proposes to amend that clause so as to make it read:

On all back-saws not exceeding ten inches in length, two dollars per dozen, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem; over ten inches in length, three dollars per dozen, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

Those amendments this gentleman, who is extensively engaged in the business, and the other intelligent gentlemen who were with him thought ought to be made. As for my own ideas on the subject they are good for nothing, for I do not profess to have any particular knowledge, not having had my attention directed to it; but I call the attention of the Senate and of the committee to the statement of this gentleman, that the present rate fixed by the bill would be destructive to that business. All I wish to do is to call the attention of the Senate to it. I hope that they will come to the conclusion that the amendment I have suggested ought to be made.

Mr. MORGAN. Owing to the increase of the duty on steel some amendment I think is necessary in relation to the duty on saws. The duty is considerably less on the saws than it ought to be. It ranges from twenty-seven to thirty per cent. in the bill as reported by the committee. I have an amendment which has been considered by the committee, and I will offer it as an amendment of the committee, which increases the duty to a certain extent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understood the Senator from Ohio to offer an amendment.

Mr. WADE. I have only called the attention of the Senate to the subject. I do not offer any amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following as an amendment of the committee: on page 34, section seven, strike out lines two hundred and twenty-four, two hundred and twenty-five, two hundred and twenty-six, and two hundred and twenty-seven, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

On cross-cut saws fifteen cents per lineal foot; on mill, pit, and drag saws, not over nine inches wide, twenty cents per lineal foot; over nine inches wide, thirty-five cents per lineal foot.

And as a part of the same amendment I move to strike out lines two hundred and thirty-three, two hundred and thirty-four, two hundred and thirty-five, two hundred and thirty-six, and two hundred and thirty-seven, and in lieu thereof to insert:

On all back saws not exceeding ten inches in length $1 25 per dozen, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem; over ten inches in length two dollars per dozen, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the bill on page 85, section thirteen, by striking out lines thirty-six and thirty-seven:

On grindstones, unfinished, ten per cent. ad valorem.
On grindstones, finished, five dollars per ton.

And inserting in lieu thereof:

On grindstones, and on soapstone, freestone, sandstone, granite, and all building or monumental stone, except marble, five dollars per ton of thirteen cubic feet.

And then to strike out on page 86, lines fifty-seven, fifty-eight, fifty-nine, sixty, and sixty-one, as follows:

On paving stones, slabs, and flags, not dressed, and on Nova Scotia stone, Caen stone, and all building stones, cut or dressed, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

On building, paving, or monumental stones, of every description, cut or dressed, two dollars per ton of thirteen cubic feet.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear some reasons from the Senator, if he has any to offer, why that should be done.

Mr. WADE. I am informed, and I have some letters here showing, that these stones are brought in from Nova Scotia and from Canada in competition with our own quarries to an extent that renders the business very unproductive here. The duty on the article of grindstones, dressed, as it stands in the bill does not amount to anything hardly. The stones in the quarry where they lie in a foreign country are not worth scarcely anything. Nobody wants to use them about there. Almost all their value consists in the labor that is bestowed upon them to get them out and bring them to market. So the contest is about the labor; whether it shall be done by our own people, or whether it shall be done abroad.

I am informed that undressed grindstones are really almost finished when they come in here in competition with our own. They are brought in in such a shape that the word "finished" in the law is a very uncertain term. They can bring in the stones almost finished—sometimes, I am told, all perhaps but drilling a hole for a crank, or something of the kind—and thus entirely defeat the law so far as that provision is concerned. I should be willing to agree to strike out the word "finished" and say "on all grindstones, five dollars per ton." I would have no objection to that; but as it now stands it is evaded entirely by the fact that they bring them in and call them unfinished stones when the work on them has been almost entirely completed. That I am told is the way in which this duty is evaded, and they thus come in competition with our own stone. I do not suppose that the consumers of these stones would be affected at all by the duty that I propose upon them. The work is all done in Canada and Nova Scotia, where they get them, and where I am told labor can be procured for about seventy-five cents per day; in this country it would cost three times that, probably.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Say a dollar a day.

Mr. WADE. Well, say a dollar, if that suits any better; but that is different from what I am told. Labor is undoubtedly a great deal cheaper there than it is here. But when they bring these stones here in competition with our own they do not graduate their price by what they can afford to sell at, but by what we can afford to sell our article at with our enhanced labor; so that the consumer of the stones really does not get them any cheaper. It will yield a great deal of revenue if we impose this duty, while the stones will not come any dearer than they do now, as they gauge their price, not by what they can afford to sell them at, but what they can force us to pay. I think there ought to be this protection upon these kinds of stone. I have coupled them together because I know that in Connecticut, and in various other parts of the country, these free-stones are an article of very extensive use, and they have competition from the same source, as I understand; but I leave that part of the proposition to be stated by those gentlemen who are more particularly concerned in it. I hope, sir, that this alteration will be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, the question, I apprehend, is not precisely as has been stated by the honorable Senator. The committee fixed this duty after very considerable deliberation on both clauses, and the Senator, although there is no sort of connection between them, has coupled them all together for the reason, I suppose, that by so doing he may couple votes together, so that those interested in one part of his proposition will vote for the other, whether they care anything about it or not.

Now, sir, the fact is simply this: grindstones for the section of country all along the Atlantic are brought from Nova Scotia. They are a rough article, and are used by everybody. Every farmer has a grindstone; all the mills have large grindstones; and they make a considerable item of expense. Stone out of which to make them is not found along our Atlantic border; but near Cleveland, in the State of Ohio, near where the Senator lives, there is a grindstone quarry, and I am told it is the only one in the western country. I am informed by a Senator near me that nobody ever saw out there a grindstone that did not come from that quarry; and I suppose nobody ever saw on the Atlantic a grindstone that did. The reason is a very simple one. They do not interfere with each other at all. The grindstones from Nova Scotia cannot interfere with the grindstones in the West, for the simple reason that the cost of transportation is so very great on these heavy articles that none go from the Atlantic to the West and none come from the West to the Atlantic. Then the effect of this proposition is simply to impose a very heavy burden on those who use them on the Atlantic border by imposing a very heavy duty that they must pay, or else take their grindstones from the West and pay the great expense of the transportation of that large, rough, and heavy article. They do not interfere with each other a particle; and the effect of this increased duty would be to impose this additional burden upon every man, either in the East or in the West, who uses a grindstone.

Well, sir, what are they? They are a rough article; they come in perfectly rough; the block cut out perhaps a little rounded and a hole bored through the middle of it, but the finishing not done at all; and we impose a heavier duty on the finished article in order to have the finishing done in this country. The only effect of putting so heavy a duty on a rough stone of that description, so heavy and in such general use, will be to increase the profits largely of this Cleveland quarry, increase the cost to the consumers in that section of country, and, if possible, force the people on the Atlantic border to purchase them at the great additional expense of transportation by railroad.

Mr. HENDERSON. It makes the article pay more into the Federal Treasury?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly; it makes it pay more money into the Federal Treasury; but the query is, whether we should receive more? I want to read a letter to show what the effect will be. Here is a letter addressed to a Senator of this body, which I will read:

"I notice by the papers that the tariff bill is expected to be a matter of action by the Senate in the early part of next week. I do not know the features of the bill as passed by the House as I have had no copy; but I wish to call your attention to one article which I understand it is proposed to subject to a greatly increased duty. I allude to grindstones. The cost of this article in Nova Scotia is not far from ten dollars per ton; the present duty is ten per cent. ad valorem, or about one dollar per ton. I learn that the bill as it passed the House charges a duty of five dollars per ton specific, or equal to fifty per cent. ad valorem, and I understand that an effort is being made by certain interested parties (I believe from Cleveland) to even increase this advance to ten dollars per ton in order to give them the entire control of the supply to the whole country from their quarries. The quantity of grindstones imported into this place is about eight thousand tons per annum. The company with which I am connected as president use fully one thousand tons per annum, and should this additional sum of ten dollars per ton become a law, we should be taxed $9,000 per annum extra, or four and a quarter percent. per annum on our whole capital, which is $400,000, in order to put money into the pockets of these interested parties.

"We are already paying to the Government $40,000 per annum for internal tax on $800,000 annual manufacture, which is ten per cent. on our capital, aside from the duties on imported iron and steel which we use; and to add to the extra duty proposed would give the Government the 'lion's share' of the profits. As the House in their bill propose to exempt certain agricultural tools from taxation as I learn, it appears to me that the ax has the first claim to consideration. It precedes all other tools in the greatest western march, and every facility for its manufacture should be given rather than by adding to its cost check its use."

This letter is from the president of the Douglas Ax Company, Mr. Eustis.

Mr. HENDERSON. The increase of duty does not affect the Cleveland quarry or the manufacture there. They could not transport grindstones from there to the East. It only makes you pay more revenue to the Government.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It only makes us pay more revenue, unless that addition is sufficient to cover the transportation from Cleveland and make it cheaper for us to get them from there.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is the point.

Mr. GRIMES. It gives the Cleveland people an excuse for charging us more for our grindstones in the West.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of course if you raise the price on the Atlantic border you will raise the price in the West, so that every man who uses a grindstone will pay an additional duty. Now, sir, it struck the committee that an increased duty on such a coarse, rough article as this, which must have this effect upon all persons who use it and impose such a heavy burden on manufacturers, who are already paying so large a sum to the Government for internal revenue tax and otherwise, would be a little severe for the mere purpose of enabling this quarry in Cleveland to raise its own prices for grindstones, either under the pretense or under the fact that the duty was so much enhanced on the Atlantic border.

Mr. WADE. They could not change their prices.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know whether they could or not. It looks as if they thought that by imposing this duty, as the Senator from Iowa says, they could, under pretense of the duty, charge a higher price to everybody that buys of them. They would charge more as a matter of course. They are not interfered with, and cannot be interfered with in any way by the importation of these stones from Nova Scotia; and the only effect is precisely that which I have stated. To charge one dollar duty on what costs ten would seem to be sufficient on such a coarse, rough article as this, used to the extent it is, especially when we secure the finishing out of the article in this country by a duty of five dollars per ton on the finished article.

Another letter has been handed to me, which I will read. It is directed to Mr. Dodge, of the House:

"We are importers of and dealers in foreign grindstones in this city. We import them from England, France, and Nova Scotia to a limited extent, but the stones are used by all manufacturers of edged tools, machinists, founders, &c. The foreign stones are unlike in quality to any found in this country, and for certain purposes we have no stones in the United States that will answer their purpose. Under the present tariff we pay a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem. The Wells tariff increases the duty to twenty per cent."

We have put it back to ten per cent.

"This the article will bear without detriment to our business; but a specific duty of five dollars per ton, as per bill passed by the Senate committee, would be disastrous to a large class of importers, dealers, and manufacturers, as it would amount to a prohibition of foreign grindstones."

Now, sir, I have stated the reasons as applicable to the article of grindstones. With regard to these other stones, which the Senator has connected in the same category, the committee had the subject under consideration, examined it very carefully, and on the building-stone which comes in from Nova Scotia, and of which I know something, imposed a duty of two dollars per ton, double the duty that is imposed on these other stones. It is used principally in making fronts for stores, houses, &c., and I do not know that it interferes with anybody to any extent. The Nova Scotia stone—I have seen the article; it is used in my city somewhat—is a yellowish stone, quite soft, and easily worked, differing entirely in all its qualities, color, and everything else from the stone that is quarried in Connecticut, and I suppose from the stone that is quarried in New Jersey. My colleague on the committee from New York [Mr. MORGAN] states that in his belief nineteen twentieths of the stone used in the city of New York comes from the quarries in New Jersey and Connecticut, and probably more. I do not know anything about that. I know, with regard to this Nova Scotia stone, that in rebuilding the city of Portland we have used it somewhat, but not exclusively. We have used other stone. One important building was erected with it.

The committee did not think that on a rough article like that, unfinished, imported as it is, of course the freight being considerable, used for buildings, for stores, houses, &c., although used principally by those who want to build handsome erections, it would be advisable to put a very heavy duty, inasmuch as it did not and could not interfere injuriously with the stones that are quarried in our own country. I am told with regard to the quarry in Connecticut, by a colleague on the committee who lives in the vicinity, that it has been from the beginning highly prosperous, making money, and flourishing, and is so at this day in every way. Now, why they should want so heavy a duty on building material of another description of stone is rather a mystery to me; and I think pushing these duties to so high a point upon rough articles of this description, which are of great necessity to the people, is hardly advisable.

I have stated the views of the committee on this subject. I leave the question to the Senate.

Mr. WADE. I find that in making out this tariff it depends very much on whose ox it is that is to be goaded.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a new discovery that you have made.

Mr. WADE. No; sir, it is not a new discovery that I have made, for I have been aware of it for a good while. Now, sir, all the argument that has been made on this subject by the Senator from Maine might be made in regard to every article where protection is sought to be established. If gentlemen are opposed to the principle of protection then there is a good deal of weight in the argument. If they are in favor of protection then the argument goes for nothing.

Sir, what I wish to protect above all other things is labor. I know that some gentlemen look very much at other effects of protection; but I am all the time looking to the welfare of the men actually engaged in laborious occupations. If you throw down the protective principle entirely, and open the door for all nations to come in competition with us in everything that men can do, the effect, of course, is to place our laborer on the same level that laborers are everywhere else where these articles are manufactured and made. Sir, throw away the protective principle, and labor will find its level like water. The man who wishes to reduce the wages of the American laborer to the same niggardly amount that the laborer in the old countries of Europe receives, and no more, ought to be a free trader, and he ought not to attempt to protect anything; for nobody can contend, unless he is the advocate of absolute free trade, for placing the American laborer on the same degraded level that the laborer occupies in other countries. This fact cannot be disguised, and this is the principle that operates upon me; for I will say that I look more at that than I do to other interests, or even to the wealth of the country. They all, to be sure, depend upon the same principles exactly; but it is obvious that those who resist all attempts to lower the laborer of this country, and who endeavor to secure to that laborer good wages, such as he can live by, must be in favor of protection. That is a mathematical certainty.

Now, sir, how is it in regard to this article? Nova Scotia lies right off our coast, with all the facilities for bringing their productions in competition with our own. Labor is infinitely cheaper there than it is here, and they can destroy any work of this kind in this country. It is just as easy to find and manufacture this article there as it is here. Labor is all the value there is about it there. In its crude state, as I said before, it seems to be worth nothing, but in its finished state it is exceedingly valuable. We have a great many workmen engaged in this business in our own country. If you throw down all protection to them you will drive them out of the business, or compel them to do work as cheap as it is done in other countries.

Now, sir, I for one will never yield to that. I said the other day I never want to see the American laborer have less wages than he gets now; for if somebody's interest must give way I would as lief it should be the wealthy as the poor. I would as lief the laborer should have the advantage of our legislation as anybody else. I will never yield the point that, so far as I can he shall be protected against this destructive competition; and it never was more apparent than it is on this very item that I have mentioned. In Nova Scotia I am told—perhaps that point is not clear, but I am so told—the wages of the men who labor in this business is about seventy-five cents a day, while the wages here is two or three times that amount.

Mr. HENDERSON. If it be true that labor is so very cheap where this stone is quarried, I should like to ask the Senator, if being adjoining the State of Maine, why those laborers do not come into our country, with institutions certainly as good as they have in the Canadian Government, and obtain the higher wages here? I should like to ask the Senator further why it is that operatives from Europe have come here with a view of engaging in business in our manufactories and have returned to Europe, refusing to take the high wages we are paying here, because they say they can make more money at the low wages of Europe than they can here, paying the cost of living. It is a fact that American labor to-day has not advanced in proportion to the commodities which the laborer must have, and the laborer to-day is worse off than he was under lower prices, because labor has not advanced in the same ratio that the commodities which enter into the cost of living have advanced.

Mr. WADE. Well, Mr. President, I am very sorry to hear that that is the case. That shows still stronger that something ought to be done in favor of the laborer. If the fact is as stated the gentleman has told us the reason. It is because our wages, all things considered, are not as good as they are in Europe. That is the gentleman's answer to his own question. Of course they will not come here when they find that their pay is not as good as it is at home, and when they do come here and find that out they will go back. The Senator has answered himself perfectly on that subject. All I want is to give the laborer a better chance here than he has abroad. I know that a great many men do come over from Canada and labor in the States. A great many of them are on our railroads in the State of Ohio. To my certain knowledge many of them have left their own homes and country and come to find better wages in our State, working on the railroads principally, and often at other occupations. But these men are not likely to leave their homes for manual labor. Very few of them can afford the means of traveling far to find work to do. It is very expensive to break up their business at home and to travel a great distance with an uncertainty of finding profitable labor when they get here. All these things tend to keep them from emigrating where they suppose they can get better wages. Indeed, the great mass of men who labor in this way cannot, if they would and were assured that they would have better wages, leave their homes to seek it and find it. That I suppose to be the great reason why they do not come.

I have not read the letters I have received from the gentlemen who have written to me on the subject of this article of grindstones, because like the writers of the letters read by the Senator from Maine they are interested in the manufacture of these stones. They tell me, however, that there is a detrimental competition between them and these laborers abroad. That is what they assert. Then those who want to get the grindstones cheap write to the gentleman and tell him they pay now more than they ought to pay. Those who furnish this evidence on each side are interested witnesses, and I do not rely so much upon them for that reason, as I find that everybody who comes here is endeavoring to promote his own interests; but I can see very clearly that under the condition in which things are now this interest wants protection as much as any other we have protected; and it rests, too, upon the same principle, say what you will.

It may be asserted of every article that we protect that it will come dearer to the consumer. I suppose it will at first, although I have always contended and believe that the rivalry the business begets when it is protected generally brings the price down infinitely cheaper frequently than it was without protection, and that happens from competition. I have nothing to say about that. I am not going into the general argument; but I say this depends upon the same principle precisely. It is the same principle that governed what the Senator contended for about asphaltum. That was really a local interest. They found it existing in Nova Scotia in great quantities and easy to come at; but as there was a pretty heavy duty on the oil they found they could not manufacture it so easy in Nova Scotia and then bring it in because of the duty, and therefore, to escape that, they came and set up their establishments in Maine and brought the crude article there from Nova Scotia, and thus escaped the duty. That is not the way to raise revenue if it is the way to protect an article. It certainly is not the way if we are seeking for revenue alone. But, then, it is on the same principles exactly with this, and gentlemen may make the argument either one way or the other as suits the occasion. But what I ask for these articles of stone, brought from abroad in detrimental competition with our own labor, is that we stand upon the principle of protection in regard to them as well as anything else. It is true it is a rough article, but it is a very valuable one, and one extensively brought in as a subject of labor, both here and abroad, and needs the attention of those who are legislating upon the subject to see that all interests are protected, and that with that protection the highest amount of revenue is obtained that can be obtained, having regard to the interests of all concerned. That is all I ask for, and this is about all I have to say upon the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator, in the first place, put it upon the ground of revenue alone. He did not inform us that the quarry he was looking after was up in his own neighborhood, near by, close to Cleveland.

Mr. WADE. If it had been in Maine it would have been your ox.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; he did not allude to that. I told the whole story so that it might be perfectly understood. Now, having found the revenue "dodge" did not work, he comes down to the doctrine of protection again, and the Senator talks about protection, and goes into a discussion which we have heard from every gentleman who wanted to put on a heavier duty, a general discussion upon the subject of protecting American labor. Now, how are you going to protect it? Suppose any protection was needed up there in Cleveland, which the Senator does not really pretend, for he will not read the letters even, and he does not profess to know anything about it himself—

Mr. WADE. Here they are.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not want to read them certainly if you do not. Now, whom do you protect? You protect the workmen employed in Cleveland, and who have the whole western country for their area to sell their grindstones, without any possibility of the slightest competition from any quarter, to every farmer and every man who uses a grindstone. Are there no laborers except those laborers there? Have we not laborers in our factories who use grindstones, and laborers, too, who are dependent for their employment upon the success of the manufacture? Have we not farmers? Have we not all sorts of mechanics everywhere scattered through the country? Are they not laborers?

Mr. WADE. You have protected them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How have we protected them? If the gentleman can tell how we protect the laborers let him do it; I do not know. He may say we protect some of the manufacturers. How have we protected the farmers?

Mr. WADE. Not very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then you want to tax their grindstones for the benefit of the laborers in Cleveland. How are you to protect the common mechanics, every blacksmith-shop, and every other shop where they want to grind a tool? How do you protect them? Are they not laborers? Do not they labor? Protect American labor, and not for the benefit of a very few at most who may be employed in the grindstone factory near Cleveland. Impose a tax upon every man who uses a grindstone all through the West, and an additional tax upon every man who uses a grindstone all through the East. It does depend, not upon whose ox is gored, but whose ox wants to grow fat.

Mr. WADE. Yes; that is so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the fact. The Senator admits it. Now, sir, I think it is a little unreasonable. I can say very confidently that we have had an eye to protection all through this bill. I think nobody will dispute that. But when I say that I have an eye to protection in carrying the principle of the bill out, it is perfect nonsense to talk about making a dead level for everything, and to declare that because you impose a certain duty in one particular where it is needed you are therefore to impose the same duty in another particular where it is not needed. That is not the doctrine of this bill. The doctrine of the bill is discrimination in these things, and we should stultify ourselves both in committee and as a Senate unless we did discriminate according to the article and the necessity of the article itself, and the uses to be made of the article; and we do not abandon the doctrine of the bill in any particular. Why not impose a heavy duty on all the articles in the free list? Have we abandoned the idea of protection by permitting a long list of articles to be admitted free? Why, sir, they are put there for the benefit of American labor, and for the purpose of protecting it and increasing it. The Senator must carry his doctrines out, and say that upon everything there shall be put an indiscriminate duty. That will not do. I think the Committee on Finance would have placed themselves in a very ridiculous position if they had reported a bill founded upon any such idea as that. Certainly I never could have consented to it.

Now, sir, this matter is before the Senate. I do not use a grindstone because I have no occasion to use it; but a great many other people do.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance takes rather a narrow view of this subject. He does not seem to see beyond the State of Maine. Now, sir, we have grindstone quarries in Michigan, and there are quarries of precisely the same kind across the river in Canada. In Michigan we pay our common laborers two dollars a day and our skilled workmen in getting out grindstone four dollars a day. In Canada, directly across the river, not more than a mile apart, they pay seventy-five cents a day for common labor and two dollars a day for their skilled labor. Now, sir, do you propose to abandon the entire traffic to the Canadians? As it now is they are coming across in thousands because we are paying higher wages than they are on the other side. We have had an immense immigration from Canada during the last five years of workmen. Do you propose to send those men back to Canada by breaking down our grindstone interest so that they cannot be paid here? Do you propose to abandon the laborer in the State of Michigan? I think the Senator takes a narrow view of it. This country is not confined to the State of Maine; it covers an immense surface. Michigan has an interest as well as Ohio in this question of protection to labor. I am not going into an argument upon the abstract idea of protection at this time; as the Senator says, it has been sufficiently argued already; but I present this as a plain practical question. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will prevail. I hope that our laborers in Michigan will have a little protection against the competition directly across the river in the same article. It is but justice that we should have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I object to putting grindstones and building-stones together, because they are produced in different places and they are used for different purposes, and there is no sort of similarity between the two except that they are stones. Grindstones are used by the farmers and mechanics and manufacturers, and are absolutely necessary for the business of the country, while most of the building-stone referred to in this amendment are used by those persons who build palatial residences on the Fifth avenue in New York or in the cities of the country, and they are generally purchased and used by men of wealth, and are to a great extent luxuries. I think, therefore, that great injustice may be done to one class or the other by putting grindstones and these building-stones together on the same basis.

The argument made by the Senator from Ohio is a very sound and logical argument, but I think it is not sufficiently comprehensive. The question arises: if you protect, as you propose, the laborers who are employed in the production of grindstones, will you not oppress the laborers who are employed in the manufacturing establishments of the country where it is necessary to use these grindstones? It is represented to us, with how much truth I do not know, because these representations do conflict, that to impose five dollars per ton upon grindstones would amount to a prohibitory tariff and compel the manufacturers of the East, where a large proportion of the grindstones of the country are used, to pay for the transportation of grindstones from the western States to the eastern States, and in that way the tariff would be very oppressive; and the effect of it would be, if not altogether to close up some of those manufacturing establishments, to compel the men who are engaged in this business, if possible, to reduce the price of the labor which they employ, so as to enable them to pay for the additional amount you put upon the grindstones they use.

The owners of one establishment represent that to impose this duty would add $9,000 per year to their expenses. They import grindstones that are very heavy, weighing several tons, which are needed in their business. If you impose five dollars a ton on a grindstone weighing several tons it is easy to see that it amounts to a considerable sum altogether. It would be a very large tax upon their business. Besides, these stones are used by the farmers of the country; they are necessary to the manufacturing interest; and so far as my connection with this bill is concerned I claim that in regard to any material which is taken out of the ground in this country and is essentially a raw material, while you undertake to protect the manufacturing interest in which the great mass of the labor is employed, it is bad policy to impose a high tariff upon that raw material. It is possible that without such a tariff some persons may suffer by the competition, but it is better that a few should suffer than that many should suffer. You cannot impose a high tariff, in my judgment, upon raw materials that enter into the manufacturing business of the country without oppressing those interests that furnish the chief employment for labor. The best policy is to build up manufacturing establishments. These high taxes that you put upon every material in the nature of raw material, it seems to me, will tend to cripple, weaken, and destroy them.

Mr. WADE. It is not my object to put what is called a high duty on these articles. I do not know but that five dollars a ton is too high. I have no means of knowing exactly; but I do not want the duty to be excessively high. I want it to be in harmony with the protective duties we place upon articles generally. I do not ask for anything more than that. In arguing this question here gentlemen speak of its being a hardship to the manufacturers to pay these duties. I think that argument is so narrow that it does not cover the whole ground. If you put a duty on grindstones it will be distributed through the whole community so far as they use any commodities into the price of which the use of grindstones in any form enters as an element. If grindstones are dear and manufacturers have to use them and pay a high price for them, the articles they manufacture will be enhanced in price in proportion to that element of expense, and so the duty will be distributed through the whole community and all the consumers will help to pay it. It does not fall particularly upon those who manufacture or produce the article, but on the great body of consumers the whole country over. Gentlemen are apt to argue these questions as though the whole burden fell upon the party on whom the tax is first levied. If that were so we should create a great many hardships that would be unbearable if taxes fell with their full weight upon particular classes of the community and had not this tendency to distribute themselves among all. But if the price of a manufactured article is enhanced by this duty the community who consume the article all have to contribute toward the burden at last; but that consideration seems in the argument to have been lost sight of.

It seems, as I knew before, that the Senator from Maine confines himself, in his view upon this question, to the locality in which he lives. In the aggregate the production of this article employs a great many workmen, and it is just as important to protect them as any other class. A duty imposed on grindstones is not a burden falling upon any one interest, but it will be distributed, as I have said, through the whole country. The Senator's constituents are in close proximity to the British Provinces, from which grindstones can be readily brought to come into competition with those produced in our own country; and the cost of labor is so much less there as I think to be a sufficient argument in favor of the amendment. It seems to me that the fact that the use of grindstones is so general throughout the country only tends to prove that this burden will be generally and equally distributed throughout the country, and will not fall with crushing weight upon any class.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am interested in reference to the freestone and building and monumental stone, and especially the freestone mentioned in this amendment. It is a fact, as I am informed by vast numbers who are engaged in quarrying freestone, which is largely quarried in Connecticut and in New Jersey, and somewhat in Ohio, that the Nova Scotia stone comes in direct and constant competition with the freestone quarried in those States. The House bill placed the duty on freestone at five dollars a ton, which is the present amendment. I do not know but that four dollars a ton might answer the purpose, but I wish the Senators to understand that neither five dollars a ton nor four dollars a ton is real protection. It is not protection at five dollars a ton. The Nova Scotia stone is located near to the water, it being a heavy article; it is easily transported to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and to the other cities where that stone is used. The expense of labor, as has been stated, is there much less, and not only the expense of labor, but all the expenses which enter into a quarry—the expense of feed for cattle and horses and a thousand things are much less than here. The only object that is desired by putting this tariff of four or five dollars a ton upon stone is not protection, but to prevent a large amount of capital going from this country to Nova Scotia and being there invested, tempted by the immense profits which would entirely destroy the quarrying interests of New Jersey, Connecticut, and Ohio, as I believe. This present tariff, those who are engaged in quarrying in these stones say, will be their destruction. Why, sir, look at the prices. Freestone could be placed in the market four years ago at from seventy to eighty cents a cubic foot; it cannot now be placed there for less than $1 35 a cubic foot, such has been the increase in the expense of quarrying; and with this tariff of four dollars or five dollars a ton, Nova Scotia stone can be put in the market and sold considerably less than this stone from Ohio and New Jersey can. What do we gain, then, by this amendment? We gain two things: we gain an increased revenue when the stone does come here, and we prevent capital being tempted by these enormous profits to invest itself in quarrying this stone in Nova Scotia to the destruction of our American quarries.

This is no small business. There are probably $5,000,000 paid out annually in labor in these quarries; there are thousands and thousands of men employed in them. There are $2,000,000 of capital invested in Connecticut alone. As to speaking of this freestone as raw material it is the greatest possible mistake.

Mr. WILSON. Will you tell what is a raw material?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I can easier tell what is not. This freestone is used for veneering houses; it is so valuable and it costs so much to work it that it is used merely to veneer a house perhaps with stone four or six inches thick. That you cannot call a raw material. It is as expensive as the marble almost.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not the raw material, you speak of it after it is wrought.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is the way it is brought. It is not sold in the rough condition as it is taken out of the quarries.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is mistaken. It is sold in that way by those who work it. Some may carry on both branches of business; but as the stone comes out of the quarry it is a rough block; it then goes to the worker in stone and he puts it into the shape he wants it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But the rough block the Senator speaks of has a great deal of labor upon it; and it is that rough block which is put in the market at an except of $1 35 per cubic foot. We can see that the stone as it is in the quarry is not worth a tithe of $1 35 a cubic foot. It is the labor on it that gives it that value. It is no raw material in that sense.

The tariff on marble by the present bill, even although the amendment of the Senator from Vermont was not adopted, is vastly greater than that which we ask upon the freestone. There the tariff is fifty cents a cubic foot specific, and thirteen cents ad valorem, making sixty-three cents. The marble is invoiced at sixty-five cents a cubic foot, so that the present tariff upon marble is almost one hundred per cent. if you take the invoice price as the criterion. This stone sells in the market at about sixteen dollars a ton, and we ask four dollars a ton or twenty-five per cent. on its value in market.

I trust that the Senate will have regard to this freestone and not destroy these quarries, for it is perfectly clear that with the price of labor in this country and with the fact that this stone has to be transported by rail—

Mr. FESSENDEN. How far?

Mr. FRELINGHUSEN. From the quarry to market, however far it may be. The freestone can be carried at much less expense directly from the quarries in Nova Scotia by water to New York and Philadelphia, which are the principal markets.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The quarries in Ohio have water transportation, too.

Mr. FRELINGHUSEN. But they must carry the stone six miles to the shore.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is hauled there, not transported by rail.

Mr. FRELINGHUSEN. In view of the difference in the price of labor and the cost of transportation we certainly ought to protect our own quarries. I am assured by the gentlemen who are engaged in this business in this country that even with this duty the Nova Scotia stone will command the market and can undersell them.

Mr. MORRILL. That is an entire mistake.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The fact cannot be so.

Mr. FRELINGHUSEN. I do not want to take up time by arguing the principles of this tariff. We want to protect American labor, and we want to get revenue. We do both by this arrangement. We get revenue and we prevent American capital going to Nova Scotia and being there invested in these quarries, and so taking the business from the American quarries.

Mr. WADE. It is thought that I have placed the rate of duty too high in my amendment. I fixed that rate because it was what was put in the House bill after full investigation by the House of Representatives; but as gentlemen think it is too high I will modify it by saying "four dollars" instead of "five."

Mr. GRIMES. So far as the amendment under consideration relates to building-stones, I take no interest in it and have nothing to say. If Senators representing the States along the Atlantic coast choose to put a tax upon building-stone, so as to increase the expenses of dwellings and other buildings in the cities and in the villages of the country they represent, and thereby increase rents, be it so. I do not know that the section of country that I represent has any particular interest in it. But I have a slight interest, as the people of the State of which I am a citizen have, in the subject of grindstones.

Grindstones are of general use. There is not a manufactory of iron or steel or a machine-shop or a respectable-sized farm in the country that does not use grindstones. I am well aware that if we put this tariff upon imported grindstones it is not going to bring a single foreign grindstone to the section of country where I live. A region of country adjacent to that in which the Senator from Ohio lives has now an entire monopoly of that trade, and during all the time I have lived in the West I have never seen a grindstone from any other place than from the neighborhood of Berea, in Ohio. There may be quarries from which they are occasionally wrought or wrought to some extent elsewhere; but I never heard, until the Senator from Michigan told us to-day, that there was one in the State of Michigan.

The Senator from Ohio has not told us that these Berea quarries are in a languishing condition. I understand that on the contrary they are very prosperous; and it is within my own knowledge that during the last two years an establishment in the town in which I live has been obliged to wait from two to three months to have an order sent to Berea for grindstones filled. I understand also from the Senator from Michigan that the grindstone manufactory in his State is exceedingly prosperous, for he says it has drawn a large amount of population from Canada over into Michigan in order to work in that grindstone quarry. I apprehend, therefore, that so far as protection is concerned, upon the argument submitted by the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Ohio, there is not much to be said in favor of the proposition.

There is another thing to be taken into consideration, that under the law as it now stands—and it is not proposed to modify it, so far as I know—this is a manufacture that pays no internal duty whatever. Therefore, if the Senator from Ohio is successful in preventing the influx of these articles from abroad, just to that extent he diminishes the revenue of the country. That is a consideration which, it occurs to me, it would be well for the Senate to ponder.

The Senator tells us that he desires an increase of the wages of the laborer and he is going to exalt and dignify labor, and this bill is the panacea by which it is to be accomplished! The Senator from Maine very well inquired of him whether there were not other laborers in this country beside those in the machine-shop and those in the quarry. Sir, the labor of the country is done upon the farms. The basis of our products, of all our commerce, and of all our manufactures is dug out of the earth by the farmers. Now, let us see what is proposed by this bill; and I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio, who is an ardent advocate of the whole of the bill and all its principles, to its consideration for one moment, and then ask him whether he proposes to put an additional burden upon the farmers of the country by requiring them to pay an additional price for grindstones; for, as I said before, although we shall not in the section of country where I live, nor will he in the State of Ohio, see a single imported grindstone, yet the imposition of this tax upon the importation of grindstones is going to be an excuse for those who own the quarries in Ohio and Michigan to increase the price of the article they now furnish in exactly the same proportion that we increase the duty.

In this bill we declare that all agricultural implements imported into this country shall pay a duty of thirty-five per cent. We declare that no farmer shall put up a fence around his farm, or put up a house or any necessary outbuildings from any foreign lumber, unless he shall contribute the sum of two dollars a thousand for that. Then we have another clause saying the Canadian farmer, who is raising agricultural productions in competition with our farmers just across the line, shall be permitted to come into the States, get his agricultural implements on this side, and take them at a price with the duty off. That is one of the provisions of the bill; so that the farmer in the British Provinces gets every agricultural implement, his hoes, his rakes, his plows, his harrows, his mowing-machines, and his reaping-machines, and even his axes, free of all the impositions of duty imposed by this or any other tariff bill, and he can send in the produce that he raises in competition with the American farmer, and to his detriment. That is called protection to American industry, protection to American labor!

It is true, the bill proposes to lay a small duty upon agricultural products—ten cents a bushel on barley, not one half the price it would cost to transport a bushel of barley from the State where I live to the city of New York or Boston, which is the common market both of the Canadian and the Iowa farmer; and twenty cents a bushel on wheat, which is not enough to pay the cost of transportation, the Canadian farmer having the advantage of being so much nearer to the New York and Boston market than we are. And yet on the heels of that, with all the advantages given to the farmers of the British Provinces by this bill, which the Senator from Ohio has announced himself in favor of, it is proposed now—

Mr. WADE. I did not announce that I was in favor of the bill itself; I said nothing about it.

Mr. GRIMES. I am delighted to hear that the Senator from Ohio is open to correction yet upon the merits of this bill.

Mr. WADE. I said nothing about the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I thought from what the Senator said before it was a foregone conclusion that his vote would be in favor of the bill. But I say, in addition to the burdens on the farmer of which I have spoken, it is proposed now to increase the cost and expense of the products of the American farmer by an additional imposition upon the grindstones with which he sharpens his tools.

Mr. WADE. I am not going to take up much time in replying to the argument of the Senator from Iowa, because there is nothing new in it. Farmers do use grindstones, and they use tea and coffee and a great many other articles that are taxed pretty heavily in this bill. So it is with people engaged in other pursuits. As I have said before, all these great interests hang together; they are mutually dependent one upon the other. We are under the necessity of burdening the country with a taxation sufficiently large to pay the interest on our debt, and I hope gradually to decrease the principal. That is the necessity which we are compelled to submit to; and yet the Senator from Iowa talks as though we owed nothing and were under no obligation to burden any part of the people with any taxes whatever. Nobody would be more rejoiced than I would be if such were the fact. My argument is simply that as we are compelled to lay these burdens upon the people, we ought so to lay them as to protect our own labor and our own industry in preference to foreign labor and foreign industry. That is all that I contend for.

What the Senator from Iowa has said about grindstones may be said of pretty much every article that is protected in this bill. There is no different doctrine to be applied to grindstones from any other articles of manufacture. I might just as well get up and argue, as the Senator has done, that if a commodity which is protected enters into the consumption of a great many people they will be burdened by the tax. That is very true; but this is no reason why you should not protect all the home interests that can be protected. You must balance protection with the obtaining of a revenue, I grant; but, as the Senator from New Jersey has well said, what I contend for accomplishes both these objects. While it protects our own labor, it gives you a revenue, and one as little burdensome as that which you derive from any other commodity that you tax. It is for this reason that I ask that this duty be imposed.

I acknowledge that as to locality this interest perhaps affects my constituents more than others. I do not conceal it; I know that the stone out of which grindstones are manufactured is not very common in this country. There is a very good quarry, and I believe more than one, in Ohio, and there are several in Michigan. That, however, is no reason why I am to be considered as selfish when I seek to give the same protection to this interest that is given to others in this bill. Every interest that is protected must have a local habitation somewhere, and I am not the man to inquire in what particular part of the country it springs up.

Mr. GRIMES. I beg the Senator to believe that I did not charge him with such a thing.

Mr. WADE. Oh, no; I do not say so. I speak in reference to what was said by the Senator from Maine, who charged that these interests I speak about are in my own vicinity or in my own State. That is true; and that is a reason why I advocate them here more earnestly, perhaps, than I would if they were in the State of another Senator, who was quite as able to set forth and protect the interests of his constituents as I could be. This interest is no more local than every other one that comes under the supervision of this bill. It affects all the inhabitants of the country, because between the States of the Union we levy no customs. These States are one great community for certain purposes, and it does not make any difference where the thing to be taxed happens to lie; it affects everybody that has occasion to use the article. Because this quarry happens to lie in Ohio I am not aware that I am contending for a mere local interest any more than I should be if it was located anywhere else. It seems to me to be perfectly germane to include all the freestone interests in this amendment. The same principle applies to them all. When you come to consider whether they shall be taxed in this bill or not, grindstones stand on precisely the same principle as freestones, and therefore I have grouped them all together, not believing there was any difference in principle.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why not put on a thousand per cent.?

Mr. WADE. Because I think that would be extravagant.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought you said it was all the same.

Mr. WADE. No; I say the same principle of protection applies. I am for applying that principle to this article, and the Senator cannot deny that the same principle for which I am contending pervades his whole bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a question of amount.

Mr. WADE. Yes; and I ask for a smaller amount than is given to many other interests by this bill. I hardly understand how the Senator argues this bill. Sometimes when it is convenient for his purpose he tells us that the duty is for revenue; and then on other occasions, when he has some other purpose to serve, he says the duty is for protection. Now, I am for both, whether the interest to be protected is located in Portland or in Cleveland. Its locality makes no difference to me. In this case I am in for the protection of grindstone and freestone against foreign competition in the same way that I am for protecting our own labor against foreign competition in any other articles of production.

Mr. GRIMES. Does not the Senator see that under the operation of our present internal tax law, just so far as his proposition is protective just so far it diminishes the revenue.

Mr. WADE. Certainly it does.

Mr. GRIMES. Then where is the profit to the Government.

Mr. WADE. You say it is a very profitable business, which I do not understand that it is, and I am assured by those interested in it (whose arguments I do not lug in) that the business is not a profitable one. If it is, I trust the Finance Committee will have shrewdness enough to hunt it up and tax it. If it is a profitable business and these men make money out of it, you ought to derive a revenue from them as well as from others; and if the assertion be true that this is a money-making business impose your taxation on it; there is no reason why it should not be done. Indeed, I had supposed it was taxed like other business of a similar kind; but I never looked to see whether the internal revenue law applied to them or not. I am willing that they should be placed on the same principle as others.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask if the vote can be put first on the motion to strike out and insert, and next on the motion to strike out on the next page, or whether it is all one vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment, in the opinion of the Chair, is subject to a division.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for a division.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division of the amendment being asked for, the first question is on striking out lines thirty-six and thirty-seven of section twelve, on page 85, in these words:

On grindstones, unfinished, ten per cent. ad valorem.

On grindstones, finished, five dollars per ton.

And in lieu thereof inserting:

On grindstones, and on soapstone, freestone, sandstone, granite, and all building or monumental stone except marble, four dollars per ton of thirteen cubic feet.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the amendment now include grindstones?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. GRIMES. Is it not possible to amend the amendment so as to get a separate vote on the different articles enumerated in it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. A motion to strike out and insert is one motion, and is not divisible.

Mr. GRIMES. Cannot the question be divided in any way?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would inquire whether the question cannot be divided so that we may take the vote on grindstones to begin with, and have a distinct vote on each separate branch or article proposed to be included.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks there can be no division of this motion. It is a motion to strike out and insert, and that under the rules is one motion and cannot be divided.

Mr. GRIMES. Then the only course left to those who are against one of the propositions and in favor of the other is to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and then offer a subsequent amendment in a different form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is of course in the power of any Senator.

Mr. WADE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Before the yeas and nays are taken I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is confined to-day by indisposition, and he will, I know, receive the sympathy of the Senate when I state that on Friday he was seriously imperiled by an accident which might have cost him his life. As he was crossing a street a sleigh approached him, and guarding himself he seized the pole and was carried some distance, after which he lost his hold and the horse and sleigh passed over him, as he thought on Saturday without injury, but to-day he feels that he was somewhat injured by the circumstance.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Johnson, Patterson, Poland, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Yates—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Conness, Cragin, Davis, Fessenden, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Ramsey, Eiddle, Saulsbury, Sumner, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Doolittle, Fogg, Guthrie, McDougall, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, and Stewart—10.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is still a branch of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] undisposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. I supposed that fell, of course with the rejection of the other.

Mr. WADE. Certainly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question must be taken on it unless it is withdrawn.

Mr. WADE. It is of no consequence now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be read.

Mr. WADE. I withdraw it. I supposed it fell with the other, of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. That being withdrawn, I move to amend section four on page 17, by striking out the word "twenty" in line twenty-four and inserting "fifty;" and by striking out the words "square yard" and inserting "pound;" so as to read "on bunting fifty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem;" so as to conform to the duties in the previous part of the section.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I thought the Senator from Ohio was renewing the motion of his colleague as applicable to freestone.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; but you can renew it afterward.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But for that understanding I should have objected to the withdrawal of that amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator from Ohio if his amendment proposes to increase the duty on bunting or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am informed by experts that the duty on bunting, as fixed by the bill as it stands, is one hundred and thirty-five per cent.; and by some means—perhaps it is not an error, though I was about to call it so—instead of levying the duty per pound, as is done in all other woolen or worsted manufactures, it is levied per square yard. The Senate will see that the preceding parts of the section levy the duties on blankets and woolen and worsted yarns, &c., composed of the same materials that are made into bunting, at from twenty to fifty cents per pound. Assuming that bunting is the highest-priced product, which, by the way, it is not, I propose to put the duty at fifty cents a pound, which is precisely the duty on the corresponding articles of woolen and worsted goods.

Mr. HOWE. How will that leave the bill in this respect as compared with the present duty under the existing law?

Mr. SHERMAN. The present duty is fifty per cent. ad valorem, and from the information I get my amendment will make it about seventy per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then you increase it.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; this bill makes it one hundred and thirty-five per cent., and I reduce that. By an amendment incorporated into some law on motion of my friend from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] all bunting used by the Government of the United States must be of American manufacture, so that all the flags used by the Government must be of American manufacture. One or two establishments have a monopoly of the business, and to give them in addition to that a protection of one hundred and thirty-five per cent. seems to me rather too much.

Mr. HOWE. It seems that we import a vast amount of bunting. We imported last year, I see by the returns, over thirteen million dollars in value of this very article.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is a mistake.

Mr. HOWE. So the Secretary says.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt bunting is used by every citizen of the United States more or less. It goes into the little flags that are used on the 4th of July. Every citizen probably has his flag, and a great deal of it is used.

Mr. HOWE. The Secretary's report puts the importation at the figures I have stated.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that is an exaggeration.

Mr. SPRAGUE. This article of bunting is different from the articles referred to by the Senator from Ohio. He refers to blankets, broadcloths, and such like articles that weigh two or three yards to a pound; but this is a light article that weighs something like ten yards to a pound. Hence there should be a difference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I feel it my duty to state that a very short time ago there was no bunting establishment in the United States; all the bunting for our own flags was imported; the flags that went at the masthead of our vessels and so on were of foreign bunting. We did not manufacture the article in any way whatever. A gentleman called at the Navy Department, and in conversation on the subject there it was mentioned, as a matter that was rather shameful to us, that we could not manufacture our own flags, and the Department intimated a wish that somebody would get up a manufactory of bunting in this country. He told them that he would see whether it could not be done, and he went home and went to work and contracted with the Navy Department to furnish them with bunting. He established a manufactory for that purpose, and I believe it is the only one in the United States. If there are more now, as gentlemen intimate, they have grown up since. In a former bill a clause was inserted to protect the manufacture of bunting by requiring that all the Government used should be of American manufacture.

When the House of Representatives sent us this bill proposing additional duties on wool, of course it also proposed additional duties upon all manufactures of wool. At the time this establishment of which I speak went into operation the Canada wool came in free. The reciprocity treaty had not then expired, and the long wools from Canada, out of which this bunting is made, came in free. That was the great encouragement at the time to establish the manufactory. When the reciprocity treaty ceased of course the duty fixed by the existing tariff upon wool applied, and I think it was about sixteen cents a pound. The duty on wool fixed in this bill is ten cents a pound and ten per cent. ad valorem. In view of the heavy duty that is imposed upon the wool out of which the bunting is made the House regulated the duty upon bunting. The bill recommended by the commissioner reduced the duty on this wool from ten cents down to six cents, and he put his duty on bunting with reference to that; but the Finance Committee adopted the House rates on wool, therefore the House rate on bunting which had been fixed to correspond with the increased duty on wool—

Mr. CONNESS. You changed the classification of wools?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; the classification is the same precisely. What we did was to reject the reduction proposed by the commissioner and take the duties fixed by the House; so that instead of paying nothing, as was the case when this manufacture was established, the wool out of which bunting is made is to pay a duty of ten cents a pound and ten per cent. ad valorem by this bill. That being established by the House and adopted by the Senate, we took the House provision with reference to bunting, supposing that it was framed in accordance with the increased duties, to give the same protection that the manufacturer had before.

That is all I know about it; and if the Senator from Ohio has any other information he will communicate it to the Senate. It is not mere matter of opinion and guesswork, but is predicated on the increase of the duties on wool.

Mr. SHERMAN. What the Senator says is right enough, but as a matter of course we are not bound to follow the House in the adjustment of the various articles. I wish to apply to the article of bunting precisely the same principle which the Senate applies to all other articles of woolen manufacture. The principle of this bill is to give about thirty per cent. ad valorem to articles of manufacture, and then to give a specific duty corresponding to the amount we levy on the raw material. That principle is carried out by my amendment. The duty on the wool entering into the manufacture of bunting, which is made out of combing-wool, the second class, is ten cents a pound, and ten per cent. ad valorem. It cannot exceed fourteen cents a pound, counting the wool at forty cents. A duty of fifty cents a pound on bunting would be ample to compensate for the duty we levy on the wool. The same principle is applied to blankets and woolen and worsted yarns, which, I am told, are made out of precisely the same quality of wool that goes into bunting, except that in bunting a quantity of cotton is mixed with the wool. The highest duty on woolen yarns in this bill is thirty per cent. ad valorem and fifty cents a pound specific. I propose to apply precisely the same rate of duty and the same principle to the article of bunting.

I am told by gentlemen who understand this business better than I do that the price of bunting is from eighteen to twenty cents a yard, currency. The result is that the duty as it now stands in the bill is equivalent to more than one hundred and thirty per cent. Beside that, we give to the domestic manufacturers almost a monopoly of the market by requiring the Government of the United States to purchase its supply of bunting from the American manufacturers. Why the duty was fixed as it was in the House bill I do not know. We ought to extend the same principle of protection and revenue to the article of bunting as to every other article of woolen manufacture. If the duty that I propose is found to be too low, as a matter of course it can be adjusted hereafter between the two Houses; but from the best information I can get it will give to the bunting manufacture the same protection that every other article of woolen manufacture will have under the bill.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. In section two, line eighty-six, on page 11, after the word "hand" I move to insert "or Marseilles bed-quilts or bed-spreads;" so as to read:

On all cotton hosiery, comprising shirts, drawers, stockings, socks, gloves, and all other goods knitted or made on frames or by hand, and on Marseilles bed-quilts or bed-spreads, ten cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, forty per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move now, after the word "ties," in line one hundred and forty-two of section ten, on page 76, to insert "six cents per dozen and;" so as to read:

On umbrella and parasol elastic ties, six cents per dozen, and fifty per cent. ad valorem.

I will simply say that as the bill now stands there is a marked discrimination against—

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe there is no objection to the amendment on the part of the Finance Committee.

Mr. WILSON. Very well, then, I shall say nothing.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. In line three hundred and five of section seven, on page 37, I move to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

On machine cards, on card clothing, for use in covering carding engines, or parts of the same, composed of leather and wire, or cloth and wire, whether the cloth be composed wholly of wool, flax, or cotton, or of the same materials mixed with India-rubber, or combined with each other and India-rubber in any way, fifty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the present duty under the existing law?

Mr. WILSON. Thirty-five per cent. The persons engaged in this business are very anxious to have twenty cents per pound specific duty in addition to the forty per cent. ad valorem provided by the bill; but it has been thought best not to propose that, but simply to move ten per cent. additional; and I will say that I think this is a very reasonable proposition. The article is one of great importance, and it ought to be protected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the honorable Senator if an additional tax on these articles will not impose additional burdens on the manufacturers of the country.

Mr. WILSON. The persons engaged in the manufacture of these articles that are used in the mills employ a great number of skilled mechanics; and I think if there is one class of men in the country whose interests we ought to look after it is the skilled laborers of the country. This proposed change is very far short of what the men engaged in this business think they ought to have. They say that the provision as it stands will be very hard indeed upon their labor. They want a much larger protection than the amendment I propose. They want twenty cents a pound in addition to the forty per cent., but I have thought it best simply to propose that the forty per cent. be made fifty.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. On page 71, in line twenty-eight of section ten, I move to increase the duty on corks, from forty to fifty per cent. ad valorem. I wish to say that this is but one half of what has been asked for by the parties engaged in this business, and I have seen the figures made out, by which it appears that the duty as it stands is a marked discrimination against the manufacturer in this country. Even the change that I propose will hardly make anything in their favor and will just put them about even. I hope it will be adopted. As the clause now stands it is a decided discrimination against the manufacturer of the article in this country. It can be imported and pay the duties cheaper than it can be made here. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to offer one more amendment: it is on page 48, in line one hundred and seventy-six of section nine, to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "forty-five;" so as to make the duty "on carmine in all forms, and carmine lake, dry or liquid," forty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have some reason given for that. The article from which this is made is on the free list, and thirty-five per cent. on the manufacture would seem to be enough.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator may think it enough, and probably the Senate will; but the proposition was placed in my hands with figures showing the large amount of taxation placed upon the product, from which it appeared that this duty would be a very small protection. I have no particular interest in it other than to have the matter properly adjusted; but if the figures put in my hands in regard to it are correct I must say that as the clause stands at present it is not right and the duty ought to be increased.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. On page 25, in line seven, of section seven, I move to strike out "three" and insert "eight." It now reads "on old metal scrap iron, three dollars per ton." I wish to make it eight dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask if that is in order. That line has already been amended, and the amendment agreed to in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment was agreed to in committee, and the question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment made in committee? But that amendment is subject to amendment now before it is concurred in by the Senate. The motion of the Senator from Michigan is in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let the Clerk read the line as it now stands amended. I was guided by the printed bill before me.

The SECRETARY. Lines seven, eight, nine, ten, and eleven of section seven were stricken out in Committee of the Whole, and the following words were inserted in lieu thereof:

On old iron, cast or wrought, three dollars per ton: Provided, That nothing shall be deemed old iron except waste or refuse material, or iron that has been in actual use and is fit only to be manufactured by melting or reheating and rolling or welding.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to increase the duty on scrap cast iron to eight dollars per ton, and on scrap wrought iron to twelve dollars per ton. How such a bill as this could ever emanate from the Committee on Finance is to me a mystery. If it did not come from a so distinguished source, I should say it was an absurdity, but coming from so high a source, I can only say of it that it is total ruin to the iron interests of the United States. The committee propose to admit scrap wrought iron at three dollars per ton, and charge nine dollars per ton on pig metal. Wrought iron can be made from pig at an expense of twenty-eight dollars per ton to-day. Under this bill all the railroads on earth will pour their old worn-out rails as scrap iron into the foundries of the United States, and it is well known that railroad bars have to be rerolled on an average once in ten years.

These duties are destructive to the revenue, destructive to every iron furnace of the United States, and will put them all out. You might as well admit railroad iron at a duty of three dollars per ton as to admit the wrought scrap at that rate. It will put out every blast furnace in the United States, and not a single pound of pig metal will be imported under the bill. We shall become the recipients of all the scrap in the world, and shall import nothing but scrap.

Sir, such an absurdity was never before proposed on this or any other body, in my judgment. It is a bill gotten up to suit the railroad rolling-mills, and to sacrifice every other iron interest in the United States but the interest of these railroad rolling-mills. They buy this scrap, and of course they are satisfied. The result of it will be that they can bring in all the iron they manufacture at a duty of three dollars per ton. No doubt the railroad rolling-mills are satisfied. It is millions upon millions of dollars in their pockets, and as many millions out of the Treasury of the United States. You will import nothing but scrap, and you will receive three dollars per ton and no more.

Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be adopted, and I desire to have it adopted in the form in which I present it, namely, eight dollars upon old cast scrap, which is exactly the same value as pig, and twelve dollars on wrought scrap. I leave a discrimination of one dollar between the duty on pig and on cast scrap, and I raise the duty on old railroad bars, which would really bring the grand total of our imports under this scrap law to twelve dollars, while the duty on bars is fixed in the bill at fourteen dollars. I hope the amendment will be adopted. The section as it stands is total ruin to the iron interests of the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should be a little surprised at the speech made by the honorable Senator from Michigan if I was not aware of the accuracy of his information upon every subject, and of the fact that it is useless to set up against his broad statements any information that may be obtained from other quarters. Now, sir, as he seems to think, this is a most marvelous bill. I will state a few facts in reference to how the result of which he complains was arrived at. The House of Representatives agreed to impose considerably larger duties on iron than we have imposed. If I recollect aright, the House put the duty at five dollars per ton on old iron, cast or wrought, reducing it from eight dollars, the duty under the present law. The Senator from Michigan now proposes to put it at eight dollars on cast and twelve dollars on wrought iron.

We had before us a committee of iron men from Pittsburgh who came to see us on the subject of this duty on iron and other things, and stated that with regard to scrap cast-iron the duty of three dollars per ton was ample; they did not want any more than that on scrap cast-iron; they were satisfied with it; but on wrought scrap iron they thought the duty ought to be as high as on pig iron. We first put the duty on wrought scrap iron at eight dollars per ton, and with that they expressed themselves satisfied, and put on a proviso which Senators will find printed in the bill "that nothing shall be deemed wrought or scrap which can be used as piles or billets in the manufacture of iron."

After we reported it there was a meeting of iron men in this city, quite a large one, indeed I believe it was a regular convention of the Iron and Steel Association. They took the subject into consideration, and some of them exposed to us the fact that the committee had been imposed upon in regard to this proviso. They did it of their own free will. They said that putting in the description given in the proviso would have the effect, being worded as it was, to exclude all scrap iron, and none could be imported except some very small and insignificant matters, by the use of the descriptive words "piles or billets;" so that artfully it was a trick upon us, we being ignorant of the technical terms, by which all scrap iron would be absolutely excluded from the country except some few small articles. The Iron and Steel Association took the matter into consideration and they passed resolutions—and I believe that there were only four or five dissenting voices to the resolutions—that a duty of three dollars per ton on both classes was sufficient. The resolutions were sent to us signed by the president and secretary.

The reason they gave tended to satisfy us. There is an enormous quantity of this old iron. It is admitted into England free of duty. They get it and use it there, and by getting it free it helps to diminish the price of rails and enables them to undersell our rail-making men who make rails in this country. We on the contrary demand a duty, and therefore do not get our rails so cheap. The consequence was that the men who make railroad iron said that if you imposed a heavy duty and kept out this old wrought-iron the result would be that the English would get it all and it would reduce by so much the price of the manufacture of English iron, so that the struggle of our manufacturers would be still harder and more difficult.

Then the other iron manufacturers said this is not to be considered at all with reference to the price of pig iron; in reality the pig iron that is imported does not come in competition with any of our iron that we manufacture. The pig imported is the soft Scotch pig metal that is not to be found in this country, is not made in this country; it does not come into competition; but so far as we are concerned we would just as lief you should put the pig metal down to three dollars if you choose; but that was put up for the purpose of revenue and was kept up for that particular reason.

Under these circumstances, with that object, it was thought best to put old scrap iron at what they said was enough, and that is three dollars per ton on both descriptions. They said another thing, that there are a great many rolling-mills established on the Atlantic border, in New York and Massachusetts and some in Maine—I believe one or perhaps two. They have to bring their iron to the mills and pay freight on it, whereas the manufacturers of iron in Pennsylvania and other places have their iron and their coal at their door. They came to the conclusion, and they said that was the foundation of the resolution of the Iron and Steel Association sent to us, that it was no more than fair that it should come in at the same rate, that it is sufficiently guarded by the proviso we put in. That old iron has to be remanufactured. It consists entirely of broken railroad bars and old railroad bars and different kinds of things, I do not know how many. They thought it advisable that we should put the two together, and they sent their resolutions to that effect to the committee.

I do not know how much was imported last year, but the amount was not large. From the nature of the case it cannot be very large. The greater part of it will go to England where it is admitted free, but a considerable part comes here and is used up in these mills. Nothing like the duty that is mentioned by the honorable Senator was demanded, as I said before, by the parties interested in iron manufacture; but the committee proposed originally to make the duty on cast scrap iron three dollars and on wrought scrap iron eight dollars a ton, and we did not alter that until we were advised to do so by the vote of the Iron and Steel Association to which I have referred. I presume of course they did not know anything about it; and I presume the House committee knew nothing about it; and I presume the Finance Committee knew nothing about it. I will not say there was any intentional unfairness, but I leave the Senate to judge how much reliance is to be placed on the broad assertions of the honorable Senator, who I believe is not a manufacturer of iron himself.

Mr. CHANDLER. The explanation of the Senator from Maine substantiates every statement I made. He says there was an assemblage of iron men here. There was, and they represented the rolling-mill interest.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The president of the association was from the city where the Senator lives.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly; I know it; and he has the largest rolling-mill in the United States. He rolls more iron than any other man in the United States. I am not working for Captain Ward. I propose to make laws that will be advantageous, not to Captain Ward, but to the State of Michigan and the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator if he ever knew a pound of scrap iron to be imported into Detroit of any kind.

Mr. CHANDLER. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Never; it cannot pay the freight.

Mr. CHANDLER. I know perfectly well that railroads are compelled to reroll their iron once in ten years on an average; consequently the effect of the provision reported by the committee will be to admit all the rails in the world into the United States at a duty of three dollars per ton. We shall become the grand recipients of all the scrap iron in the world.

The rollers of scrap iron in the rolling-mills of course desire to get this iron at the lowest possible price; but the effect will be to put out every blast-furnace in the United States, to stop the mining in every mountain in the United States. You simply furnish your rolling-mills with foreign stock without any protection to your furnaces, for this is substantially none. The expense of rerolling bars is only about thirty dollars per ton. They will bring this in at a nominal price and pay a duty of three dollars per ton. The result will be to utterly destroy all the revenue you now derive from iron; you will import nothing but at the duty of three dollars per ton.

As I said before, this wrought scrap iron is worth two or three times as much as pig metal. Pig metal has to be puddled once. It costs to-day twenty-eight dollars per ton to put pig metal into scrap; and yet you put a duty of nine dollars a ton upon pig metal and a mere nominal one of three dollars upon scrap iron. If the Senate propose to abandon the whole iron interests of the United States except the rolling-mills this section accomplishes it, and of course they will stand by it; but if they propose to continue the mining of ore, if they propose to continue the blast furnaces in operation, this section must be rejected, for it is total ruin to—it is absolutely abandoning the whole iron interest of the United States, save and except the rolling-mills.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a far more important question than some Senators are aware, and it is well enough to give it a little consideration. The amount of the old scrap iron introduced into our country in the year 1865 was something like fourteen thousand tons, being about half as much as the pig metal introduced into the country. At that time the duty was eight dollars per ton, as it is now. The amount imported last year, according to the best statement I can find—we have no official statements, and must take those given by the iron men—was about thirty-two thousand tons. The duty on that yielded us a revenue of about a quarter of a million dollars. The House of Representatives in their bill proposed to reduce the duty on this iron to five dollars a ton, which is a step in the opposite direction, a sacrifice of revenue to the amount of about one hundred thousand dollars; not quite as much as my friend from Michigan stated, but still a considerable sum. The proposition is made by the Finance Committee to reduce this duty still more, to three dollars a ton, on the ground that the gathering of this scrap iron from all parts of the world would give employment to our commerce and enable our vessels to carry on a profitable trade with certain countries; that it is really waste material, thrown away in a great measure, in South America, which can be brought here simply for the freight, and would add very much to the aggregate wealth of the country. It was admitted on all hands that the cast scrap iron was about equivalent in value to pig.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not cast scrap.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, mixed cast scrap. The wrought scrap iron is about equal to twice the value of pig iron. That is the statement, and the Senator from Maine will find that I am not far from right. Wrought scrap, that is old iron that had been wrought, brought here in form fit to be manufactured, is worth about twice the value of pig iron; at any rate, it is worth a great deal more than pig.

I was willing for one to yield to the argument that it might be well enough to reduce the duty on cast scrap iron to the lowest possible rate, say three dollars a ton, but I thought there ought to be a discrimination made between the wrought-iron and the cast-iron, because one is twice as valuable as the other.

Perhaps I am justified in stating that the Committee on Finance agreed to that view of the case, that there ought to be a distinction made when a difficulty occurred. A number of gentlemen from Pittsburg represented that under the old system a great many frauds were practiced; that bar or railroad iron and other kinds of iron were cut in blocks or nuggets and brought in as scrap iron, when it was really good iron, and all that was necessary was to roll it in the form of railroad bars. These gentlemen represented that three dollars was enough on the scrap-cast iron; but it has since been suggested to me that these very persons made their representations from their interested stand-point. They want cheap cast-iron in order to roll it into bar iron, it being their manufacture, and they want a higher rate of duty on that which would come in competition with their industry. In other words, they looked at this matter from an interested point of view, and I must confess that the various representations made to us about this iron interest did rather weaken my confidence in the testimony of the gentlemen engaged in the business.

After the committee had conformed its action to these representations, much to my surprise I confess, a resolution was introduced and said to have been passed, and no doubt it was passed, by the Iron and Steel Association convention in this city, requesting the committee to make a uniform duty of three dollars a ton on scrap iron. I must confess that surprised me very much, because it was manifest that certain branches of the iron interest were opposed to this uniform duty, and yet here was the resolution right in the face and eyes of the statement made to us by intelligent gentlemen. On subsequent inquiry I found that this resolution was really the subject of controversy in the association. I think they were likely to break up into two parts on it.

I believe the solution of this difficulty would be to go back to the proposition of the Committee on Finance, which they made on the original statement made to them, to lay a discriminating duty between scrap cast iron, and scrap wrought iron. In doing this we reduce the rate of duty and throw off revenue; but I am willing, for one, to yield to the argument, which was very forcibly put, that this scrap iron is just so much wealth saved if it can be gathered up and brought into our rolling-mills and rolled into bar iron or melted into various irons for use here on the eastern coast. I was perfectly willing to give a discriminating duty, and it is a discriminating duty in favor of the Atlantic coast: it could only be used on the Atlantic coast. It never has gone further than Pittsburg. It seems to me a discrimination ought to be made between iron which is so valuable and that which is comparatively of little value.

Mr. CHANDLER. Pardon me: it can come in immense quantities into Cleveland and Detroit. All the railroads in Canada would send their old rails under this duty across the river to Cleveland and Detroit at a duty of three dollars a ton, and it would all come in as scrap, so that really it would affect the West as well as the East.

Mr. SHERMAN. When you reflect that this wrought-iron in whatever form it may come in may be at once melted and by one single process put into the form of bar iron or railroad iron, it is apparent that it is far more valuable than pig iron, which must go through two or three processes before it can be made into bar or rolled iron. The result is that if you admit it at three dollars a ton, which is only one third of the duty on pig iron, it will be to their interest to convert all kinds of iron possible into the form of scrap-iron by cutting it to pieces, by putting it under some machine and cutting it into nuggets or pieces, and bringing it in in that form, mixed with all kinds of iron, calling it scrap iron, and after it comes in it can be easily selected. The testimony before us was, that the rudest laborer could select the two kinds of iron and separate them without any material cost.

This being the case we may surrender a very large amount of revenue; instead of thirty-two thousand tons, an enormous quantity, we may have one hundred thousand tons. If they can evade the enormous duties we levy now upon wrought-iron and upon the various kinds of iron by bringing it in as scrap iron, it will certainly under this duty be brought in competition with our iron from the western States as well as along the Atlantic coast. I do not think that is right. I hope the Senator from Michigan will modify his proposition so as to make the duty three dollars a ton upon the cast scrap and eight dollars a ton on the wrought scrap, with the proviso now inserted in the amendment of the committee. I am perfectly willing to vote for it in that shape, but I think eight dollars and twelve dollars are rather too high.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think three dollars is too low on the cost of scrap.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All those interested agreed that it was enough.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am informed that pig scrap is of precisely the same value as what is called pig metal, and the duty on it should be the same as on pig metal. I propose to make it one dollar less than the duty on pig metal. Still I am not strenuous about the amount. It is against the enormous importations of rails in the form of old scrap that I am trying to guard.

Mr. SHERMAN. If you put eight dollars on the old scrap wrought iron it will guard against that.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, I will put that at eight dollars, and I will say five dollars on the cast scrap.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why make it five dollars when everybody interested said that three dollars was enough?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will make the rates three dollars and eight dollars respectively.

Mr. WADE. A gentleman whom I know very well, and who passes for one of our best men, who is extensively engaged in making pig iron, told me that this provision as it stood would be destructive of their interests. I know, therefore, that that interest is not unanimous in it. I should not undertake to say whether he was right or wrong.

Mr. SHERMAN. No representative of the pig iron interest came before us. The representations we heard were from those engaged in the making of bar iron out of pig iron. The pig iron interest was not disturbed, because the interest on pig iron is the same under this bill as under the old law, and therefore they did not come before us.

Mr. WADE. But this scrap will come in in lieu of pig. It was supposed it would be made over in that shape and come in here under this diminished duty, and they thought that would be destructive to them. I do not know whether the gentleman who spoke to me about it was right or not, but that was the view he took of it, and he is extensively engaged in the business, and is a man of veracity, and a very good business man.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will put my amendment in this form: make the clause read:

On old cast-iron, three dollars per ton.

On old wrought scrap iron, eight dollars per ton.

And then will leave the proviso to stand as the committee have arranged it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have received a memorandum from a gentleman in whom I place confidence, in which he says that the scrap iron imported last year was thirteen thousand tons. That does not look like as if there was an excessive importation.

Mr. HOWARD. Does that include both kinds?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The scrap iron of kinds imported last year was thirteen thousand tons.

Mr. CHANDLER. What was the duty?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Eight dollars a ton.

Mr. CHANDLER. It would be one hundred and thirty thousand tons with a duty of three dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am speaking of the quantity imported. This gentleman says the railroads on the sea-board are able to get fifty dollars per ton for old rails and are selling them at that and importing new rails at ninety dollars. There were sixty-four thousand tons of new rails last year, and this year there will be one hundred thousand tons imported. The railroad men get no increased protection, and the bar and plate iron get $7 50 per ton increased duty. That is his statement. The railroad men came before us and desired an increase of duty on railroad iron. We did not see fit to grant it. It had not been changed in the House and we left it as the House did. The manufacturers of railroad iron thought they would be at a great disadvantage by a heavy duty on wrought scrap iron, because the argument is that the cheaper railroad iron can be manufactured abroad the more difficulties our manufacturers have to contend with. They stated that a heavy duty on wrought scrap iron would send the wrought scrap all abroad, and the consequence of that would be to increase the expense of manufacturing railroad iron in this country and to place our manufacturers at a greater disadvantage.

I believe there is something due to their statements. We were not disposed, however, to change our original report until we got the resolution of the Iron and Steel Association of which I have spoken, which I am informed was discussed there all day, and at last passed by a very large majority, there being only four or five against it after consideration of the whole subject. I am not inclined to enter into any discussion on the subject now, but if the Senate think it wiser to put the duty up, so be it.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will only add a few words in regard to this matter. It will be remembered that the present duty is eight dollars per ton, and under that fourteen thousand tons were imported two years ago. The Senator from Maine says thirteen thousand tons were imported last year. My information was that the amount was thirty-two thousand; but I presume it is difficult to tell which statement is exactly correct. At any rate, we have the official basis that fourteen thousand tons were imported in 1865 at eight dollars a ton. Consequently a duty of eight dollars per ton on the scrap iron did not discourage a very large trade. But before the committee the persons engaged in commerce and persons who desired to reroll this iron appeared and urged a reduction of the duty, saying it was really a raw product which they might gather up in other countries with whom we are trading, and that it was important to put the duty as low as possible. We yielded to that argument and put it at three dollars. It seems to me, however, that a discrimination ought to be made between the cast scrap and the wrought scrap. There is no difficulty in separating them; and it is proposed to make the duty on wrought scrap only what the duty on both was a year ago. It seems to me that ought to be perfectly satisfactory to all interests, and I hope therefore the amendment will be adopted.

I may say that this was the conclusion of the Committee on Finance after examining the whole matter until the resolution of the Iron and Steel Association came to us, and I now know that that was guided, as probably the action of most bodies of that kind is, perhaps of all bodies, by the interest of the parties concerned. In that association were a great number of men engaged in rolling iron, and among the rest one of the most valuable and eminent of the constituents of my friend from Michigan, a gentleman largely engaged in rolling iron. Of course they looked at this from an interested point of view. If we look at the question from a revenue point of view it is manifest that it is right to levy eight dollars a ton on wrought scrap. The interest will bear it, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CHANDLER. In this convention to which the Senator from Maine alludes, the rolling interest was predominant. There were but very few representatives of other manufactures of iron, and the few dissenting voices were those who were interested in the mining and forging or smelting of ore.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The manufacturers of pig iron were very largely represented. Some of the largest manufacturers of pig iron in the country were in that meeting, Mr. Scranton, of Pennsylvania, among others.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have it from one of the rolling men that the rolling interest was predominant, and that the manufacturers of pig iron protested that it would be the ruin of their business. The Senator says that last year there were but thirteen thousand tons of scrap iron imported under a duty of eight dollars a ton. This difference of five dollars a ton would bring the entire scrap iron of the world to your doors. As I said before, all railroad iron has to be renewed once in ten years. It all becomes scrap. Reduce the duty to three dollars and you will import scrap iron from Russia, Germany, Italy, and all parts of the world, and you will not receive a dollar from railroad bars on which you now levy a duty of fourteen dollars a ton. It would all come in the shape of old scrap. This would be ruinous to the Treasury; it would be ruinous to the blast furnaces; it would be ruinous to the whole interest, as I said before, except simply those concerned in rolling. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not desire to interfere with the progress of this bill and have no motion to make; but there seems to be some doubt as to what are the views of this Iron and Steel Makers' Association; and as it is important that we should know what their opinions are before we come to a final vote on this question, I suggest the propriety of postponing the consideration of this bill until there can be an extra session of that association to let us know how we ought to vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we should find the same differences of opinion that we have here.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Connors, Cragin, Creswell, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Lane, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Yates—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Davis, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Johnson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Patterson, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wilson—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cowan, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fogg, Fowler, Guthrie, Howe, McDougall, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, and Saulsbury—16.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRESWELL. On the 63d page of the bill, section nine, line five hundred and forty-six, the committee have stricken out the word

"three" and inserted "four;" so as to make it read:

On chromate and bichromate of potassa, four cents per pound.

I move to amend that amendment by inserting "five" instead of "four," so as to make the duty on chromate and bichromate of potassa five cents per pound.

All the chromate and bichromate of potassa that was used in this country twenty-five years ago was brought from Glasgow. The ore from which it is manufactured, known as chrome ore, was about that time discovered in the upper part of Maryland, in the county in which I reside, (Cecil), and in Hartford and Baltimore counties, and stretching over into the lower part of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania. At a great expense, and after great loss, some gentlemen in Baltimore entered largely into the manufacture of the article, and their works have grown until at the present time, or rather at the beginning of the war, they had employed in the manufacture of chromate and bichromate of potassa some two or three hundred men. They had also, by means of their increased production, brought down the price of that article from thirty cents to fifteen cents per pound, and they had almost the entire trade of the country at that diminished rate. They applied some years ago for a duty upon the article, and a duty was imposed, first of twenty per cent. ad valorem, and afterward of three cents per pound. Under that duty they succeeded in establishing their branch of industry. They bought large tracts of land; they erected extensive works; they invested a large amount of capital; and, as I said just now, they employed a large number of workmen—some two or three hundred, perhaps more than that even—in a section of country that is unable by any other means to sustain its population. It seems that this article of chrome is not found in any but very poor soil. They have gone on manufacturing, notwithstanding the increased price of labor and the deterioration of our currency, until within the last two years they find themselves reduced to such extremities that they will be obliged to abandon the manufacture of the article and leave the entire supply of this country dependent upon the foreign manufacturers at Glasgow. If that should be the case, the result will be that the article will be put up to its old figures.

Now, sir, I think I can show conclusively to the Senate that the increase to four cents per pound, which my distinguished friend from Maine suggested the other day, and which he thought sufficient, is not such protection as this interest needs. Before the war there was an active competition between the manufacture here and the manufacture in Glasgow; and, by the way, it is a single fight between them. This is the only place in this country where chromate and bichromate of potassa is manufactured, and these parties in Glasgow are the only parties who export from Glasgow and import into this country. It is a battle between them; and the question is, whether we shall abandon the trade to the foreign manufacturer or hand it over to the manufacturer in this country.

At the beginning of the war the price at which these parties produced the article under the difference in the cost of labor was eleven cents in Glasgow and fifteen cents in Baltimore, to which price the manufacturers had brought down the articles from thirty cents, as I just now stated. If you add three cents, the old duty, to the eleven cents, the price in Glasgow, it will make fourteen cents. Add one third of that for the deterioration in our currency, and it makes eighteen and two thirds cents. Add to that one third of a cent per pound for freight—it is less than that; about one fourth—and it makes nineteen cents, which is cheaper than the article can be produced in this country, and the result will be the manufactory will be closed. If you take the duty at four cents per pound these parties will be able to place it in the market in this country at twenty cents, which is cheaper than it can be produced here, because when you add to fifteen cents per pound, the lowest price at which it was sold before the war in gold, the deterioration in our currency, it brings the expense to twenty cents per pound, and to that is to be added an increase of ninety per cent. in the cost of labor.

Now, sir, I think it nothing more than reasonable, right, and proper that this industry, in the first place, should be encouraged, and that, to do that, we should impose a duty of five cents per pound on this article. If five cents be allowed the foreign manufacturer will be able to place the article in the market in this country at twenty-one and one third cents per pound; so that upon a living rate of twenty-one cents per pound there will be only a margin of one third of a cent. If gold depreciates, or rather if our currency improves in value to such an extent as to lessen the margin between the two, then the competition becomes greater; and if our labor should increase even at these figures, or if it should not decrease as our currency appreciates, the result will be equally disastrous even at the duty that I ask from the Senate. I therefore think it as essential to this branch of industry that the increase should be made to five cents per pound.

Now, sir, as to the revenue: in the one case the manufactured article is produced entirely, or almost entirely in this country, and these manufacturers, as all manufacturers in the country, pay a large percentage to the internal revenue. If the production be abroad we only derive the duties upon the importations.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is there any internal revenue on this?

Mr. CRESWELL. They pay a large percentage on the amount produced.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do they really pay anything on the amount produced? Does the internal revenue law apply to it at all?

Mr. CRESWELL. I think it does.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My impression is that it does not.

Mr. CRESWELL. At any rate it is all important that the manufacture should be preserved here, and to do that, having some knowledge of the article myself, I believe that five cents per pound is actually necessary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will ask the Senator for what purpose this article is chiefly used. I do not know; I am not informed upon the subject.

Mr. CRESWELL. It is used as a mordant for dyes, and largely in the manufacture of paints of various kinds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. CRESWELL. I ask for a vote by yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state that there is no internal revenue tax at all on this production; so that that part of the Senator's argument as to what they had to pay to the Government amounts to nothing.

Mr. CRESWELL. I accept the gentleman's correction. I may be in error in regard to that, but this increase is certainly necessary to preserve the manufacture in this country.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Connors, Cragin, Creswell, Doolittle, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Davis, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Patterson, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cowan, Dixon, Fogg, Fowler, Guthrie, Howe, Kirkwood, McDougall, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, and Saulsbury—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I propose to amend the bill on page 28, section seven, lines twenty-eight and twenty-nine. The clause now reads:

On sheet or plate iron, thinner than No. 22 and not thinner than No. 24 wire gauge, two and a half cents per pound.

I move to strike out "two and a half" and to insert "three."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator whether it would not be as well to omit attempting to amend the bill along there for the present, and let it come up to-morrow. The matter will be before the Committee on Finance in the morning, and some alterations may be made in those rates. I suppose there will be several of them changed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I am glad the Senator has suggested that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw his motion to amend?

Mr. SPRAGUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. On page 39, section eight, in line thirty-eight, I move to strike out the words "and one half;" so that the clause will read:

On lead in pigs or bars, two cents per pound.

The effect of this amendment, as I propose it, if adopted, will be to leave the duty on pig lead the same as it is now; and I am informed from a credible source that two cents a pound on that article is as much as the article will bear. The increased duty is not needed for protection. The western mines do not produce enough lead for the consumption of the western trade. The current of trade has been reversed; and instead of bringing lead from the West to the eastern coast, lead is now imported and carried West. The western mines for the last two years have not produced enough for the supply of the western country; so that this additional duty is not needed for protection. Two cents a pound in gold for this article is enough, so I am assured; as much as the article will bear; and at two cents a pound it will bring to the Government more revenue than to increase it. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HOWE. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. If the Senator had proposed to add a half cent to this duty, instead of subtracting a half cent, I would have voted with him with pleasure; and if I do him any injustice by opposing this motion, I will try to offset it by a motion to add a half cent when this fails, as I hope it will.

Now, Mr. President, I have a table before me which will give you a little idea of the experiences of the lead trade. In 1844 the duties on lead were three cents a pound, and the West sent to New York something over forty-four million pounds of lead, and none was imported. Two years later this duty of three cents per pound was changed to twenty per cent., and the receipts of lead from the West at New York began to fall off. In 1849 there was only thirty-five millions and a half or a little more received at New York from the West, whereas twenty-three millions were imported. The receipts of western lead fell off steadily down to 1865, when they received only one million eight hundred and fifty-six thousand five hundred and forty pounds, and imported thirty million four hundred and seventy-nine thousand six hundred and eighty pounds. Now it is proposed to put the duty at two and a half cents; that is, within half a cent of what it was in 1844. If our friends in the East were making money out of this state of things there would be some reason for their contending for it; but when they bought the whole of their lead from the West, in 1844, the price was $8 95 per hundred. That was what it was worth in New York. The next year it went up to $4 03, and it has steadily increased in price until in 1865 it was $10 95 per hundred.

Under such an exhibition of the state of the trade, inasmuch as lead costs the consumer about three times as much under the present duty as it did under the higher duty, the duty of three cents a pound, and inasmuch as the Government gets now considerable of a revenue, and would if it put the duty up to three cents per pound get a much larger revenue when it got nothing before, I think we had better, instead of reducing this duty, add to it; certainly not reduce it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Creswell, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Morrill, Patterson, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, and Trumbull—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Conness, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Sherman, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cowan, Cragin, Dixon, Fogg, Fowler, Guthrie, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, and Saulsbury—16.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. HARRIS] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CATTELL. I move to amend the bill on page 66, section nine, line six hundred and twenty-four, by striking out the words "a half," and inserting "three-fourths of a;" so that the clause will read:

On sal-soda, soda crystals, and all crude carbonates of soda not otherwise herein provided for, three-fourths of a cent per pound.

This is an amendment which was agreed to by the committee. Soda ash is the base upon which sal-soda is made, and the tariff upon it is half a cent per pound. This is a higher manufacture, and the tariff was left at half a cent a pound upon it also. I propose now to change it to three fourths of a cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe there is no objection to that.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey what is the value of that article?

Mr. CATTELL. The value of the article I think is about two pence half penny sterling, perhaps three pence—seven cents—as near as I can remember.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It used to be before the war about two and a half.

Mr. HOWE. On this question I have been asked to move to raise that duty to one cent, and I am told that is essential.

Mr. CATTELL. I will only say in answer to the gentleman that I was authorized by the committee, on the first examination of this subject, to change it to a cent, but further examination satisfied me that the manufacturers can live at three fourths of a cent; that it is a fair protection which they ought to have; and I believe they will be content with it.

Mr. HOWE. There is quite a quantity of it still imported.

Mr. CATTELL. So there is; but I think with half a cent duty these manufactories have been stopped, and with three fourths of a cent they will be able to go on.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CATTELL. I propose further to amend the bill on page 39, section eight, line fifty-one, by striking out "thirty" and inserting "forty;" so that it will read:

On nickel, forty cents per pound.

I will state very briefly on this subject that this is a new manufacture of a very important article indeed. Previous to the war the ores from this country were sent over to the other side of the water, and the nickel manufactured or extracted there and brought back to this country. We have nickel ores in great abundance, not only in Pennsylvania, but in Connecticut. The duty which is allowed here is just about thirty-five per cent. ad valorem. The value of this article is four shillings and six pence on the other side. It is a less rate of duty than is allowed to any other of the metals, in my judgment, either to copper, iron, lead, or steel. This is a metal which is becoming to be very extensively used in our country. I sincerely hope that this amendment will prevail, because I believe, from a careful examination of the subject, that the manufacture can just as well be continued on this side of the water.

All that the gentlemen connected with this manufacture ask is that you shall not discriminate against him; that you shall give him about the same protection at any rate that you give to older established manufactures in metals. I know that it will be said that there is only one extensive establishment in the country, but the gentleman owning it has already expended half a million of dollars and is very much in the condition of the Portland oil works of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance. Having established this branch of business, and having proven most effectually that this article can be manufactured here at less than the average rate of duty that is given to metals of all kinds, I ask that he shall receive that protection. I have only to say that it is not a monopoly; that it is open to everybody; that this gentleman is a gentleman of science and knowledge, who through many, many difficulties has brought this manufacture up to its present point, and I sincerely hope that this advance of duty will be allowed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I had an interview last evening with the gentleman who is engaged in the manufacture of nickel, and I got from him a great deal of light on the subject, and was exceedingly gratified with the interview, from his intelligence and apparent, and I have no doubt real, fairness. There is some allowance, however, I think to be made for the feeling of every man with regard to this matter of protection; and after quite an extended interview with him, which was a very interesting one from the specimens he showed me, I came to the conclusion that it was not so necessary for him to put up this duty on the finished article from thirty to forty cents a pound; but I also came to the conclusion that the duty on page 40, lines fifty-four and fifty-five, on nickel matte, speiss, or oxide, of ten per cent. ad valorem is not enough, and should be raised to the same rate as is imposed on the finished article, nickel, for the reason that it comes so near it that undoubtedly everything would be imported in the shape of oxide, and he would really derive no benefit from the duty of thirty cents a pound on the finished article.

Since my interview with him I look with great favor upon his undertaking, and if I had come, on reflection, to the conclusion that my friend from New Jersey has, I would make no objection to this proposition; but I feel bound also to say that I was not convinced that the duty of thirty cents on the finished article, nickel, was not enough, and therefore I cannot vote for the amendment. That is all I feel disposed to say. If my friend from New Jersey would propose to raise the duty on nickel matte, speiss, or oxide, on the next page, to the same rate, thirty cents a pound, I would vote for that, because I think that change ought to be made.

Mr. FOSTER, [Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.] When this bill came from the House of Representatives it proposed a duty of fifteen per cent. ad valorem on nickel, and the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance to the Senate was at that rate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend is mistaken.

Mr. CATTELL. I beg to correct the gentleman. The rate fixed by us was forty cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Fifteen per cent. is the present rate.

Mr. CATTELL. And forty cents was the rate which the special commissioner, after a thorough examination, himself allowed, and it was altered by the Finance Committee.

Mr. FOSTER. I am mistaken. I was speaking of the report as it came from the Committee on Finance. When the Committee on Finance reported their amendment to the House bill they reported—it will be found on the fifty-first line of page 39—"On nickel fifteen per cent. ad valorem;" and that, I believe, is the rate now imposed by law upon this commodity. The chairman of the committee moved to add thirty cents per pound; so that as it now stands in the amendment—"On nickel fifteen per cent. ad valorem, and thirty cents per pound specific duty."

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; the fifteen per cent. ad valorem was stricken out, and thirty cents per pound substituted.

Mr. FOSTER. Then it is thirty cents a pound specific duty. Well, Mr. President, it was stated by the Senator from New Jersey (and the fact is undoubtedly so) that there is but one establishment where nickel is manufactured in the country at the present time, and, as I am informed, the whole amount of capital invested is not to exceed $200,000. Until within a very recent period, at all events, the amount manufactured was very small, and the quality was so poor that it was not used in the arts except for very inferior styles of manufacture. It was not nearly equal to the foreign article, and the foreign article has been used instead of this, and will continue to be if this is not improved in quality, even though it be sold cheaper.

Nickel is used very extensively in the manufacture of German-silver ware; it is a component part of that metal, and a very important part. As I stated the other day, in the State of Connecticut there are now some $3,000,000 invested in the manufacture of German-silver ware. On those manufactures there was paid last year something over $200,000 of internal revenue tax. This manufacture of nickel has a capital invested of only $200,000 in the whole; and if it is manufactured to ever so great an extent it pays no internal revenue tax or duty whatever. The manufacturers of this article do not pay a cent for the support of the Government.

Now, Mr. President, a duty of fifteen per cent. ad valorem upon that which is a raw material to the manufactures of German-silver ware, I submit, is a sufficiently high duty; indeed, I think it is a very high duty; it is so high that those who manufacture the German-silver ware will scarcely be enabled to continue the manufacture if the duty is raised on nickel to thirty cents a pound, unless there is an additional duty put upon the importation of German-silver ware. The German-silver ware will be imported from abroad with the present duty upon it, and the manufacture of German-silver ware in the United States will stop, because the manufacturer of German-silver ware abroad pays no such tax as this on his nickel, and the present duty on German-silver ware is not relatively as high as the duty will be on the manufacturer here at home, when he pays thirty cents per pound on his nickel additional, five per cent. internal revenue tax upon the amount of his production, and then tax on income. He will pay three taxes, while the manufacturer abroad of German-silver ware will at the most pay but one, the duty at the custom-house.

Now, Mr. President, is it good policy at this time of day, in the present condition of this country, and especially of labor in this country, to undertake to create a new species of manufacture by the imposition of duties which shall exclude the foreign article and stimulate this production here at home? How has the Committee on Finance reasoned on this subject in regard to another commodity greatly used in the country and long used, and an article of prime necessity—salt-peter? That is a commodity which has been imported from abroad and manufactured at home; and there are several States now where salt-peter is manufactured. It is manufactured in Connecticut, in New York, and in Massachusetts. The establishment in Connecticut is able to manufacture ten tons per day. What has been the course in regard to that manufacture? Why, sir, it has had a small protective duty. The present duty on salt-peter is two and one half cents per pound, and the business is by no means a profitable one to the manufacturer. But what do the committee propose to do? They propose, as will be seen on page 63 of the bill—

On salt-peter, or niter, or nitrate of potassa, crude, one cent per pound.

Instead of allowing a protection to the manufacture of salt-peter, which has been encouraged for years past, and which has now grown up into a manufacture of importance, and of so much importance that, as I have said, one establishment in Connecticut is able to manufacture ten tons per day, the committee propose to take off more than half of all the duty that now by law is imposed at the custom-house upon foreign salt-peter and to reduce it to one cent per pound.

Mr. HENDERSON. But they have since amended the clause so as to make it one and one half cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Even if it has been so amended, which I had not noticed, it is still only about one half what by law the duty now is.

Mr. President, if the policy be to reduce the amount of duty on salt-peter because it can be brought from abroad cheaper, and because under the circumstances it is not deemed a matter of necessity to protect domestic labor so as to produce an article which in time of war it would be all important we should manufacture at home, if that be not deemed important enough to have a duty upon it sufficient to keep the manufacture alive after it has been established and a large amount is being manufactured, I ask what kind of policy it is to create a manufacture that does not exist, and break down home manufactures, now in successful operation, which import from abroad their raw material? It seems to me there ought to be at least a consistent policy. If we adopt the principle that we will manufacture the raw material at home, stimulate its production by putting such taxes upon the importation as to produce it at home, we ought to carry that principle out, and apply it to nickel. I agree that under those circumstances we should prohibit the foreign article, or put such a duty upon it that will amount to prohibition. All the manufactures of nickel should then be protected so that they can be manufactured without importation from abroad. If gentlemen are prepared for this, I say let it be applied generally and carried out throughout the bill.

It is true that in Connecticut we are interested in having cheap nickel. If we cannot have it because the manufacturer of the raw material must be protected and a duty imposed to stop the importation from abroad, I submit to it; but I say, give us the benefit of that principle when we come to salt-peter. We are manufacturing salt-peter largely. The manufacture has been long established, and we are now manufacturing an excellent article; we are able to manufacture all that the country wants. Why then take off the duty from that and import it from abroad?

I ask that some principle shall be adopted here. Do not take off the duty in one case and put it on in another in like circumstances. Be consistent; carry the principle through one way or the other. Then, though we lose in one case we shall save in the other. Now we lose in both; and the principle is certainly contradictory of itself. I hope that the manufacture of nickel may eventually be established in this country. That it will become a matter of importance I have little doubt; but whether, in the infancy of the manufacture, when we have but a single establishment, it is wise to destroy these establishments that use nickel as a raw material and depend on the foreign article seems to me to be a question that admits but one answer. The manufacturer of nickel cannot by any possibility expect to export the commodity after he has manufactured it. If there is such an amount of duty put upon it as to prohibit the foreign article without at the same time putting an additional duty on the manufactures of nickel, the producer of the raw material really will derive no benefit, for he will not be able to sell to the domestic manufacturer of those articles of which nickel forms a component part, to wit, German-silver ware. If the manufacturing of German-silver ware stops in the country there will be no sale by the manufacturer of nickel to those manufacturers, and German-silver ware is the principal article into which nickel enters. It is used to some small extent at the Mint in making some small coins; but the amount used there is very small. If the manufacture of German-silver ware is broken up in the country the manufacture of nickel as a raw material will be broken up also.

Now, the committee, I suppose, are not prepared to put on an additional duty of ten per cent. or fifteen per cent. on the importation of German-silver ware. I suppose they would not consent to do it. If they do not do it the manufacture of German-silver ware in this country must be checked or stopped, and if they put on the additional duty it is questionable whether there will be as ready a sale of German silver-ware; for if that species of ware rises in price so as to approach the cost of silver there will be much less sale or no sale for it. The sale depends upon its cheapness; and if the article is made so expensive as an additional amount of duties may make it, it will not be sold to the same extent in the market as it now is.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that there will be no attempt to alter the present duty on nickel, fifteen per cent. I was about to move to reduce it, to strike out thirty cents and let it stand fifteen per cent. ad valorem; but the motion now to strike out thirty and insert forty cents, which will be almost fifty per cent. duty specific on nickel, will certainly bear very hard upon, if it does not ruin, the manufacture of German-silver ware. It will enable, it is true, the manufacturer of nickel to have a home market; but what will that home market be worth? Nothing; there will be no purchasers. I hope, sir, that this amendment will not be made.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall not follow the Senator from Connecticut in the illustration which he has introduced from salt-peter; but I ask the attention of the Senate directly to the question of nickel. There I am with my friend from New Jersey in the motion that he has made; and it seems to me that the Senator from Connecticut founded his argument—I say it with entire respect, of course—on an exaggeration of the consequence that would ensue from the adoption of this motion. He set before us the large amount of German-plated-silver ware manufactured in Connecticut and asked us whether we would discontinue that manufacture. To that I answer at once clearly, no, I would not; and I would not give a vote that, as I understood it, would have any such consequence. But what would be the result of the motion now before us on this plated ware? In order to understand what that result must be you must see to what extent nickel enters into plated ware. Why, sir, would you believe it, after listening to the address of the Senator from Connecticut, the nickel that enters into finished plated ware is so small that the plated ware when finished averages about thirty or forty times the nickel consumed. You see, therefore, how infinitesimal, I may almost say, the nickel is which is introduced as a component part into the German-plated ware; and yet, according to the argument of the Senator upon the increased duty on that infinitesimal quantity of nickel, is going to break up this whole business of Connecticut to the amount of $3,000,000. It seems to me the statement of the Senator is too strong; it overdoes itself; it cannot be accepted.

Suppose the proposition is adopted which is now before you, as I understand it it would amount to simply a duty of thirty-five per cent. That is not so high as the average of the duties we are imposing. And if you go still further and see what that would add in the way of tax on the German-silver ware you find that it would be only three quarters of one per cent. Now, three quarters of one per cent., is to be added to the cost of this German-silver ware; and according to the argument of the Senator under that addition this great interest of $3,000,000 in Connecticut is to sink! I can not accept the conclusion.

It seems to me that the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey is reasonable. It is to a certain extent in harmony with the bill. I am not, however, one who thinks that the bill has much harmony in it; but so far as I understand it, it is in harmony with the bill, and I believe it would have a good influence on an interest which I should be sorry to see starved out, and if this proposition be not adopted, it I fear will be starved out.

Mr. CATTELL. Only a word; and first in regard to the action of the Committee on Finance on the subject of saltpeter. The committee gave considerable attention to that subject and finally decided that it was one of the unnatural manufactures. We have not the raw material and we are obliged to import it. It is made from nitrate of soda and from muriate of potash, both of which we are obliged to import, one from Germany and the other from Peru. Consequently the committee on a careful examination thought that while it was forced into existence during the war by high prices it was yet one of those manufactures not susceptible of being sustained by a fair levy of import duties. The committee, however, did two things for that interest: first, they increased the duty half a cent, making it a cent and a half; and next, they decreased the duty on both the articles which enter into its manufacture. So they went just as far as they could, consistent with revenue, to favor this very thing which in their judgment was rather an unnatural manufacture. I think the chairman of the committee will bear me out that this was about the view that was taken on that matter.

It is not so with nickel. Nickel is a native ore. I have said here and say again these native ores have been taken in their immense bulk and have been shipped across the ocean, and the nickel has been manufactured from them there and brought back and sold to the people of the United States. We have plenty of the ore; this gentleman has no monopoly of this ore; it is spread through Connecticut and through nearly all the New England States; and all that we ask now is that this enterprise shall be sustained by even a less average duty than you have given all through this bill.

I desire to correct one misapprehension which the Senator from Connecticut labors under, and that is the statement that this duty is about fifty per cent. The price of nickel upon the other side of the water is four shillings and sixpence sterling and it is quite uniform in this price. Four shillings and sixpence, as everybody knows, is, in round numbers, $1 12; forty cents a pound on that is a mere fraction different from thirty-five per cent. ad valorem. The average of this bill throughout gives to every manufacturing interest of prominence in the country more than that ad valorem duty; and I hope this interest will not be discriminated against.

The question being put on a division; there were—ayes 12, noes 10; no quorum voting.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does that take precedence of my call for the yeas and nays?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) The Chair thinks it does.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator withdraw his motion for a moment that I may make a statement?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to state, because I do not want any misapprehension, that I do not expect to finish the bill to-night. There is one question connected with it to come up to-morrow before the committee. If the Senate wishes to adjourn now, I give notice that I shall ask the Senate to continue in session to-morrow until we finish the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to say one word on the proposed adjournment. We are sitting here at the most inconvenient hours possible for the whole Senate, as it seems to me. Why we should sit here at the very dinner hour of all of us and then adjourn day after day, is to me very remarkable. It seems to me it is punishing ourselves. Why not take a recess at half-past four and come here at seven and finish the bill? Why continue in session here day after day until about this hour, which I am sure incommodes every member of the Senate, and we accomplish nothing by it? It seems to me we had better have an understanding and take a recess at the usual dinner hour and not sit here over that hour and then adjourn. I am willing to stay any reasonable time; but from five to six o'clock is to me the most inconvenient hour possible.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not wish to ask anything unreasonable of the Senate; and if they choose to adjourn now or at any other time in the afternoon or evening they have the perfect power to do so. I claim nothing about it. The honorable Senator from Illinois will recollect, however, that on one or two occasions, I think, at this session, on some bill certainly of not more importance than this, he insisted regularly upon not adjourning the Senate, but holding on until an hour as late as this, night after night, and finally adjourned on getting an understanding as to the time when the vote should be taken.

On this bill there has been an adjournment four evenings at five o'clock, and I think only one evening did we sit after five o'clock. Now it is for the Senate to do just what it pleases. I am no more interested in this matter than any one else; I do not ask the Senate to remain as a personal favor to me. I have nothing to say about it. If the Senate choose to adjourn every afternoon at half past two, so be it; but let us have the vote taken by yeas and nays and regularly entered on the record.

I have given notice that to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to stay until the bill is finished. When I have asked them to do so there is the end of it as far as I am concerned. If they do not choose to stay they need not—I have nothing to say about that; the time is at their disposal, and not at mine.

My observation in the Senate with regard to this matter of dinner and the importance of dinner has led me to the conclusion that, notwithstanding all the feeling there is for the freedmen and for our friends down South, &c., if they should happen by any accident to weigh in the balance against dinner at the regular hour they would be very apt to kick the beam, notwithstanding all the talk we make about them. That's my notion.

Now, I do not claim any merit for myself. I voted against the recess of the Senate for ten days during the holidays. I stayed here during the whole of the time and worked every day upon this bill, with the exception of Sundays, and I do not want to be questioned too particularly about them; and I have worked on it every day since that I could get an opportunity to do so, and I have gone without my dinner. Now, if gentlemen choose to say that dinner is of so much importance that they cannot stay, so be it; only it does not rest with me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts renew his motion to adjourn?

Mr. SUMNER. I renew the motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish to say but one word.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to understand the question.

Mr. SUMNER. I think I had better not withdraw it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish only to say a word. I merely wish to make one observation, and that is this: that I do not think the dinner, perhaps, any more important than my friend from Maine; but I see no reason for punishing ourselves unnecessarily.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does my friend consider that doing the public business is a punishment?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I consider that when we incommode ourselves unnecessarily the public gains nothing by it and it is a punishment to ourselves. That is all there is to it. I think we can do just as much business and have our regular hours.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why did not the Senator consider that when he had his own bills up, instead of insisting on everybody staying, then?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think I did. We do not see ourselves as others see us, but I never meant to be unreasonable when I had charge of any bill. I certainly think this is a very bad hour. I give way to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey the Senator from Maine asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; I will withdraw the call if Senators want to adjourn. I do not want to be unreasonable.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On the general question of staying here without dinner, this side of the House will stand I have no doubt by the Senator from Maine; but on to-morrow evening I must say to him we cannot exactly agree to stay with him, and hope he will arrange his programme so as not to require that to-morrow evening.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senate will decide all that question. I shall make the motion, and then if they do not see fit to do it, of course they will not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am willing to stay here now and go ahead with the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It is hopeless for me in a minority to contend against the passage of this bill. I see no reason why we should sit here and oppose the passage of a bill which I presume by the prevailing sentiment of the Senate is to pass. I simply wish to say that I shall vote against this bill upon the principle that it is founded upon that declaration which may be found in some poet by gentlemen who will take the trouble to look into it:

"The good old rule, the simple plan,
That he shall take who has the power,
And he shall keep who can."

I therefore think that this fight is fruitless, and I see no reason why the business of the Senate should be interrupted by dilatory motions. I shall vote for a direct vote on the question, intending to vote against the bill. Sir, I think it is a bill designed to promote the interests of one section to the disadvantage of other sections of the country. But I will not discuss it. I think the philosophy of the bill is found in the quotation which I have made. I hope there will be a vote on the bill to-night.

Mr. LANE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, January 28, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of States and Territories for bills and joint resolutions on leave to be referred to their appropriate committees, and not to be brought back by motions to reconsider the references.

LAND WARRANT NO. 46,318.

Mr. BRANDEGEE introduced a bill to authorize the issue of a patent on land warrant

No. 46,318; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PORT OF CAMDEN, NEW JERSEY.

Mr. STARR introduced a bill relative to the port of Camden, New Jersey; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CONSUL AT HAMBURG.

Mr. ANCONA introduced a bill to regulate and fix the salary of the consul at Hamburg; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

POST ROADS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. ANCONA also introduced a bill to establish certain post roads in Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

ELIZABETH CASSADY.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill granting a pension to Elizabeth Cassidy, widow of the late Michael Cassidy, first lieutenant company B, sixty-ninth regiment Pennsylvania volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill explanatory of the act relating to revenue stamps upon writs of process in courts of record; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MRS. GLORVINA FORT.

Mr. MYERS introduced a bill appropriating to Mrs. Glorvina Fort, of Philadelphia, an amount awarded by the United States court on June 26, 1793, to her father for loss of cargo of the brig Catharine, captured by the French frigate L'Ambuscade; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CRIMINAL CODE FOR THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WELKER introduced a bill to provide a criminal code for the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

MARY A. CROSS.

Mr. BUCKLAND introduced a bill for the relief of Mary A. Cross; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

MARINDA STAGE.

Mr. BUCKLAND also introduced a bill for the relief of Marinda Stage; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TAX ON COTTON AND SUGAR.

Mr. TRIMBLE introduced a bill to repeal the tax on cotton and sugar; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. KELSO introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. NOELL introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," passed January 8, 1867; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. NOELL. I move the reference of this bill to a select committee of five, and on that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to hear the bill read.

The bill, which was read, provides that the act of January 8, 1867, be amended so as to abolish all disqualification from voting on account of sex.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The House is acting under the operation of the previous question on the motion to refer the bill to a select committee.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be entertained in the morning hour during this call. Under this call bills must be referred to the appropriate committees.

On the motion of Mr. NOELL, to refer the bill to a select committee, there were—ayes 31, noes 50; no quorum voting.

Mr. NOELL. I call for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 74, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Baker, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Boyer, Broomall, Bundy, Campbell, Cooper, Defrees, Denison, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Halo, Hawkins, Hise, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Le Blond, Loan, McClurg, McKee, Miller, Newell, Niblack, Noell, Orth, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Sitgreaves, Starr, Stevens, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, Henry D. Washburn, and Winfield—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Cullem, Darling, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Grinnell, Higby, Holmes, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Koontz, Laffin, Lynch, Marvin, McIndoe, McRuer, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Stokes, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—74.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Bergen, Blow, Bromwell, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Culver, Davis, Dawson, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Briggs, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Hill, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Hunter, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Longyear, Marshall, Marston, Maynard, McCullough, Morris, Moulton, Nicholson, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rousseau, Shanklin, Stilwell, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, and Wright—68.

So the House refused to refer the bill to a select committee.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

PROCEEDINGS OF FEDERAL COURTS.

Mr. FARQUHAR introduced a bill directing all writs and processes issued from United States courts to be in the name of the people, and requiring the forms of writs, pleadings, practice, and procedure in the several States to be adopted in the courts of the United States held within the said States respectively; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SOUTH ALABAMA ORPHAN ASYLUM.

Mr. JULIAN introduced a bill to aid the South Alabama Orphan Asylum; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RETIREMENT OF TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. ROSS. I introduce a joint resolution providing that so much of the act of the last session of Congress as authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to retire $4,000,000 of the legal-tender Treasury notes per month from circulation be and the same is hereby repealed; and ask that it be passed.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done during the morning hour.

Mr. ROSS. I suppose then that the Committee on Reconstruction is as good a committee to whom it may be referred as any other. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not an appropriate committee.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was referred; and also move that that motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order. The joint resolution, however, cannot be brought back by a motion to reconsider; the rule forbids it.

SURROGATE OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE introduced a bill to create the office of surrogate of the District of Columbia and to provide for the appointment of surrogate and define his powers and duties; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

GUARDIANS OF MINORS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE also introduced a bill in relation to guardians of minors in the District of Columbia, their appointments, powers, and duties; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MARSHAL OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE also introduced a bill to provide for the appointment of a marshal for the District of Columbia, and to change the mode of appointing that officer; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

CLAIMS.

Mr. BLAINE introduced a bill to amend section two of chapter one hundred and twenty-nine of the public acts of 1849; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

UNITED STATES NOTES.

Mr. BUNDY introduced a joint resolution providing that so much of an act entitled "An act to amend an act to provide ways and means to support the Government," approved April 12, 1866, as authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to retire United States notes be suspended; and hereafter it shall be unlawful for the Secretary of the Treasury to retire or withdraw any part of the said United States notes from general circulation as money; provided all mutilated notes may be withdrawn from circulation and destroyed by the Secretary of the Treasury as may now be provided by law; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

IMPEACHMENT.

The SPEAKER stated the next business in order to be the consideration of the following resolutions lying over from last Monday:

Resolved, That for the purpose of securing the fruits of the victories gained on the part of the Republic during the late war, waged by rebels and traitors against the life of the nation, and of giving effect to the will of the people as expressed at the polls during the late election by majorities numbering in the aggregate more than four hundred thousand votes, it is the imperative duty of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to take, without delay, such action as will accomplish the following objects:

1. The impeachment of the officer now exercising the functions pertaining to the office of the President of the United States of America, and his removal from office, upon his conviction in due form of the crimes and high misdemeanors of which he is manifestly and notoriously guilty, and which render it unsafe longer to permit him to exercise the powers he has unlawfully assumed.

2. To provide for the faithful and efficient administration of the executive department within the limits prescribed by law.

Mr. LOAN. I move that the resolutions be referred to a select committee of seven, with power to send for persons and papers, and leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. It cannot have leave to report at any time without unanimous consent.

Mr. LOAN. I withdraw that part of the motion.

Mr. Speaker, the object I have in making the motion is this: it is well known that the appropriate committees of this House are so crowded with business, and some of them having been called and not being liable to be called again this session, that to refer this matter to any of them would virtually be to declare on the part of this House it does not desire to press this investigation any further. In my judgment the best interests of the Government and all parties concerned require immediate investigation and the result published in an official form; and in my judgment the only means to accomplish that purpose is the reference of the investigation to a select committee, with power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. JENCKES. I move it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] whether he makes his motion remembering that this same matter has been already committed to the Judiciary Committee, and whether he would deem it wise for this House to institute a second investigation of the same sort, having two committees pari passu acting together on the subject.

Mr. LOAN. I am fully cognizant of all these facts, and I am further cognizant of this additional fact, that by a reference to the Judiciary Committee under the present press of business in this House and the probable course it will take, it will be utterly impossible to further hear from that committee during the present Congress. That committee has just been called, and a reference of this resolution to it will be equivalent to killing it.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to make this suggestion: the gentleman seems to forget that this is a question of privilege, and therefore in order at any time when the committee is ready to report.

Mr. LOAN. I have forgotten that, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. That, the gentleman will see, makes all the difference in the world.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he entertained the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] as a question of privilege, and being a question of privilege the committee have a right to report at any time when the House is not engaged in the transaction of other business.

Mr. LOAN. I then suggest that after the statement made by members of that committee that it has more business before it than it can well attend to it should not be referred to that committee.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I would like to make the suggestion that that would be a very good reason perhaps for rescinding the action heretofore taken, and referring the whole subject to another committee; but surely it is no reason for allowing the Judiciary Committee to proceed and at the same time duplicate the proceedings by creating another committee to do the same thing. I hope the gentleman from Missouri will allow the motion made by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] that this resolution be referred to the Judiciary Committee, to prevail.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. LOAN.] In his resolution he speaks about securing the fruits of the victory which has been obtained by the Federal Army; I wish to know whether he has reference in that to the Federal offices as being a part of the fruits of the victory? [Laughter.]

Mr. LOAN. No sir, I have not. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRISWOLD.]

Mr. GRISWOLD. I merely wished to inquire whether it would be in order to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. It will be after the gentleman from Missouri surrenders the floor.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield a moment?

Mr. LOAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LE BLOND. If I understand the proposition that is now pending I certainly am in favor of the motion made by the gentleman from Missouri, to refer this whole subject to a select committee that will give it immediate and prompt attention. From what has been said by members of the Judiciary Committee they have already upon their hands an amount of business greater than they are able to dispose of during this session. I am in favor of a select committee for several reasons; one is the fact that certain members have been charging, both here and elsewhere, that the Executive of the United States has been guilty of usurpation of power. Some have even gone so far as to say—at all events one of my colleagues said during the late election campaign that he would neither give sleep to his eyes nor slumber to his eyelids until articles of impeachment were preferred against the President of the United States. Now, sir, we have heard enough of this.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would like to know to whom the gentleman refers?

Mr. LE BLOND. Why, sir, from the public press I understand the gentleman himself so said.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am glad to have an opportunity in this place to correct what the public press has done. The gentleman might with equal propriety say that the public press had announced that I was engaged in drawing up an article of impeachment charging the President with complicity in the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, than which nothing was ever published in the public press of America further from the truth.

Now, sir, in regard to the other statement, I beg leave to say that the public press played off the same trick upon me that a certain man did once in Scotland upon a man who had gone before him, by stealing his thunder and using it for his own benefit. There was no part of the speech attributed to me as recited by the gentleman which was in fact made by me, except the words which are familiar to us all. If the people shall vote down the President and condemn him in the coming elections "I will give neither sleep to my eyes nor slumber to my eyelids until I move the impeachment of the President if he officially declare what he has unofficially proclaimed, that the Thirty-Ninth Congress is an illegal body, assuming to be the Congress hanging on the verge of the Government." These words were uttered in view of the published and unofficial language of the President, that "the body of men who legislate in the Congress of the United States since the opening of the Thirty-Ninth Congress was not the Congress of the United States, but was an assumed Congress hanging upon the verge of the Government." I did say then, and I repeat now, that if the President of the United States should officially and in any formal manner utter what he said unofficially, as reported in the press, of an illegal Congress, &c., such official utterance would be an impeachable offense, and that I would make a motion to impeach him; and I added then that there was no representative of the people would vote against such impeachment after the people's public and swift condemnation of the President's gross betrayal of their interests.

Mr. LE BLOND. My colleague insists upon taking up my time. I referred to this matter not only from what appeared in the public press, but I have here, and will have read at the Clerk's desk, a statement of men who were present and heard the gentleman's speech. If the Clerk will read it I will then make a few additional remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

ST. CLAIRSVILLE, OHIO, December 1, 1866.

This is to certify that Hon. JOHN A. BINGHAM, in a speech made in the court-house in St. Clair-ville, Ohio, in the month of September, 1866, in speaking of the President of the United States, said: "He (the President) was engaged in a conspiracy for the overthrow of the Government, and those that were supporting him were engaged with traitors and had struck hands with treason; and if I am indorsed by a reflection, so help me God, I will neither give sleep to my eyes nor slumber to my eyelids until I have filed articles of impeachment against Andy Johnson."

And he also denounced the President as "Drunk Andy Johnson." We were present and heard this speech.

GEORGE H. UMSTEAD,
ALEXANDER PATTONS.

I recollect the above substantially as stated, which was uttered by the speaker without qualification, and heartily applauded by many of his auditors.

R. E. CHAMBERS,
R. S. CLARK,
O. J. SWANEY,
R. M. CLARK.

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, the men who signed that paper are the officers of that county, and men of the strictest integrity. But after the explanation that my colleague has given here I have nothing further to add in reference to this matter. I presume my colleague remembers the manner in which he made this remark, and I shall not gainsay his statement.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg leave to say now, and I am glad to have this opportunity of making this statement, that according to my recollection these gentlemen have greatly enlarged the accusation charged against me by the gentleman in his opening remarks. I beg leave to make the further statement that as soon as the report of what I said appeared in the St. Clairsville Gazette, which is published in the adjoining county to mine, I took occasion then, as I do now, to denounce its garbled and unfair report of my remarks, so that my contradiction might go throughout the district, and as evidence of that I call as a witness the statement of one of their own organs, published in my own town—the Cadiz Sentinel—which substantially admitted that in my speech made in that place before the election I had corrected and qualified the statement touching impeachment. I have nothing to do with the character of the gentlemen who signed the paper just read. I am not going to cast reproach upon them; but it is very easy for the House and for the country to understand that these gentlemen who have sent their meager report of my speech have reported me in a partisan spirit, and have, as is natural to us all under like circumstances, manifested a memory of facts so very imperfect that it will better subserve mere party ends than the interests of truth or justice.

Mr. LE BLOND. Now, sir, there is another reason why I am in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. LOAN.] I am in favor of it in order that the facts may come before the country. I believe that the Executive has been maligned. I believe that improper attacks have been made upon him for sinister and improper purposes. I am for a committee who will investigate the charges and report upon them. Though the President was not elected by Democratic votes, yet he is our President as much as yours and the President of the United States.

Now, sir, I am glad to see gentlemen moving in the proper direction. Too long have they been permitted to make these attacks upon the Executive in this Hall, upon the stump, and everywhere else, without bringing the facts to bear which would justify these extreme and outrageous charges against the Executive of the United States. I do not claim to be his defender; I stand not here for the purpose of defending him, for he needs none. But while you have elected him he is my President, and the President of every man in the country, and the respect I have for the position he occupies is sufficient to lead me to require that these charges shall be made good, or that the parties making them shall retract them. We have had enough of these charges; we challenge you to the investigation, and if upon a fair and impartial hearing, you find him guilty impeach him and remove him from office. The American people demand it at your hands, and if the Committee on the Judiciary have so much business now before it that they cannot attend to this investigation, the people will not be satisfied with allowing this matter to sleep there after the charges have been made, and after this injury has been done to the Executive of the United States, and after odium has been cast not only upon him but upon the whole American people.

Now, I say to gentlemen that the gold speculators of the country demand the impeachment that they may make money; but the financial interests of the country demand this investigation and a settlement of this question for a better and higher purpose. I care not whether it is a partial or an impartial committee to which it is sent; give us an investigation that the charges may be made specific and met, and all will be well. An impartial committee composed of men who have not, like the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. LOAN,] pronounced a verdict of guilty upon the President will exonerate him from guilt. When a fair hearing shall be had, I will guaranty that no more can be said of Mr. Johnson than could have been said of any other President who has preceded him. He has removed men who did not agree with him in politics, and has undertaken to put in their places others who will assist in carrying out his policy. For this and this alone is this terrible raid made upon him; that is the reason why these gentlemen are so bitter in their denunciations of the Executive of the United States. For the good of the whole country I hope that the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] will prevail. I shall go for the raising of a select committee, believing, as I do, that the threats of impeachment are made and the investigation and report delayed that they may intimidate the Executive. It is held as a threat over his head to retain office and to drive him to the approval of their revolutionary measures. The sinner the issue is made the better, so cease your threatening and bravado, but on to the work.

Mr. LOAN. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not know that any member of the Committee on the Judiciary has made any statement in the House or out of the House which justifies the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] or the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] in saying that the committee are so pressed with business that they cannot give their attention to this subject. I beg leave to say to the gentlemen who have made this statement that the only remark made in the House upon the subject of the business of that committee was made by myself upon a motion made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] some time ago to refer some matter to the committee. I then stated that the committee was pressed with business, and did not desire a reference of the subject then before the House to it. Now, a part of the business in the hands of the committee at that time was the identical subject which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] now proposes to send to a select committee. Since that time the committee have been called probably for the last time during the session for general reports. That of itself has relieved the committee to a very considerable extent in connection with much of the business which has been sent to it.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a single question?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will.

Mr. LE BLOND. Will the gentleman have the kindness to state what progress the committee is making in this investigation?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to state to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] that no persons except the members of the Committee on the Judiciary know anything about the matter; nor do we intend to give any information until the committee shall be prepared to report upon that subject.

Mr. LE BLOND. One other question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Very well.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would ask the gentleman if he expects or believes the committee will be able to report upon the subject during this session of Congress?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will at the proper time answer for the committee in relation to the subject, but not now.

Mr. LE BLOND. The country wants the information now.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I decline to be cathechized upon this subject. I only wish to state that all of the statements which have been made in relation to the conduct of the Committee on the Judiciary, what it has done or what it has not done in connection with the subject of impeachment, are wholly without authority; and so far as they have been brought to my attention they are without any foundation whatever.

Sir, the Committee on the Judiciary does not intend that this subject while in its hands shall be made use of by gold gamblers, as the gentleman from Ohio says, or anybody else for the purpose of speculation; and all the information that is sent over the telegraphic wires and to the newspapers of the country are but the creations of those who send and publish them.

Now, sir, the Committee on the Judiciary have not been disposed to shrink from the performance of any duty imposed upon them by this House, nor will they shrink from the performance of any duty so imposed. They will do their duty, and at the proper time will make their report; and until that time we have nothing upon this subject to submit to this House or to the public.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a question of order. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the House is full of lobbyists—individuals who have obtained admission to the floor I do not know how. I desire to have the rule enforced.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know the reason of their admission. Gentlemen not entitled to remain on the floor of the House by the rules of the House will retire. The Door-keeper must clear the lobby when the point is made that persons not entitled to admission are present upon the floor.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOAN] to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. LOAN. I will do so.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. As I do not intend to vote in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to refer this proposition to a select committee, I deem it proper that, as one member, I should give my reason for my vote; that reason is a very simple one. I think that what the country most needs is order and tranquillity; and this Congress by its action can materially assist in causing calmness to pervade the public mind. It seems to me that the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri is calculated to produce undue excitement. This consideration alone would be sufficient to induce me to vote against it.

But, sir, I conceive the making of that proposition to be a happy sign for the country. It indicates to my mind, as it probably will to others, that the time is near at hand when the present crusade against the President must cease. We cannot but be manifest that when so radical a member as the gentleman who makes this proposition rises in his place and confessedly states to the House that he is dissatisfied with the progress which a regular standing committee is making in reference to this particular question of impeachment it is a good sign for the country. It tells us that the gentleman and those who advocate his proposition feel that they have not any ground to stand upon in connection with the allegations which have been made looking toward the impeachment of the President. For myself I do not wish to drive the majority here into the adoption of any such proposition. I would prefer to deal with them honestly and fairly, and allow them to withdraw from the position which some ardent members, with less discretion than judgment, have forced them to occupy before the country.

It is manifest that the people of this country

do not sustain the members of the majority here in this war against the President. They do not consider that Andrew Johnson has been guilty of any act which warrants such a violent procedure as that which some members urge. And I am glad to see the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] whose intellectual power has recently won for him an election to a higher position, standing here and endeavoring to resist this undue and as I think improper legislation.

Let us leave this question of impeachment at least where the majority of this House has already placed it. When the committee are ready to report, let us receive the report; and in the mean time let gentlemen cease to excite the public mind by harangues in this House; for all proceedings of this sort result in either benefit or injury to some particular speculator; and I am sorry that this class receive so much consideration from this House or some of its individual members. I hope, therefore, that the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri will be voted down.

Mr. WENTWORTH. With the permission of the gentleman from Missouri I desire to say a word on this subject. I certainly have been under the impression that the Committee on the Judiciary is so overburdened with business that it cannot give proper attention to this important subject.

I for one propose to persevere. I am opposed to taking up any subject that we do not go through with. Having commenced it we must either go on with it or back right straight out of it in the most ample manner. When I gave my vote the other day I gave it in earnest. I meant the people of this country to understand there was one man at least who was not afraid to try Andrew Johnson, and who has the magnanimity to acknowledge him to be innocent if he proves to be so.

Mr. Speaker, if the Judiciary Committee is not able to go on with this subject, I for one am in favor of a select committee. This eternal noise we hear about ruining the country, affecting the price of stocks, &c., is familiar to the people of the country. We heard it every day during the administration of General Jackson, and we shall hear it just so long as we are influenced by it, whether Andrew Johnson lives or dies, whether he is impeached or is not impeached.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the resolutions go over till next Monday.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House joint resolution No. 244, to amend existing laws relating to internal revenue, when the Speaker signed the same.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be and are hereby authorized and instructed to examine into the condition of the Treasury of the United States, and particularly to inquire whether any obligations of the United States have been illegally or fraudulently made or issued, and whether the public interests have been and are sufficiently protected in said Department; with power to send for persons and papers, summon and examine witnesses, and administer oaths; and with authority to report thereon at any time.

There was no objection.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to make the inquiry whether this resolution rests upon the report made of some errors in the issuance of bonds of the United States?

Mr. MORRILL. It does.

Mr. KASSON. Then I wish in two or three minutes to make a brief statement. After having heard of this report, I desired for the satisfaction of myself and with reference to some action in this House to obtain some authentic information relating to the unauthoritative and very wild reports which had been abroad; and I deem it to be my duty to state to the House such authentic information as I have obtained this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I learn that a committee designated by the Secretary of the Treasury is now engaged in the examination of a certain Department connected with the printing and issuing of bonds of the United States; that they have been diligently at work for some time with a view to discover supposed or alleged errors, as the case may be; that they are still in that investigation and nearly through; that as far as they have gone they have discovered but two sheets, what are called "wetted down," in excess of the proper number, and so far as that branch of the business is concerned that may be corrected by a deficiency in another Department, the count not yet being completed. They are not printed, and therefore have no value as yet. It is only a question of error in counting the sheets.

Further than that, I learn they have not ascertained in a single case a bond with a duplicate number has gone out of the Department in any mode. They have ascertained in a very limited number of cases an erroneous number has fallen upon a good bond. The machine that impresses the numbers upon the coupons is worked by a man who manages it, the number on the coupon being the same as that upon the bond; and a little disarrangement of the spring has in a few cases caused the printing of the succeeding number on some one of the coupons. This, however, does not inure to the injury of the Treasury of the United States, but only presents duplicate coupons of the same number.

So far as the investigation has gone these are the only errors, and I deem it my duty to make this statement, although the investigation is not yet completed. I have this from an authentic source, and make the statement because the reports which have been made were calculated to alarm the country and depreciate the value of our bonds.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, the action asked for this morning was not intended as the expression of any opinion as to the truth or falsity of the rumors now in circulation as to the printing bureau of the Treasury Department. I am very glad to be informed by the gentleman from Iowa that it is probable the rumors are greatly exaggerated or perhaps wholly unfounded. But it is thought that it would be more satisfactory to the House and to the country to have an examination made by a committee of the House, and that that committee should report whether there is any need of further legislation on the subject, and if so what.

Mr. KASSON. I have no objection to the adoption of the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the motion as agreed to, as this debate has been entertained by unanimous consent.

NEW ORLEANS RIOT.

Mr. ELIOT offered the following preamble and resolutions; which being a call for executive information were considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas on the 12th day of December last the House of Representatives passed the following resolution, to wit:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the House, if not incompatible with the public interest, all correspondence, reports, and information in his possession in relation to the riot which is alleged to have occurred in the city of New Orleans on the 30th day of July last; and whereas on the 13th of December last the House of Representatives passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to this House any information in the War Department in reference to the riot at New Orleans on the 30th of July last, including any telegraphic dispatches sent or received, and all the reports and testimony of military commissions in the possession of the Department;

And whereas on the 21st instant a communication was received by this House from the Secretary of War as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON CITY,
January 19, 1867.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of December 13, 1866, I have the honor to inform you that the information, including telegraphic dispatches sent or received, and all reports and testimony in reference to the riots at New Orleans, on the 30th July last, called for by said resolution, have been sent to the President for transmission to Congress, in compliance with his directions, accompanying a resolution of the House of Representatives of December 12, 1866, referred by him to this Department.

Very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Therefore resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to this House, at as early a day as may be consistent with public interests, the information above referred to by the Secretary of War, and all other information in his possession asked for by the resolution of the House, dated December 12, 1866.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HAMLIN, one of its Clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to bills of the Senate of the following titles:

An act (S. No. 454) for the relief of the widow of Jacob Harmon;

An act (S. No. 455) for the relief of the widow of Henry Try; and

An act (S. No. 476) for the relief of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw deceased.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill entitled an act (S. No. 491) amendatory of the several acts respecting copyrights, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles, without amendment:

An act (H. R. No. 486) for the relief of Catharine Welsh; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 160) for the relief of William D. Nelson.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a bill entitled an act (H. R. No. 605) to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 29, 1789, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

EXAMINATIONS OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. MORRILL. I have some additional business from the Committee of Ways and Means. I send to the Chair a bill for present action. I think there will be no objection to considering it now. It is House bill No. 1029, to provide for examinations of the Treasury Department and other Executive Departments.

The bill, which was read, provides that immediately after the passage of this act, and in the month of December of each year hereafter, the President shall, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint three citizens not holding any office under the Government of the United States, who are eminent for integrity and ability, and who are hereby authorized and directed to make full and thorough examinations of the Treasury Department, and such other Departments as the provisions of this act may require, and present duplicate reports to the President and to Congress in reference to—

First. The receipt and disbursement of public money, including expenditures in the several Executive Departments.

Second. The actual amount of money in the vaults of the Treasury of the United States, specifying whether in coin, United States notes, or national bank notes, and the amount of each, and the several funds to which it belongs, and the amounts in each place where public money is deposited or held.

Third. The amount of money deposited with designated depositories to the credit of the Treasurer, and the mode of managing and securing the same.

Fourth. The amount and description of bonds deposited in the Treasury by national banking associations to secure the redemption of their currency.

Fifth. The manner of paying interest on the bonds of the United States, and the safeguards against the duplication or counterfeiting of coupons.

Sixth. The sale of gold and the purchase and sale of bonds and other securities of the United States, rates of purchase or sale, and the amount of commissions paid, and to whom paid.

Seventh. The engraving, printing, and issuing of national bank notes, United States notes, fractional currency, bonds, and other securities of the United States.

Eighth. The redemption, cancellation, and destruction of national bank notes, United States currency, bonds, and other securities, and the mode of disposing of imperfect sheets of paper intended, but not used, to represent value.

Ninth. The manner of keeping accounts, auditing claims, and issuing warrants for the payment of money from the Treasury.

Tenth. Any suggestions or recommendations affecting the efficiency and security of transactions in the Treasury Department, or economy in the public expenditures.

Section two provides that, for the purpose of the examination authorized and directed in the preceding section, said examiners shall have access to all the vaults, safes, deposits, books, records, letters, and other documents in the Treasury Department, sub-Treasury, or any bureau thereof, and shall have power to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and employ a clerk and stenographer.

Section three provides that said examiners shall each receive ten dollars per day and actual expenses during the time actually employed in making such examination and report; and for the pay of said examiners, their clerk, and stenographer, and for the actual expenses, there is hereby appropriated $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to allowing the gentleman to report the bill at the present time?

Mr. ROSS. I will not object if I can ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks if there is objection.

Mr. ROSS. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Then the bill is before the House.

Mr. ROSS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] if he is willing to incorporate in the bill a provision to remove Mr. Clarke from the Bureau of Printing for the Treasury.

Mr. MORRILL. This is the same bill which was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and I believe it is universally admitted that it is an extremely proper measure; I therefore demand the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RETURN OF FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

Mr. SHELLABARGER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire whether the act of February 12, 1793, regulating the arrest and return of fugitives from justice, requires any amendment so as to prevent oppressive use of such act against persons wrongfully accused of crime, and to report by bill or otherwise.

CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENTS.

Mr. KASSON. I move to suspend the rules, so as to enable me to introduce a bill to enforce a provision of the eighth amendment of the Constitution, and I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read, and is as follows:

Whereas it is declared by the eighth amendment of the Constitution of the United States that no cruel and unusual punishments shall be inflicted within its jurisdiction; and whereas it appears that in certain parts of the United States inferior tribunals are attempting to establish the barbarous practice of punishing offenses against the law with the whip and scourge, applied to the bodies of free citizens of the United States contrary to said provision of the Constitution and against the principles of civilization and the practice of all free Governments, and tending to degrade the privileges and personal liberty and republican citizenship: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That any judge, justice, or other civil officer who shall hereafter adjudge, order, or direct that any person, being a citizen of the United States and brought before him for trial or judgment, or in any way subject to his jurisdiction touching any offense alleged to have been committed by him, shall be punished by lashes or blows, or by any other mode of physical torture; and any executive officer, or other person, who shall execute or attempt to execute any such judgment, order, or direction, shall be held to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for a term of not less than six months nor more than six years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the gentleman will allow this bill to be printed, and made the special order for some early day.

Mr. KASSON. I will leave it open for the consideration of gentlemen who desire to discuss it as soon as it is introduced.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope it will not be allowed to interfere with the regular order of business. The motion was agreed to.

A RECUSANT WITNESS.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a question of privilege. I am instructed by the joint Committee on Retrenchment, in whose behalf I moved for process of contempt against J. F. Tracy, to state that Mr. Tracy has appeared before the committee and has been examined, and has satisfied them that he intended no contempt of the House. I therefore move that further process against Mr. Tracy be dispensed with on his paying the usual fees to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The motion was agreed to.

CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENTS—AGAIN.

The question recurred on Mr. KASSON's motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. KASSON. I have given notice that if the bill is allowed to be introduced I shall then make a subsequent motion that it be made the special order for some future day.

Mr. BALDWIN. Is the motion to suspend the rules in order, that the bill may be put upon its passage?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has intimated that if the bill be introduced he will ask that it be made the special order for some day in the future.

Mr. BALDWIN. I will vote to suspend the rules for the introduction of the bill, but I cannot vote for its introduction if it is to be put upon its passage to-day.

The SPEAKER. It is not proposed to put the bill upon its passage to-day.

Mr. KASSON. I shall not ask that, as some gentlemen here desire that we shall go on with another bill to-day; but I shall ask that it be made the special order for some future day.

Mr. MORRILL. I give notice that I shall object, from this time forward, to any more special orders being made.

The question being upon Mr. KASSON's motion to suspend the rules, it was put; and there were—ayes 46, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Mr. KASSON demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 104, nays 38, not voting 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, DeForest, Delano, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McIndoe, McRuer, Mercier, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bingham, Boyer, Campbell, Cooper, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Hise, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, Jenckes, Le Blond, Leftwich, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, and Winfield—38.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Beaman, Bergen, Blow, Bromwell, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dixon, Dodge, Glossbrenner, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hart, Hawkins, Henderson, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburt, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Latham, William Lawrence, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Morris, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Radford, William H. Randall, Rousseau, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, and Wright—49.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was introduced and read the first and second time.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to yield me the floor for a moment.

Mr. KASSON. I will do so, sir.

On motion of Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, the Committee of Ways and Means was discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Alfred B. Winslow and Ebon M. Tibbatts, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

PUBLICATION OF LAWS.

Mr. WILSON of Iowa. I ask my colleague to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. KASSON. I will do so.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, the Committee on the Judiciary was discharged from the further consideration of the bill of the House No. 1911, providing for the publication of the laws and other judicial notices in the States recently in rebellion; and the same was referred to the Committee on Printing.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. KASSON. I will now yield for a moment to the gentleman from California, [Mr. BIDWELL.]

Mr. BIDWELL. I desire merely to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill of the House No. 1057, to establish a Department of Agriculture, was recommended to the Committee on Agriculture.

The motion was entered.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to this way of doing business; and insist upon the regular order of business.

CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENTS—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the bill introduced, under a suspension of the rules, by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] The question is upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. KASSON. I have expressed my willingness to fix a day when this could be considered as a special order. I ask if there be any objection to that course.

Mr. MORRILL. I feel compelled from a sense of duty to say that I shall from this time forth object to any special orders.

Mr. KASSON. In that case I know of nothing to be done except to leave the matter to the determination of the House.

I desire to say that the Constitution of the United States expressly prohibits the infliction of cruel and unusual punishments. We have the right to enforce all provisions of the Constitution of the United States. The infliction of physical torture in any form upon a citizen of the United States has been for very many years, if not always, without example in the judicial history of this country. I admit that the system of torture as applied to slaves did exist in certain parts of the United States, but I deny that the infliction of physical torture upon those who are endowed with the rights of citizenship is usual. The attempt is now being made to carry over this incident of the condition of slavery and apply it to those who are now in freedom, full citizens of the United States of America, and endowed with the personal rights that belong to any other class of its citizens. I believe it, therefore, to be the duty of the Congress of the United States to take early action to prevent what is now both cruel and unusual from becoming simply cruel and usual. And the sole object of this bill is to assert the national authority, the right to administer the provisions of the Constitution by the enactment of laws like this.

This House has already passed a bill to prevent in certain States one of the practices that existed during the condition of slavery, the selling of free men into a condition of chattel slavery. This is simply a supplemental bill to abolish what is, so far as I know, the only remaining personal incident that belonged to the condition of slavery in several of the States of this Union. It also applies to all the States of the Union. It protects both whites and blacks against that degradation of personal independence, that sentiment which is the very foundation of the ennobling character and dignity of citizenship in the United States. This is all I have to say of the bill and of the necessity of its prompt enactment.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] one question, the answer to which may influence my vote upon this occasion. I desire to know whether the gentleman thinks Congress has the right to prevent the State of Iowa or any other State from so legislating as to inflict corporal punishment for crime, for petty larceny, or anything of that sort. And I ask him also if when the Constitution was framed three fourths of the States did not authorize the infliction of corporal punishment?

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman will recollect, I took the ground in the debate the other day, in which ground I was supported, I believe, by the House, that the Constitution of the United States in all its clauses was to be interpreted by the condition of the country and of the citizens to whom those clauses applied. I hold that whenever the infliction of corporal punishment has become unusual and is admitted to be cruel then this clause of the Constitution applied irrespective of the practice of a former century. Otherwise there could be no progress in civilization or any protection of the rights that result from progressive civilization.

Mr. SPALDING. I think in my own State at this time we send men to the chain-gang. I ask the gentleman if that punishment is cruel?

Mr. KASSON. Of course criminals are confined; of course they are sometimes put in chains for their complete restraint. This bill does not touch the usual modes of punishment; it touches only those modes of punishment that consist in the infliction of personal torture, by judgment of the court, directly upon the body of the individual. This is the intent of the constitutional amendment; otherwise any State in this Union might introduce the practices of the Spanish Inquisition; and any man who acted under that introduction by the law of the State would be protected by the State.

Now, I hold that this Congress, applying the Constitution, has the right to declare what is cruel and unusual punishment; and if the declaration is true the courts must administer the law we pass and prohibit the infliction of such punishments.

Mr. SPALDING. Then, if I understand my friend from Iowa, the Constitution would mean one thing this year, did mean another thing five years ago, and might mean another thing five years from now.

Mr. KASSON. In its application it might have meant one thing in the fourteenth century, if it had existed then, and it may mean another thing in the twentieth century, if it shall then be in existence.

Mr. SPALDING. Yes; that may be.

Mr. KASSON. In other words, if slavery exists in this nation to-day a certain clause applies to it; if slavery ceases to exist to-day that clause will not apply to it.

Mr. SPALDING. That is very true so far as it regulates slavery. He is right there, but this is a different subject. It is the assumption of power on the part of Congress over State Governments without reference to the disloyal States at all.

Mr. KASSON. On the contrary, it is using the power conferred by the Constitution to protect personal rights in this country. I do not think there can be any reasonable doubt of the power of Congress to protect personal rights guaranteed by the Constitution. The Constitution says that the citizens of one State shall have all the privileges and immunities of citizens in any other State, and I think Congress has the right to protect our citizens in the enjoyment of these rights. If there be doubt about that construction I hope it will not come from that portion of this House who believe in the dignity of manhood and the protection of the rights of all our citizens in times like these.

Mr. INGERSOLL. As this bill has not been printed, I desire to know whether it includes the person who inflicts punishment as well as the person who pronounces the sentence.

Mr. KASSON. It does. I follow the precedent of the bill which passed this House two weeks ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Iowa before the question comes up again the propriety of an inquiry in the meanwhile, whether the amendment which his bill recites does not refer entirely to the administration of justice in the Federal courts and under Federal law. I think it has been generally understood by the profession and the courts, if it has not been so formally adjudicated, that these amendments were intended only as a limitation of the powers of Congress.

Mr. KASSON. Not in relation to the personal rights guaranteed by the Constitution. The Constitution guarantees the right of trial by jury in civil cases described, and that has been held to apply to the practice in the Federal courts only. That relates to the form and administration of justice. The clause to which I have referred relates to the rights of persons.

Mr. BINGHAM. In respect to the clause of the Constitution to which the gentleman refers, being the eighth of the amendments of the Constitution of the United States proposed by the First Congress, I beg leave to say he will look in vain for any legislation like this now proposed, either passed or attempted hitherto to be passed, by virtue of that article. The bill to which the gentleman refers, to prohibit the sale of men into slavery, does not rest upon the eighth article of amendment, but on the thirteenth article of amendment; neither does that bill, like this, provide for sentencing State judges to imprisonment for six years in the penitentiary for rendering any judgment in the premises.

One word further as to the gentleman's statement that the provision of the eighth amendment has relation to personal rights. Admit it, sir; but the same is true of many others of the first ten articles of amendment. For example, by the fifth of the amendments it is provided that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. Of this, as also of the other amendments for the protection of personal rights, it has always been decided that they are limitations upon the powers of Congress, but not such limitations upon the States as can be enforced by Congress and the judgments of the United States courts.

On the contrary, the Supreme Court, when presided over by men who never were suspected of mere partisan judgments, whose ability and integrity were acknowledged by all and challenged by none, ruled invariably as I have stated. If these limitations upon your power confer power to legislate over the States, why not enforce them all by penal enactment?

When the gentleman is through I should like to be heard somewhat on this bill. So far as we can constitutionally do anything to prevent the infliction of cruel punishments by State laws I wish to see it done. I trust the day is not distant when by solemn act of the Legislatures of three fourths of the States of the Union now represented in Congress the pending constitutional amendment will become part of the supreme law of the land, by which no State may deny to any person the equal protection of the laws, including all the limitations for personal protection of every article and section of the Constitution, and by which also the Congress will be empowered by law to enforce every one of those limitations so essential to justice and humanity.

Mr. KASSON. I cannot yield further without leading to remonstrance on the part of gentlemen near me touching the delay of other business.

As to the point of the gentleman from Ohio, that the bill to which I referred did not contain the clause I said it did, I will only say he is in error. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] asked me whether this bill contemplated punishment of the officer who inflicted this cruel and unusual punishment. I said it did, and so it does.

Mr. BINGHAM. I stand corrected; but it does not, as this bill does, provide the person who pronounces judgment shall be indicted and punished.

Mr. KASSON. My impression is the bill prohibited the making of the order, which covers the same principle to which the gentleman now alludes.

Mr. WARD, of New York. Has this measure been reported by any committee?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. KASSON. I thought that was understood.

Mr. ROSS. When I have the opportunity I will move to refer this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KASSON. Although this bill has not been reported by a committee, yet it has not been introduced without consultation on the part of members. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that although his bill is based upon the recital of the eighth article of the amendments to the Constitution, those amendments are nowhere made subject to legislation by Congress; and I submit to him whether there is any authority to be derived for his bill any more than there would be for legislation by Congress to carry out any provision of the bill of rights. And I suggest further, that it has been adjudged by varying decisions that these amendments do not confer legislative power upon Congress; that they are mere provisions for the protection of the citizen, to be enforced through the courts. I ask the gentleman, therefore, where he finds in the Constitution or its amendments authority in Congress to legislate on the subjects included in the bill of rights and not specifically given?

Mr. KASSON. I answer that the Constitution itself, after conferring specific powers upon Congress, contains a clause that Congress may not only pass laws to carry those powers into effect, but all other powers conferred by the Constitution on the General Government or any branch of it. I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to ask this question in connection with this bill. It is very common for the enforcement of discipline and to suppress insubordination in penitentiaries and State prisons to inflict corporal punishment in various ways. Now, I wish to know if this bill does not include the infliction of such punishment for the enforcement of prison discipline?

Mr. KASSON. In answer to that I will say that the very case to which the gentleman refers was in my mind in framing this bill, and is excluded by its provisions. It simply covers the infliction of punishment by order of a court before whom the party charged with the offense is tried. It is confined exclusively to that as being the thing sought to be guarded against by the Constitution itself.

Mr. FINCK. I wish to ask whether the article to which the gentleman refers, and all the articles of amendment made prior to the last two or three years, are not amendments restricting and limiting the power of legislation?

Mr. KASSON. All the amendments?

Mr. FINCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. KASSON. I answer no; that several of them are expressly designed for the greater security of the individual rights of the citizen, and I am sure a majority of them are expressly designed to protect individual rights.

Mr. FINCK. And to restrict the power of Congress.

Mr. KASSON. No, sir; I do not accept the gentleman's amendment; they are designed to protect the individual rights of the citizen.

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will perceive the reasons that require this action. I believe it to be the duty of Congress, a duty which it owes to the people, to see that every constitutional right of the citizen shall be protected against outrage and violation. Our powers in that direction are limited exclusively by the prohibitions of the Constitution and not by the positive affirmations of the Constitution. The very object of the Constitution was to secure republican liberty and all the rights that belong to republican citizenship, and the very moment that all the people of all colors in the United States were put on the same level in respect to personal rights from that very moment the legislation of Congress must conform to this condition. The thing of which the loyal portion of this country complain to-day is that while in the insurgent States they pretend to submit to the changed condition of things and accept the determined issues of the contest, they do nevertheless continually thwart and oppose every effort made by the General Government in good faith to carry these issues into practical effect among the people.

Mr. LE BLOND. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Iowa. This bill has been reported this morning. It is not printed. Gentlemen are unable to determine to what extent the bill goes. Now, there is quite a difference of opinion here as to the power of Congress on this subject. I find there is a difference even upon the other side of the House as to whether this provision of the Constitution does not confer merely negative powers upon Congress instead of giving it affirmative power. I am not sure, but I think that the Supreme Court of the United States has upon more than one occasion determined that this provision of the Constitution is a limitation of power, and that under it the General Government does not acquire any affirmative power. If such is the case we certainly should deliberate upon this and should move slowly in the matter. We should hesitate about going to such an extent as to do violence to the rights of the States.

I wish further to add upon this subject that from the reading of the bill at the Clerk's desk I have been unable to catch all its provisions; but it does seem to me that it provides for the punishment of State officers for carrying out the express provisions of the laws of the States under which laws they are acting. Now, if that be true we ought not certainly to proceed in this hasty manner to legislate upon a question of this kind or to pass a bill that will place a State officer in this awkward position, that if he complies with the State law he will be punished under the law of Congress, and if he fails to comply with it he will be punished under the law of his State.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman knows very well that I should be glad to have ample time given for the consideration and discussion of this bill; but he knows also that the business of the House is such that if there be an evil to be corrected it must be done with reasonable promptness.

Let me say in reference to the civil rights bill, to which the gentleman has referred as imposing certain duties that might conflict with State laws, that Congress has decided that we have a certain right in administering the provisions of the Constitution to supersede State laws. The point I make now is that the provisions of these State laws are in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and must be so held by the judges of the State courts.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that every State judge, by the terms of our Constitution, is bound by an oath to support that Constitution, and that there is a further provision that that Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance thereof shall be binding upon the judges in every State, thereby giving him a judgment in deciding whether our laws are in pursuance of the Constitution or not. And yet you say here that if the judge of a State court decides against you he shall be subject to six months' imprisonment in the penitentiary and to a fine.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman suggests an additional reason for Congress taking this power out of the hands of the judges of the State courts, because this clause of the Constitution is binding upon them, and if they do not observe it they ought to be punished.

Mr. BINGHAM. His oath to obey the Constitution is binding upon him to the exclusion of State or congressional enactments.

Mr. KASSON. Exactly; and if he disobey it he ought to be punished.

Mr. BINGHAM. If he disobey the Constitution. But he is entitled to a judgment in regard to our statutes. You impose upon him an oath, and then tell him, "If you do not decide as we wish you to we will send you to the penitentiary."

Mr. KASSON. On the contrary, we tell him that if he does not decide as the Constitution requires, we will so treat him.

Mr. BINGHAM. No. The gentleman's provision is absolute, that if a State judge pronounces judgment contrary to the provisions of this act he shall be punished.

Mr. KASSON. That brings the question right back as to whether the physical torture of a citizen of the United States is within the scope of the Constitution, or is "cruel and unusual punishment." Now, I ask any gentleman to rise in his place and say whether a member of this House who commits an assault or any other criminal act can be brought up and have the lash and the scourge inflicted upon him without a violation of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to add a word just at this point. I am willing that these judges should be punished for doing almost anything for which a man may be punished; but as I read the bill I think there is great difficulty in knowing that for which they are to be punished.

The bill proposes to provide that no judge or other civil officer shall hereafter adjudge that criminals shall be punished by lashes or blows, "or by any other mode of physical torture." Now, for legal purposes, I would like to have some gentleman explain to this House what that means; to fix the metes and bounds which guard those words. Surely putting a man in a strait-jacket is physical torture. I am inclined to think that putting him in a cell is physical torture. I feel sure that if you put a ball and chain upon him, and compel him to go out in public in that condition, although the essence of the punishment is the mortification to which he is subjected, and so intended to be, I am inclined to think that is physical torture. Now, I presume it is very common in all or nearly all the States to take petty offenders, for instance, men incorrigibly prone to getting drunk and exposing themselves in public, and send them to the work-house, where, although they are confined but a short time, a ball and chain is put upon them; not one that weighs very much, not that the ban of the punishment is the physical inconvenience or exhaustion which ensues; but because it makes them a spectacle, because it hangs them up like a dead crow in a corn-field as a warning to other people who are disposed to commit like offenses, that is physical torture. I might go on and multiply instances in which some of the most approved, some of the lightest, some of the most casual punishments inflicted by our courts would be inhibited under very heavy penalty by this bill.

Now, if I may be allowed to make one further remark, I will say, here is a bill which is not printed. If I had understood the force of it when the gentleman asked leave to introduce it I am free to say I should have voted, as I did not vote, for the suspension of the rules. It comes here now to be acted upon in very great haste. It involves principles and details of very great importance. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to allow it to be referred to some committee, with leave, which I presume will be granted, to report at any time upon giving one day's notice; and in the mean time the bill can be printed.

Mr. KASSON. I have no objection to that if the order can be made. I will only say, as it is proper I should say in answer to what the gentleman has said, I know of no statute in any State which authorizes the judge of any criminal court to sentence a man to any particular mode of physical torture. If there be any such I confess my entire ignorance of it.

Mr. LYNCH. I wish to ask the gentleman if executing a person is not inflicting physical torture?

Mr. KASSON. No, sir; as everybody understands, that is not physical torture in the sense employed in this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. They do such things so quickly now that there is no physical torture about it.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] to a remark which he has just made. He says that he knows of no court authorized by law to sentence a man to endure physical torture or suffering by way of punishment. I would like to ask the gentleman what he would regard sentencing a man to solitary confinement upon bread and water? That I believe is done in the States of Wisconsin and Ohio and perhaps in other States. Is not that physical torture?

Mr. KASSON. I have no doubt that not only in the State of Wisconsin but elsewhere that punishment might very well be meted out for some political offenses. The gentleman understands as well as I do that that is not the meaning given by any dictionary or law to the term "physical torture"; nor is it the sense in which it is used in this bill, or in which any court could construe it to have been used in this bill.

I wish to add that a man who does not understand the dignity of manhood, the rights of citizenship, cannot understand the objects sought to be accomplished by this bill. I give my friend the credit of understanding it if he chooses to understand it, provided he could take the terms of this bill out of the considerations which usually attach to the question of slavery. My object here is to protect those fundamental rights of republican manhood in our color as well as any other color against the degradation which every man on this floor feels is connected with personal stripes and laceration of the body. Hence the language of the preamble recites "with whips and scourges;" and I ask any gentleman to point me to any country in the world, governed popularly in its legislative branch, that imposes to-day physical chastisement, physical torture, as the punishment of crime. There is no answer. No gentleman can point to such a country.

Mr. CONKLING. What is "physical torture?" If the gentleman will tell us that, we may be able to answer.

Mr. KASSON. The bill itself recites "lashes and blows" in one part, and in another part it speaks of—

Mr. CONKLING. "Any other mode of physical torture."

Mr. KASSON. Well, sir, if the gentleman should ask me what is the meaning of a "blow" I might be embarrassed to answer him. If he asks me what "physical torture" means, he certainly understands that it applies to that species of punishment applied directly to the body, and not the usual modes of punishment by confinement and restraint of motion, &c., those punishments which are known to all civilized countries.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman whether in his view to confine a person in prison and starve him to death is not "physical torture?"

Mr. KASSON. Undoubtedly; but no personal restraint to which the law sentences a criminal is so, according to the meaning given to the term by any judicial decision or any historical writer or any legislative precedent. I think there is no question about that.

Mr. FINCK. I wish to ask the gentleman whether his bill is comprehensive enough to embrace the whipping of a pupil at school by the teacher?

Mr. KASSON. If my friend had listened to the reading of the bill he would know that it is confined exclusively to the orders of a judge, justice, or civil officer.

Mr. FINCK. I want to ask my friend one further question: if we have power to pass this bill, have we not the power to prohibit punishment by whipping or scourging in the schools of the States?

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, it is my habit in debate to confine myself to the question before the House. This bill has reference simply to the action of the courts administering criminal justice, which are restrained by the clause of the Constitution itself from inflicting "cruel and unusual punishment."

Mr. FINCK. It involves the same principle.

Mr. KASSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House any longer. As I have already said, I will agree to the proposition which has been made, that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with leave to report at any time; and that the bill be printed.

The question being taken on the motion that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and be printed, it was agreed to.

The question being taken on the motion to suspend the rules to allow the committee to report back the bill at any time, there were—ayes eighty-five; noes not counted.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and leave was granted.

TAXATION OF NATIONAL BANKS.

Mr. ROLLINS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be hereby instructed to report to this House at as early a day as practicable the amount of taxes annually paid by national banking associations to the United States; also, so far as he may be able to ascertain the same, the amount paid to the several States in which such associations may be located.

The SPEAKER. This being a call for executive information, unanimous consent is necessary for its consideration on this day.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BRANDEGEE asked and obtained leave of absence for himself for one week.

Mr. LATHAM asked and obtained leave of absence for himself for ten days.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

An act (H. R. No. 486) for the relief of Catherine Welsh; and a Joint resolution (H. R. No. 160) for the relief of William D. Nelson.

MAIL CONTRACTORS IN TENNESSEE.

Mr. STOKES, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas there were a number of Union men who were employed as mail contractors in the State of Tennessee before the 8th June, 1861, when the ordinance of separation from the Federal Government was pretended to be adopted; and whereas said contractors fulfilled all their engagements and complied with the law up to the time of the State pretending to sever her relations with the Federal Government, and have not yet received their just compensation for their services: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to report to this House the amount necessary to be appropriated to pay said contractors for said services, with the names of said contractors annexed thereto.

Mr. STOKES moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OATHS OF ATTORNEYS, ETC.

Mr. CONKLING. The other morning when the vote was taken finally on the bill in reference to oaths of attorneys in the Supreme Court, &c., there were a number of gentlemen who did not record their votes. They may be properly designated as the members who had the nerve to sit here all night, but the misfortune not to be here when the vote was taken. I move that they have leave to record their votes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How many votes were cast against the bill?

The SPEAKER. Forty-two.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It has been stated in the papers to be twelve.

The SPEAKER. That is a mistake.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. The following members then recorded their votes in the affirmative: MESSRS. SPALDING, CONKLING, MORRIS, PLANTS, ECKLEY, and UPSON.

GRIEVANCES OF TEXAS.

Mr. BOUTWELL, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial on behalf of the citizens of western Texas, setting forth the grievances of the loyal Union men of that State; the oppressions by the government established by President Johnson and by the disloyal majority under his government, encouragement, and protection; and praying that the loyal Union men of western Texas may be protected by law, and allowed to erect a State government west of the Brazos river; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Reconstruction.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order after the expiration of the morning hour is the consideration of House bill No. 543, to restore to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, upon which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JULIAN] is entitled to the floor. The pending question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM], to refer the bill and pending amendments to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. JULIAN made some remarks, which will be found in the Appendix. On concluding he yielded the residue of his hour to Mr. SCOFIELD.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I sought to obtain the floor on Saturday last to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS.] He claimed that inasmuch as the Republican party had voted for the Crittenden resolution in the early part of the war, inasmuch as they had consented to the retention of members of Congress from those States during the time for which they had been elected, inasmuch as they enacted a law apportioning the members of Congress among the several States, including those States to which he referred, they were now estopped from denying that the confederate States were States in this Union.

A gentleman who had witnessed the great fire in Pittsburg some years ago, by which a large portion of that city was destroyed, was entertaining me some time afterward with a little incident of the calamity illustrating the conduct of men under peculiar circumstances. He said he noticed a builder as the flames were flying rapidly from block to block coolly standing upon the pavement and watching their progress. As they passed into a block in which my friend was largely interested, the builder approached him and said: "Will you rebuild this year?" "No, sir," said my friend, "I hope to save my block with a little repair." But the flames raged on and in a little while they were bursting from the roof. The builder approached him again and said, "Will you use the walls in rebuilding?" "Certainly," said my friend, "I intend to use the walls if I can possibly save them." But soon the walls began to fall one by one and those that did not fall by the flames were demolished by the firemen. The builder once more approached my friend and said, "Will you rebuild on the old foundations?" And the man gave an affirmative answer. But when the conflagration had spent its force and the owner of the property came to remove the rubbish he discovered that the foundations were much injured, and as they were originally built partly on sand or loose soil he determined to remove them and rebuild on the solid rock with hard granite foundations.

Now, sir, if when he was preparing this work the builder had again come to him and reproached him with duplicity because he had said at one time he expected to save the building, at another that he intended to save the wall, and at a subsequent time that he would save the foundation, he would have stood exactly in the position where my friend from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] stood in his speech last Saturday. The parallel would be a little more perfect if the builder had also, in the midst of the fire, told the firemen that they had better suspend their efforts as the city could not be saved; and then when by redoubled efforts after a little time the flames were subdued he had reproached them with treating the misguided conflagration with unnecessary cruelty.

Mr. Speaker, we had hoped to save these States. It is not our fault that the fires of the rebellion raged so fiercely and so long. Indeed it was not our fault that the fires were lighted at all. If anybody is at fault it is the gentlemen who at that time represented the party to which my friend from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] belongs in this and the other House in the winter of 1860-61.

If the members of Congress of that party had appealed to their southern brethren who were leaving these Halls to embark in a rebellion, if they had risen in their seats and said to them, "Gentlemen, you have been our political allies; we have served you well; we added Texas to this country in order to enlarge your power; we took upon ourselves a war with Mexico as a consequence; we have done all we could to get Cuba for you at the risk of a war with Spain; for your sake we repealed the Missouri compromise and gave you an opportunity to extend your peculiar institutions over the unlimited soil of the West; for your sake we passed a law by which the whole North became a slave-hunting-ground, and freemen turned out at your bidding to capture your escaped bondmen and return them to you free of cost; but we will go no further; we will never consent that two republics shall be carved out of the territory lying between the Atlantic and the Mississippi, the Gulf of Mexico and the northern lakes with only the blades of the surveyor upon the trees to mark the line between them; if you go now mark, we will join with the abolitionists and free-soilers of the North, and we will fight this out on the field of battle;" if you had said that they would have remained. But instead of that you said to them, that the election of Lincoln was an insult to their pride, an assault upon their institutions; that they had, if not a perfect justification in seceding, great provocation therefor. You said to them that while you did not advise them to secede you would see that if they settle that question for themselves and determined it in favor of secession there should be no coercion on the part of the North. So on the 4th of March, when Mr. Lincoln came to take the oath of office, and the Republican party for the first time became responsible for the use of power, we found the Republic divided; seven large States had withdrawn and formed a separate republic, and seven more were preparing to follow, four of which finally succeeded and joined the rebel confederacy, the other three being retained by virtue of military power.

Now, sir, we all propose to reunite this whole territory. There is only this difference in the manner of doing it: you propose to take the old foundation and the old walls and to have new State governments built upon those foundations. We propose to remove the old sandy foundations and build upon the solid rock. That is the only difference. You propose to annex the United States to the confederacy and thus bring us together. We propose to annex the confederacy to the United States. It has been said that Governor Seymour was asked if he had any objection to the confederate constitution then just formed at Montgomery, and he replied, "It is better than the Federal Constitution; why should we not adopt it at once?" That is a sort of reconstruction which the gentlemen opposed to us are now pressing upon us.

But my friend from Illinois [Mr. ROSS] further claimed the sanction of Mr. Lincoln's great name for the policy which his party are pursuing. If this policy of yours is Mr. Lincoln's, more shame to you that, while you were pursuing it, you spoke so unkindly of him, for you denounced him sometimes as a tyrant and usurper, and sometimes as a buffoon and a fool. The gentleman and his friends were upon his track and were barking at his heels from the hour when he was first nominated for the Presidency at Chicago until his tragic death; and now they propose, not to sustain his work, but to tear down the landmarks of freedom set up by him. Look at the States which Mr. Lincoln reconstructed! Here are Tennessee and Louisiana and Arkansas in the hands of Union men—every one of them; but the policy of reconstruction which succeeded his has thrown the Union men out of power and given the power to the rebels.

The States of Maryland, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri, although not confederate States, were more or less reconstructed under Mr. Lincoln's influence, and in every one of those States rebels have been disfranchised and the government of the State has been placed in the hands of loyal men. And now gentlemen who profess to be following in his footsteps, by perfidy or by weakness, are turning these States back to the rebels. Kentucky has already by law reënf franchised the confederates in that State, and they are trying to adopt the same policy in Missouri and in West Virginia.

But the gentleman, after endeavoring to fortify his position by Republican precedent and by claiming for it the sanction of Mr. Lincoln's great name, informed us that there was no danger to be apprehended; that the confederate population is so very small in these States that they can have no prospective influence when brought back into the Federal Union. How is this? I understand that the policy advocated by him is that in these southern States no confederate shall be disfranchised and no colored man allowed to vote, and that there shall be no constitutional restriction upon the action of the confederates when once restored to power.

Now, what power will you have under that system? Under the census of 1860 there were eight millions of white population in the fifteen slave States, all told; two thirds of that population, I suppose, were interested in the confederacy, and the other third were interested in the Federal Government. Now, if they come back without any restriction of any kind, how many of those States will those who were attached to the confederacy control? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that they will control them all, having two thirds of the white population and having the power, this population being distributed throughout these States, to vote down the Union men two to one. I know, sir, that the confederate population is not so distributed, but it is nearly enough so for the vim, the vigor, the activity, and the bitterness of these men to control these States. At all events, whoever warns us that there is no danger ought to concede all these uncertainties in our favor. With a population of only eight million whites they would have thirty-two Representatives in the Senate, and five more would give them a majority. They would have ninety-seven members of this House, and thirty more would give them a majority here. They would have one hundred and twenty-nine votes in the Electoral College, and seventy-five votes more would give them a majority there also; so that with five or six millions of population to start with they will come back into the Federal Government with almost a majority in all its branches.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania has now expired, and his colleague [Mr. STEVENS] is entitled to the floor, under the understanding of the House, for one hour, in which to close debate upon the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say that I wish to call the previous question before four o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. ELIOT. Before that is done I hope I may be allowed an opportunity to offer some slight amendments to the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] yield to me for fifteen or twenty minutes?

Mr. STEVENS. Very well, I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. CULLOM.]

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. Speaker, the great question of reconstruction still excites the public mind; it will continue to do so until the late rebellious States are all organized by proper authority into States republican in form. This Government for some time past and still presents an anomalous condition of things; about eleven millions of her people are not represented in the national councils. It may be seriously doubted whether such a state of things can very long exist without great danger to the Republic. At the close of the last session of Congress I hoped and believed that by the time we should assemble here again such a disposition would be manifested by the people of the South as would give the loyal people of the country confidence that the Union which they so nobly struggled to maintain would soon be restored in all its parts. The people, as has been said by other members on this floor, desire peace; they are longing to see the day when peace, harmony, and prosperity shall resume their sway all over the land. But, sir, as in the early days of the rebellion, when they hoped and believed that the rebellion would soon cease, so now they and we are disappointed.

To-day, so far as we can see in the acts and developments of those rebellious people, the signs of returning peace and harmony are no more hopeful than at the adjournment of our last session.

During the last session of this Congress we sent to the country a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States. That amendment embodied principles fit to be made a part of the great Constitution, and essential to the protection of human rights and the perpetuity of the nation. This House and the country know well the wisdom of that amendment. The Legislatures of the loyal States, as they assemble in their respective capitals, ratify it one by one, and declare that they desire it shall become a part of the great charter of American liberty.

While the States whose sons stood by the flag in the late struggle for national existence are giving their consent to the amendment in accordance with the forms of the Constitution, the people of the late rebel States, by their pretended Legislatures, are treating it with scorn and contempt.

They repudiate the action of Congress, and refuse to favor any scheme or proposition not made in the interest of treason. That devotion to the flag which cost this nation so much blood and treasure must be insulted by the representatives of the people who made the sacrifice, or the South will not be satisfied and yield a just obedience to the law. Mr. Speaker, I shall never insult the men in my district and the nation who struggled to save this country for the purpose of reconciling men who labored to destroy the nation, even though such refusal results in the failure to reconstruct this country during the present generation. It is time, sir, that the people of the South were informed in language not to be misunderstood that the people who saved this country are going to reconstruct it in their own way, subject to the Constitution, the opposition of rebels to the contrary notwithstanding.

The constitutional amendment will be ratified by three fourths of the States in their practical relations to the Government. It will thus in my judgment become a part of the Constitution. By it the status of all persons born or naturalized on American soil will be defined and protection guaranteed. Representation will be readjusted; the men who have sworn to support the Constitution of the United States and rebelled against it will be deprived of the right to hold Federal or State office; the Federal debt will be held inviolate; the rebel debt will be prohibited; and whether that amendment be spit upon or ratified by the late rebellious people, it will be enforced in all its parts requiring submission—in Illinois and Mississippi, Massachusetts and South Carolina alike.

And, sir, if that submission is not given to the Constitution and laws of the country voluntarily, it should be compelled by the power of the bayonet.

But, Mr. Speaker, after nearly two years have elapsed since the close of the rebellion in its organized form, we find ourselves, as before indicated, with this large southern population, inhabiting the ten unreconstructed States, without representation, and, as at present situated, with no apparent disposition to place themselves in harmony with the loyal people of the country. What shall be done? Where lies the difficulty? Who is at fault? Shall we, as the people's representatives, stand still and fold our arms and wait for that great innovator, time, to work out the problem, or shall we go forward? Shall we shut our eyes to the abuse and murders of loyal men in the South and the continued destruction of their property by wicked men and give them no means of protection when we may? These are questions which we ought all to answer and act as become men capable of discharging the great duties resting upon us. If the statutes of the country are now sufficient to protect the loyal people of these disorganized States of the South from rebel outrage and are not enforced, it is our duty to remove the obstacle wherever it may be. If men, either by the choice of the people or under the forms of the Constitution, are placed in positions of trust and honor and fail to discharge their duties, the remedy is plain and well defined and should be applied. If more law is necessary let us enact it.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment it is the duty of this Congress to proceed at once and organize the late rebellious States into States republican in form; but we are told that the governments which took the place of the old State governments of the ten seceded States, as they existed before the war, are republican in form; and when a delegation from Arkansas wait upon the Executive to consult as to the condition of things there, and inquire what they should do to reconstruct that State, we are told that our wise and astute Attorney General pertly tells those gentlemen that the State of Arkansas is already reconstructed, and needs no reconstruction.

Republican in form!—governments formed by the Chief Executive without authority of law and upheld by the military power when deemed proper, and set aside at the suggestion of post commanders of military districts—these State governments, conceived in ignorance, brought forth in confusion, and rocked in the cradle of treason, are to be palmed upon the country as legitimate, and taken into the sisterhood of States as republican in form, with all the rights belonging to great States of the Union.

Sir, Presidents and Attorney Generals may prate about the rights of the States and declare that those organizations are States with all the rights belonging to States whose relations to the Government have never been interrupted. They may prepare vetoes filled with the same stuff and send them to this Capitol to be vetoed by the representatives of the people; yet, sir, the great mass of the people understand that the Executive of the nation has no power to create a State, and that the creation of a State by such hands should be set aside, and States republican in form created by the Department of the Government authorized by the Constitution so to do.

It is the duty, sir, of the law-making power of the Government to see to it that those State governments are republican in form; it is the duty of to-day and we must perform it.

In the first periods of the late war the Government was careful to do nothing to annoy or exasperate the rebels. The brave soldier went to the field with his saber and musket to fight, but with them he carried the orders of his ranking officer protecting to the people in rebellion their property, including slaves. Intent upon the destruction of the Government, the nation's kid-glove policy was turned to the temporary advantage of the enemy, and in the progress of time and events we learned that war, destructive, bloody war for liberty, was the war essential to save the nation and claim the respect of the world. Such a war was conducted under the changed policy of the Government, the soldiers of the Union triumphed, and the rebellion ended.

When we began to consider the great subject of the reconstruction of the rebellious States at the last session of Congress we counseled moderation and great liberality toward the people over whom the nation had triumphed in arms. A brave people always desire to escape the charge of want of generosity to a beaten foe. And then it was hoped that such a course would tend to encourage a spirit of loyalty to the Government and harmony among the people of the different sections. If any class of men had a right to complain of our action that portion of the people of the South who had all through the war been true to the flag had the right to complain. While they had given their strong arms and blood to save the nation, which had been the house of bondage to them, in the work of reorganizing they were passed by and given no voice.

They had the right by all that is just and righteous to demand that in the recreation of the States in which they lived they should have the right to be heard.

But, sir, so far as the amendment is concerned, we closed our eyes and passed them by, as in the beginning of the war, intent more upon conciliation than doing full and ample justice to the friends of the Government.

As the refusal of the rebels to lay down their arms early in the war resulted in the overthrow of slavery and the freedom of four million slaves loyal to the Government, so will the rejection of the amendment by the people of the South speedily eventuate in the enfranchisement of all those black men who but a few years ago were declared by the Supreme Court as having no rights which the white man was bound to respect.

It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that the men who have been struggling so hard to destroy this country were and still are the instruments, however wicked, by which we are driven to give the black man justice, whether we will or no.

By the unholy persistence of rebels slavery was at last overthrown. Their contempt of the constitutional amendment now before the country will place in the hands of every colored man of the South the ballot.

Sir, in the creation of States republican in form in the late rebellious States all loyal American citizens born or naturalized on American soil will be allowed to participate. But we are told by the President and by his admirers upon this floor that we are disunionists, because we say that these pretended State governments are not entitled to representation in Congress, and that before their people can be heard here their State governments must be modeled by proper hands and as the Constitution requires them to be.

We are denounced in wholesale terms because we believe that those States should rest a little from the weariness of their struggle to destroy the country before they assume the weighty responsibility of legislating for it. We are characterized as disunionists hanging upon the verge of the Government, as traitors at the other end of the line, by that man upon whom the people of the country have set the seal of condemnation, because we have not been disposed to come here fresh from the people and like hungry curs do the biding of a man clothed in a little brief authority, not by the people's votes, but by the Constitution and as the result of the misfortunes of the country. Because we do not hasten to admit to representation the people who have buried in patriots' graves three hundred thousand heroes who fell in defense of the flag, and hung the nation in the somber garb of mourning and piled upon the heads of the people the crushing burdens of taxes, we are denounced by that man who became Vice President drunk, President upon the dead body of the great martyr for the cause of liberty, and whose swing around the circle was only equalled in its claims to contempt by his previous and continued betrayal of his party and the cause of the Union, the prior support of which had secured him the support of the people for Vice President of the United States.

But, sir, I care nothing for the man or his conduct, except so far as they reflect credit or disgrace upon the nation and have their influence for good or evil.

The President and his policy have both alike been condemned, and to-day there are thousands of the men who bared their breasts to the bullets of the foe who are waiting impatiently upon this Congress to remove that man whom they believe to be, above all others, the greatest obstacle in the way of a proper settlement of our national difficulties.

He stands there as the Executive disregarding the voice of the people who saved the country, and that, too, when a majority in the loyal States of about four hundred thousand had declared against his policy. He played his hand and lost the game, and by all the ordinary rules governing the actions of men he should acquiesce in the result.

He does not do so, and as he opposes the ratification of the constitutional amendment, vetoes bills sent to him by Congress, and presses "my policy," the loyal people, black and white, are driven out of the southern States, their property burned and otherwise destroyed, and in many instances the people are murdered by guerrillas and wicked men, and Congress is powerless so long as the laws are not enforced by loyal men.

The ten States must be reconstructed, the loyal men without regard to race or color must control, and if the rebels do not submit voluntarily they must be taught submission by the strong arm of power.

Sir, a few months of proper vigor in the administration of this Government in the right way will settle this whole question, and as it should be.

The people of the South are like other people in some characteristics at least; and when this Government adopts some definite policy and goes forward in its execution, the rebels and all the people of the rebellious States will acquiesce. Their conduct to-day is the legitimate offspring of the treachery of Andrew Johnson to the cause of the Union, in my judgment. The riots and violence of the people of the South in great part are chargeable to Andrew Johnson and his blind zeal for his policy. I do not charge him as desiring and craving the results of his policy, as they developed in the long catalogue of crimes which have been committed by rebels upon Union men in the South; but, sir, before God and the country, I believe that if the President had listened to the voice of the millions of loyal men who sustained the country in its most fiery ordeal, and whose confidence he enjoyed up to the 4th of March, 1865, and had cooperated as the Executive of the nation with that great body of people in the adoption of such measures as they deemed wise, that to-day the southern people would be represented upon this floor and peace and prosperity would prevail all over the land.

But, Mr. Speaker, from what motive we know not, he has taken a different course, and it is for us to do what seems best with all the lights and difficulties before us.

Whatever may be the particular shape of the bill finally agreed upon for the reconstruction of the southern States, I trust that one feature may be incorporated in it, namely, a provision giving thorough protection to loyal men; and, sir, when I say loyal men I mean all loyal men of all grades, shades, and colors; and, sir, in my judgment, there is no means of protecting loyal black men for years to come, in the South except by giving them the ballot. I do not think it would be wise statesmanship to disfranchise all the men who took up arms or otherwise rebelled against the Government. I think, sir, that the leaders of the rebellion should be cut off from participation either in elections or the right to hold office; but there are too many of those who engaged in the rebellion who did it because they were carried along by the force of popular excitement, and not from a disposition to destroy the Union. To disfranchise them all, I think, sir, would not be wise. Render ineligible to Federal office by the ratification of the constitutional amendment the great mass of the leaders of the rebellion; cut them off from participating in the affairs of the country in anywise, State or national; enfranchise the loyal black men; protect the weak in their support of the country; place the State organizations in the hands of loyal men, and, sir, the time will soon come when these people will establish peace and good order among themselves.

I shall not, Mr. Speaker, undertake to indicate the minutiae of a bill such as we should pass, but, sir, I think this Congress is fully capable to develop the whole subject and perfect such a bill as will be in accord with the Constitution, with our past action upon this subject, and as will secure protection to all the people, and at the same time, when enforced, organize State governments in those ten late rebellious States republican in form, and enable the people of those States to come here and claim the right of representation in the national Legislature.

Mr. Speaker, there are many good men on this side of the House who entertain fears lest by the passage of a bill to organize these late rebellious States into States republican in form that we shall by so doing adopt the territorial idea so obnoxious to many of our friends.

Sir, I do not favor the theory of dissolving these States into Territories myself, but, sir, they now have no legal governments; they are without representation; they placed themselves in the position they occupy by their own perverse and wicked and causeless rebellion; they destroyed the old State governments under which they were entitled to representation; they set up governments in the interests of their rebellion; by the valor of the soldiers of the Union, with Grant and Sherman and Thomas and Sheridan at their head, these organizations were swept away and the people were left without civil governments; and now, sir, it is our duty to organize them—get them in harmony with the Constitution of the United States. To protect the individual rights of the people, to produce harmony and good order and prosperity among them; and, sir, to accomplish these great results I shall labor, and shall not stop long to quibble as to the precise manner in which those objects are attained.

The blood of murdered Union men all over the South calls upon us to act. Union soldiers now in the jails of the South, awaiting trial by rebel courts and juries on charges of murder of citizens of the rebellious States while the soldiers were in line of battle defending the Government and the flag, call upon us to act. The millions of brave men who went at their country's call to give their lives as willing sacrifices upon the altar for their country and liberty, three hundred thousand of whom now sleep in patriots' graves, call upon us to act wisely and quickly upon this great important subject.

Sir, the two hundred and sixty thousand gallant sons of the Prairie State shall not have it to say that they went to the field to save the nation and the Union men of the South from death at the hands of traitors, and after they had done that in war that I, as one of the Representatives of that glorious State, shirked my duty in the Halls of the national Legislature, and those Union men after the war are left to be hunted down by the men with whom they had been contending during the progress of the war.

Then, sir, in conclusion, let us take hold of this bill, and if it is in anywise imperfect let us perfect it, having due consideration for the Constitution of the country, the rights of the people, the future peace and prosperity of the whole land. And let us go forward trusting that, as the instruments of that great Ruler of all men and nations, we may yet place this Government upon the solid foundations of justice, where men may live in peace and prosperity together.

Mr. STEVENS. Before I call the previous question I desire to make some further modifications of my substitute. I modify section three of the substitute as printed by striking out the following:

If by any means no election should be held in any of said late States on the day herein fixed, then the election shall be held on the third Monday of May, 1867, in the manner herein prescribed.

In section six as printed I insert the word "voluntarily" before the words "swore allegiance to said Government."

Mr. ELIOT. I would suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania to modify the fourth section as printed, by striking out the words:

And no person shall be deprived of the right to vote, or be otherwise disfranchised, by reason of conviction and punishment for any crime other than for insurrection or treason or misprision of treason.

I do not think we want to admit to vote those who have been disfranchised by reason of crimes heretofore committed; such as murder, robbery, &c.

Mr. STEVENS. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] doubtless did not hear the explanation I gave on a former occasion for the necessity of the provision to which he refers. Throughout all the South they are whipping negroes under pretended convictions for crime, so as to render them, under their laws, disqualified from ever voting. It is to meet such cases as those that this provision was inserted.

Mr. ELIOT. I am in favor of the object the gentleman has in view; still I think it liable to the objection I have indicated; still I will not press the amendment I suggested.

Mr. STEVENS. I also further modify my substitute by striking out the seventh section as printed, as it has been somewhat objected to. That section is as follows:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That no constitution shall be presented to or acted on by Congress which denies to any citizen any right, privileges, or immunities which are granted to any other citizen in the State. All laws shall be impartial, without regard to language, race, or former condition. If the provisions of this section should ever be altered, repealed, expunged, or in any way abrogated this act shall become void and said State lose its right to be represented in Congress.

Mr. ELIOT. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania concludes, I would suggest to him to further modify the third section of his substitute as printed, by inserting after the words "The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall appoint a commission for each of said States, to consist of three persons" the words "who shall have been at all times during the rebellion loyal to the Government of the United States." And also in the same section, after the words "the officers shall consist of one judge and two inspectors of elections, and two clerks" to insert the words "all of whom shall have been at all times during the rebellion loyal to the Government of the United States."

Mr. STEVENS. That is very proper, and I modify the substitute accordingly.

I now desire to request the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] to withdraw his motion to recommit, until after we have attempted to amend this bill in the House under the five-minute rule. After that shall have been done, if it shall be found that we cannot perfect it in such a manner as will satisfy the House, then the gentleman can be understood as having the right to renew his motion to recommit, and we can vote upon the question of reference then.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire the House to decide, and I desire the opportunity to decide for myself, whether we shall recede from the principles of the pending constitutional amendment to the extent to which this bill does as it now stands. I do not, therefore, withdraw my motion to recommit, for the grounds upon which I made it at first still stand untouched.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is one which, it seems to me, looks toward the perfecting of this very important measure. If, acting under the five-minute rule, we amend this bill as well as we may be able, then, unless we succeed better than perhaps may reasonably be expected in advance, it will be wise to submit the bill to a committee for scrutiny, that it may be so perfected in form and phrase as to express the judgment of the House as it may be ascertained from the debate and from the amendments that may be adopted.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] appears to suppose that our action on this bill is likely to affect in some way the constitutional amendment proposed by Congress at the last session. I do not anticipate that, whatever may be our disposition of this bill, we shall commit ourselves for or against the constitutional amendment. That amendment has been submitted to the country, and I presume that those who took part in submitting it are in favor of its ratification. But I, for one, expect to do something more.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to address an inquiry to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] We are differing here upon a point in reference to which the country at large cannot understand the ground of our difference. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is on the part of the House the head of the joint Committee on Reconstruction, and he has a very able body of associates, embracing, I may say, the picked men of this Congress. That committee, comprising, if I may be permitted to use a partisan phrase, men ranked and recognized as "radical," enjoys, as I understand, the confidence of this House. Now, why it is that members on the radical side of the House should come to loggerheads on a question of the reference of a bill to that committee I want to understand. I am disposed to vote for the reference of this bill to that committee because I have confidence in the committee.

Mr. STEVENS. I will only say I know very well that the reference of the bill to that committee is the death of the measure. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] I suppose does not know it.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know it, and the country does not know it. That is just what I want to have explained.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I wish to make a single remark before the vote is taken on the motion to refer. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is willing to acquiesce in certain amendments which a large proportion of the members on this side of the House desire to incorporate in his bill. He is willing that the House shall be permitted to perfect the bill. There is one very important amendment which I propose to offer, the substance of which I will now state: it is to strike out the sixth section and substitute for it a provision that those persons who have been engaged in the rebellion shall not be permitted to hold office or to vote for certain officers named until they shall have been readmitted to the rights of citizenship, which they have forfeited.

I do hope that my colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] will yield to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and permit this bill to be perfected so far as possible in the House before he presses his motion to refer; thus we can fairly dispose of the matter when we have ascertained the shape the bill may take under the action of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would very gladly yield this point for the purpose of accommodating my colleague; but I wish to remind him that if this bill be recommitment any amendment which he may offer to it will, under the rule of the House, go directly to the committee without debate; and I shall be very glad to have the opportunity to consider in the committee any suggestion which my colleague may make.

I desire to make one further remark. I do not concur in the declaration of the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the recommitment of the bill to the committee is equivalent to its death.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman will recollect that I did not ask his concurrence. In all this contest about reconstruction I do not propose either to take his counsel, recognize his authority, or believe a word he says.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order.

Mr. PIKE. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a point of order. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania is called to order by the Chair he should take his seat.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] be kind enough to inform the Chair on what rule he bases his point of order?

Mr. CHANLER. The general ruling of the Chair, who has generally called on gentlemen on this side to take their seats when they have been called to order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not done so when called to order by the Chair for irrelevancy or for personal remarks. The gentleman's recollection is at fault. The rule states that when a member has been ruled out of order, "he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House." When objection is made the question is put to the House whether the member shall be permitted to proceed in order. That is the rule.

Mr. CHANLER. I respectfully submit to the Chair that the remarks used by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] for which he was called to order by the Chair, were not heard on this side of the House. My object is simply to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had been called to order by the Chair. I expected the words used would be reported for the benefit of the House, so we might know whether he should be allowed to proceed or not. That was my object. I do not propose to correct the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has repeatedly stated that when he calls a gentleman to order his power is exhausted. It then remains with any member of the House to object to his proceeding. No gentleman has objected, and it is now too late.

Mr. CHANLER. I rose as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman rose to inform the Chair of his duties, in reference to which the Chair differs from the gentleman.

Mr. CHANLER. The Chair is mistaken. I rose to ascertain the language made use of by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to learn what the disorderly words were. I ask now what the disorderly words were?

The SPEAKER. It is too late.

Mr. PIKE. If I understand the position of the bill now before the House, it is on the motion to recommit to the Committee on Reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. That is the pending motion.

Mr. PIKE. I hope that will not prevail, for if it prevails it will keep off all motions to amend. If it does not prevail, I have an amendment which is of some consequence to the bill, and I will state what it is. It is to amend the first section, instead of applying this to the ten States lately in rebellion, to apply it simply to the State of North Carolina. If that amendment prevails then I shall move to modify the other sections so as to make them consistent. I hope the motion to recommit will not prevail.

Mr. BINGHAM. The committee can report back at any time.

Mr. PIKE. We understand if this is recommitment to the Reconstruction Committee it is dead.

Mr. BINGHAM. I protest against that understanding.

Mr. PIKE. The question is whether any life shall remain in the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. It ought not to have occupied this much time, for I hardly expected the gentleman from Ohio to agree to my proposition. If I call the previous question will it exhaust itself on that motion?

The SPEAKER. It will not, but will continue in force until the third reading of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. After that vote is taken can I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered?

The SPEAKER. The rule states that the previous question cannot be reconsidered when partially executed. There are two ways in which the gentleman can reach his object, by taking the vote on the motion to recommit without the previous question, or by moving to suspend the rules so that the previous question shall be confined to that motion to refer.

Mr. CHANLER. I rise to a point of order. On page 130 of Barclay's Digest it stands written:

"If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate; if there be no appeal, the decision of the Chair shall be submitted to."

Mr. BOUTWELL. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has only read half of the rule, and the Chair will read the other half:

"If the decision be in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed; if otherwise, he shall not be permitted to proceed, in case any member object, without leave of the House; and if the case require it he shall be liable to the censure of the House."

The construction of the rule has uniformly been that the member called to order must suspend his remarks, taking his seat until the point is decided. If the decision be adverse he is not allowed to proceed, if objection be made, without consent of the House. But the converse of this is also true, that if no member objects to his proceeding, he is not required to suspend his remarks.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent that the previous question shall only apply to the motion to recommit.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill and substitute were reported.

Mr. NIBLACK. Has this bill been considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. If made in time the objection would be a good one, but it now comes too late.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I desire to submit an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I accept it as a substitute for my sixth section.

Mr. HILL. I rise to a point of order, that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] necessarily goes to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled on that question several times. This bill was reported from the Committee on Reconstruction on the 30th of April last; and having once been before that committee by the order of the House, it does not necessarily require, under the rules, to be referred to that committee again, but it can again be sent to it, with any amendments, by a vote of a majority of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the second section is retained.

Mr. STEVENS. That was stricken out immediately after the objection made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINE] the other day.

The amendment of Mr. SHELLABARGER, accepted by Mr. STEVENS, was reported as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of section six of the substitute as originally reported, as follows: That all persons who on the 4th day of March, 1861, were of full age, and who at any time held office, either civil or military, under the government called the "confederate States of America," or who voluntarily swore allegiance to said government, are hereby declared to have forfeited their citizenship and to have renounced allegiance to the United States, and shall not be entitled to exercise the elective franchise or hold office until five years after they shall have filed their intention or desire to be reinvested with the right of citizenship, and shall swear allegiance to the United States and renounce allegiance to all other governments or pretended governments; that said application to be filed and oath taken in the same courts that by law are authorized to naturalize foreigners: Provided, however, That on taking the following oath, the party being otherwise qualified shall be allowed to vote and hold office:

"I, A. B. do solemnly swear, on the Holy Evangelists of Almighty God, that on the 4th day of March, 1861, and at all times thereafter, I would willingly have complied with the requirements of the proclamation of the President of the United States, issued on the 8th day of December, 1863, had a safe opportunity of so doing been allowed me; that on the said 4th of March, 1861, and at all times thereafter, I was opposed to the continuance of the rebellion and to the establishment of the so-called confederate government thereto, but earnestly desired the success of the Union and the suppression of all armed resistance to the Government of the United States; and that I will henceforth faithfully support the Constitution of the United States, and the Union of the States thereunder."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

That every person, being at the time a citizen of the United States, who has voluntarily engaged in any insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or the authority or laws thereof, or who has voluntarily given any encouragement, aid, or comfort to such insurrection or rebellion, is hereby declared to have surrendered and forfeited the rights, privileges, and immunities which appertain to such citizenship, in so far as such Government may choose to affirm and accept such forfeiture; and such forfeiture is hereby declared in so far that all such persons are hereby declared to be, and are deprived, except as hereinafter provided, of the right to hold any office which, under the Constitution of the United States, cannot be assumed without first taking an oath to support such Constitution; and also of the right to be appointed an elector for President or Vice President of the United States; and also of the right to vote at any election in any State, District, or Territory of the United States, for either of the officers or electors aforesaid; or for any member of any convention which may be convened for forming, altering, or amending a constitution for any State, District, or Territory of the United States; or for any territorial or provisional officer of any such State, District, or Territory.

Sec. — That any person named in the preceding section of this act who never gave aid, encouragement, or means in support of such rebellion in any other manner whatever than by being engaged as a soldier in the armies thereof, and that only in open and civilized warfare, in a position below the rank of second lieutenant, may be discharged from the forfeitures hereinbefore declared by the order of any court of record of the United States, upon establishing to the satisfaction of such court, by the evidence of persons who have always borne true allegiance to the United States, such facts as shall satisfy the tribunal having the matter to decide that such person is one entitled to the benefit of and coming within the provisions of this section, and is one who can truly take the oath prescribed by this section; and such person, before being so discharged, shall moreover take, and upon the records of the courts subscribe, the following oath, namely:

"I, A. B. do solemnly swear (or affirm) that upon and at all times after the 4th day of March, A. D. 1861, I voluntarily gave no aid or encouragement to the late rebellion against the United States, but earnestly desired the success of the Union and the overthrow of all armed resistance to the Government thereof, and that, during all that time, I would have complied with the requirements of the proclamation of the President of the United States of the 8th of December, A. D. 1863, could I have done so without imminent danger; and more, that I will hereafter faithfully support the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States."

Sec. — That all persons coming within the forfeitures declared by the first section of this act, except those named in the second and fourth sections thereof, may be discharged from the disabilities declared by this act by an order of any court of record of the United States at any time after five years from the making, by such person, and upon the records of such court subscribing, an oath or affirmation to the effect that such person intends to apply for readmission to all the rights and privileges of American citizenship, and that he will at all times support and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States thereunder. And, at the time of such readmission, such person shall prove, in the manner prescribed in the second section of this act, that ever since the 19th day of April, A. D. 1865, he has behaved as a man attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States and to the perpetual union of the States thereunder, and that he is one entitled to the benefits of the provisions of this section. And such person shall moreover take, and upon such records subscribe, an oath or affirmation declaring that to be true which by this section is required to be proved, and that he will thereafter faithfully support the Constitution of the United States and the perpetual union of the States thereunder.

Sec. — That the following persons shall not be entitled to the benefits of the provisions of the second or the third sections of this act, namely:

1. Persons who, either as United States or State officers, civil or military, have at any time taken an oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States, and who afterward voluntarily engaged in or in any way gave aid or encouragement to the rebellion against the United States.
  2. Persons who were educated at the Military or Naval Academy of the United States, and who afterward aided the rebellion as aforesaid.
  3. Persons who were either executive or legislative officers or members of the so-called "confederate States of America," or who were foreign ministers, ambassadors, or agents thereof.
  4. Persons who, during and in aid of the late rebellion, engaged in any guerrilla, predatory, or secret warfare or other services hostile to the United States, and which is prohibited by the usages of civilized warfare; or who were guilty of, or in whole or part responsible for, any cruelties practiced against the prisoners of war of the United States which are prohibited by such usages of war.
  5. Persons who were the authors, publishers, or editors of any book, pamphlet, periodical, or newspaper which advocated and encouraged the waging of the late war of rebellion against the United States.
- Sec. — That whenever any person's right to hold office or to vote under the provisions of this act shall be challenged or called in question, and it shall be made to appear to the officers of election or others having the matter to decide, either by the oath of the person challenged or by other evidence, that the person challenged in fact did any act the voluntary doing of which works the forfeitures declared by this act, then, in all such cases, such act shall, prima facie, be deemed to have been done voluntarily; and it shall devolve upon the person challenged to prove, to the satisfaction of the tribunal having the matter to decide, and by the evidence of persons who have always borne true allegiance to the United States, such facts as shall satisfy such tribunal that such acts of disloyalty were involuntary.

Sec. — That this act shall not be held to affect or modify the provisions of the first section of the act of July 2, A. D. 1862, prescribing an oath of office to be taken by all officers of the United States.

Mr. STEVENS. I call the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Several gentlemen suggest that we ought to have the bill printed; therefore I move that the House adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

The motion to adjourn was disagreed to.

The question was taken on referring the bill, as modified, to the joint Committee on Reconstruction; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 88, noes 65, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Buckland, Bundy, Campbell, Chanler, Conkling, Cooper, Darling, Davies, Dawson, Deffrees, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dodge, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hawkins, Hill, Hise, Hogan, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Leftwich, Marshall, Marvin, McKee, McRuer, Moorhead, Moulton, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Patterson, Plants, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Schenck, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—88.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Boutwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Culom, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Keontz, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, Mercier, Morrill, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Price, Rollins, Sawyer, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, Stokes, Francis Thomas, John L. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Aswell, Benjamin, Bergen, Blow, Brundage, Brewster, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Davis, Dixon, Dumont, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Henderson, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Hunter, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kerr, Latham, William Lawrence, Maynard, McCullough, McIndoe, Miller, Morris, Phelps, Radford, Rousseau, Stillwell, Thayer, Elihu B. Washburne, and Williams—38.

So the bill was referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the joint Committee on Retrenchment to ask leave to make a report. I will state that if the leave is granted I will report a bill and then yield for a motion to adjourn, in order that it may come up in the morning. The bill I desire to report is House bill No. 889.

Mr. FINCK. I object.

Mr. JENCKES. I move a suspension of the rules to enable me to report the bill.

REPORT ON PUBLIC WORKS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with the act of June 23, 1866, transmitting a report of the Chief Engineer respecting certain public works; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

An act (S. No. 16) for the relief of Josiah O. Armes;

An act (S. No. 253) to incorporate the First Congregational Society of Washington;

An act (S. No. 380) to incorporate the Washington County Horse Railroad Company, in the District of Columbia;

An act (S. No. 410) for the relief of Solomon P. Smith;

An act (S. No. 446) for the relief of George W. Fish;

An act (S. No. 454) for the relief of Matilda Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon;

An act (S. No. 455) for the relief of Barbara Frye, widow of Henry Frye;

An act (S. No. 476) for the relief of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob W. Hinshaw, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw, deceased; and

An act (S. No. 511) for the relief of Mrs. Mary E. Finney, widow of First Lieutenant Solon H. Finney, late of the sixth regiment Michigan cavalry.

Mr. FINCK. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 52, noes 24.

So the motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. BIDWELL: The remonstrance of Colonel J. D. Stevenson, of California, against the abolition of the position of sutler in the Army.

By Mr. BROOMALL: The petition of citizens of Delaware county, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to abolish the five per cent. tax on manufactured goods, to relieve the same from other oppressive burdens, and to increase the duties on certain imports.

Also, the petition of citizens of the United States residing in the late State of Georgia, praying for the impeachment of the President of the United States.

By Mr. BUCKLAND: The petition of Nathaniel Bolly, and 4 others, soldiers of the war of 1812, asking for pensions.

Also, a petition from citizens of Ottawa county, Ohio, for an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor of Port Clinton.

Also, a petition from Mrs. Merinda Stage, for relief.

Also, a petition from Mrs. Mary A. Cross, for relief.

By Mr. BUNDY: The memorial of A. P. Story, G. L. Armstrong, and 33 others, tanners and manufacturers of leather in the county of Ross, and State of Ohio, asking the reduction of the Federal tax on leather from five to two per cent.

By Mr. ELLIOT: The memorial of J. J. Saville, of Louisiana, agent for locating homesteads, &c., concerning an amendment of the act of June 21, 1866.

By Mr. HAYES: The petition of Bernard Quinn, Isaiah C. Colby, and others, soldiers of the Union Army, residing in Cincinnati, Ohio, who have lost their certificates of honorable discharge, for such legislation as will enable them to obtain the bounty to which they are entitled.

By Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts: The petition of Edward Atkinson, for the admission of foreign coal free of duty.

Also, the petition of John H. Reed, and others, manufacturers of iron, for the admission of bituminous coal free of duty.

Also, the petition of the Boston Gas Light Company, for the same.

By Mr. LAFLIN: The remonstrance of R. M. Eselynn, and others, of Jefferson county, New York, against the passage of the act authorizing the issuing of certificates of registry to Canadian-built vessels.

By Mr. McKEE: The petition of Lieutenant John Hawkins, of Prestonsburg, Kentucky, for payment as second lieutenant thirty-ninth Kentucky mounted infantry.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition and memorial of Mrs. Gloriana Fort, of Philadelphia, asking an appropriation of the sum of $2,903 07, with interest, the amount awarded to her father, John Malloway, by the United States district court of New York on June 26, 1793, as damages for loss of cargo of the brig Catharine, captured by the French frigate L'Ambuscade.

By Mr. PAINE: A petition of the fire insurance companies of the city of Milwaukee, for relief from the tax imposed by the seventy-seventh section of the internal revenue law.

By Mr. PRICE: A petition of 41 citizens of Iowa, asking that the acting President of the United States may be impeached.

By Mr. SAWYER: The petition of A. Taylor, and others, residents of Wisconsin and Michigan, praying for an appropriation of $40,000 for the purpose of improving the mouth of the Menomonee river, in the State of Wisconsin.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of Clement Hurtt, a soldier of the war of 1812, praying for the passage of a special act of legislation allowing him an invalid pension.

By Mr. STOKES: Two petitions of citizens of Rhea county, Tennessee, against further curtailment of currency.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts: The petition of Rodney Wallace, and others, citizens of Fitchburg, Massachusetts, asking for a reduction of the tax on gas to companies supplying small quantities.

By Mr. WELKER: The petition of T. G. Loomis, and 49 others, citizens of Harrisville township, Medina county, Ohio, asking that the tariff bill passed by the House at the last session of Congress may be enacted into a law.

By Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania: The petition of citizens of Osceola, Tioga county, Pennsylvania, praying for an increased tariff on wool.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 29, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

RAILROADS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommitteed the bill (S. No. 461) to aid in the construction of the San Francisco Central Pacific railroad, reported it with an amendment.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 16) for the relief of Josiah O. Armes;

A bill (S. No. 253) to incorporate "The First Congregational Society of Washington";

A bill (S. No. 380) to incorporate the Washington County Horse Railroad Company in the District of Columbia;

A bill (S. No. 410) for the relief of Solomon P. Smith;

A bill (S. No. 446) for the relief of George W. Fish;

A bill (S. No. 454) for the relief of Matilda Harmon, of the county of Greene, and State of Tennessee, widow of Jacob Harmon;

A bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of Barbara Frye, widow of Henry Frye;

A bill (S. No. 476) for the relief of William A. Hinshaw and Jacob M. Hinshaw, minor children of Jacob M. Hinshaw, deceased; and

A bill (S. No. 511) for the relief of Mrs. Mary E. Finney, widow of First Lieutenant Solon H. Finney, late of the sixth regiment Michigan cavalry.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 21st instant, a copy of the correspondence between the Department of State and Mr. Motley, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Vienna, relating to his reported resignation; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO—VETO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will also lay before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States.

The Secretary read the message, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I return to the Senate, in which House it originated, a bill entitled "An act to admit the State of Colorado into the Union," to which I cannot consistently with my sense of duty give my approval. With the exception of an additional section, containing new provisions, it is substantially the same as the bill of a similar title passed by Congress during the last session, submitted to the President for his approval, returned with the objections contained in a message bearing date the 15th of May last, and yet awaiting the reconsideration of the Senate.

A second bill, having in view the same purpose, has now passed both Houses of Congress, and been presented for my signature. Having again carefully considered the subject, I have been unable to perceive any reason for changing the opinions which have already been communicated to Congress. I find, on the contrary, that there are many objections to the proposed legislation of which I was not at that time aware, and that while several of those which I then assigned have in the interval gained in strength, yet others have been created by the altered character of the measures now submitted.

The constitution under which this State government is proposed to be formed very properly contains a provision that all laws in force at the time of its adoption and the admission of the State into the Union shall continue as if the constitution had not been adopted. Among those laws is one absolutely prohibiting negroes and mulattoes from voting. At the recent session of the territorial Legislature a bill for the repeal of this law, introduced into the council, was almost unanimously rejected; and the very time when Congress was engaged in enacting the bill now under consideration the Legislature passed an act excluding negroes and mulattoes from the right to sit as jurors. This bill was vetoed by the Governor of the Territory, who held that by the laws of the United States negroes and mulattoes are citizens and subject to the duties as well as entitled to the rights of citizenship. The bill, however, was passed, the objections of the Governor to the contrary notwithstanding, and is now a law of the Territory. Yet in the bill now before me, by which it is proposed to admit the Territory as a State, it is provided that "there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or any other rights to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed." The incongruity thus exhibited between the legislation of Congress and that of the Territory, taken in connection with the protest against the admission of the State hereinafter referred to, would seem clearly to indicate the impolicy and injustice of the proposed enactment.

It might, indeed, be a subject of grave inquiry, and doubtless will result in such inquiry if this bill becomes a law, whether it does not attempt to exercise a power not conferred upon Congress by the Federal Constitution. That instrument simply declares that Congress may admit new States into the Union. It nowhere says that Congress may make new States for the purpose of admitting them into the Union, or for any other purpose; and yet this bill is as clear an attempt to make the institutions as any in which the people themselves could engage.

In view of this action of Congress, the House of Representatives of the Territory have earnestly protested against being forced into the Union without first having the question submitted to the people. Nothing could be more reasonable than the position which they thus assume; and it certainly cannot be the purpose of Congress to force upon a community against their will a government which they do not believe themselves capable of sustaining.

The following is a copy of the protest alluded to, as officially transmitted to me:

Whereas it is announced in the public prints that it is the intention of Congress to admit Colorado as a State into the Union: Therefore,

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Territory, That, representing, as we do, the last and only legal expression of public opinion on this question, we earnestly protest against the passage of the law admitting the State without first having the question submitted to a vote of the people, for the reasons: first, that we have a right to a voice in the selection of the character of our government; second, that we have not a sufficient population to support the expenses of a State government. For these reasons we trust that Congress will not force upon us a government against our will.

Upon information which I considered reliable I assumed in my message of the 15th of May last that the population of Colorado was not more than thirty thousand, and expressed the opinion that this number was entirely too small either to assume the responsibility or to enjoy the privileges of a State.

It appears that previous to that time the Legislature, with a view to ascertain the exact condition of the Territory, had passed a law authorizing a census of the population to be taken. The law made it the duty of the assessors in the several counties to take the census in connection with the annual assessments, and, in order to secure a correct enumeration of the population, allowed them a liberal compensation for the service by paying them for every name returned, and added to their previous oath of office an oath to perform this duty with fidelity.

From the accompanying official report it appears that returns have been received from fifteen of the eighteen counties into which the State is divided, and that their population amounts in the aggregate to twenty-four thousand nine hundred and nine. The three remaining counties are estimated to contain three thousand, making a total population of twenty-seven thousand nine hundred and nine.

This census was taken in the summer season, when it is claimed that the population is much larger than at any other period, as in the autumn miners in large numbers leave their work and return to the East with the results of their summer enterprise.

The population, it will be observed, is but slightly in excess of one fifth of the number required as the basis of representation for a single congressional district in any of the States, the number being one hundred and twenty-seven thousand.

I am unable to perceive any good reason for such great disparity in the right of representation, giving, as it would, to the people of Colorado not only this vast advantage in the House of Representatives, but an equality in the Senate, where the other States are represented by millions. With perhaps a single exception, no such inequality as this has ever before been attempted. I know that it is claimed that the population of the different States at the time of their admission has varied at different periods; but it has not varied much more than the population of each decade, and the corresponding basis of representation for the different periods.

The obvious intent of the Constitution was that no State should be admitted with a less population than the ratio for a Representative at the time of application. The limitation in the second section of the first article of the Constitution, declaring that "each State shall have at least one Representative," was manifestly designed to protect the States which originally composed the Union from being deprived, in the event of a waning population, of a voice in the popular branch of Congress, and was never intended as a warrant to force a new State into the Union with a representative population far below that which might at the time be required of sister members of the Confederacy. This bill, in view of the prohibition of the same section, which declares that "the number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand," is at least a violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution.

It is respectfully submitted that however Congress, under the pressure of circumstances, may have admitted two or three States with less than a representative population at the time, there has been no instance in which an application for admission has ever been entertained when the population, as officially ascertained, was below thirty thousand.

Were there any doubt of this being the true construction of the Constitution, it would be dispelled by the early and long-continued practice of the Federal Government. For nearly sixty years after the adoption of the Constitution no State was admitted with a population believed at the time to be less than the current ratio for a Representative; and the first instance in which there appears to have been a departure from the principle was in 1845, in the case of Florida. Obviously the result of sectional strife, we would do well to regard it as a warning of evil rather than as an example for imitation; and I think candid men of all parties will agree that the inspiring cause of the violation of this wholesome principle of restraint is to be found in a vain attempt to balance these antagonisms which refused to be reconciled except through the bloody arbitrament of arms. The plain facts of our history will attest that the great and leading States admitted since 1845, namely, Iowa, Wisconsin, California, Minnesota, and Kansas—including Texas, which was admitted that year—have all come with an ample population for one Representative, and some of them with nearly or quite enough for two.

To demonstrate the correctness of my views on this question, I subjoin a table containing a list of the States admitted since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, with the date of admission, the ratio of representation, and the representative population when admitted, deduced from the United States census tables, the calculation being made for the period of the decade corresponding with the date of admission.

Colorado, which it is now proposed to admit as a State, contains, as has already been stated, a population less than twenty-eight thousand, while the present ratio of representation is one hundred and twenty-seven thousand.

There can be no reason that I can perceive for the admission of Colorado that would not apply with equal force to nearly every other Territory now organized; and I submit whether, if this bill become a law, it will be possible to resist the logical conclusion that such Territories as Dakota, Montana, and Idaho must be received as States whenever they present themselves, without regard to the number of inhabitants they may respectively contain. Eight or ten new Senators and four or five new members of the House of Representatives would thus be admitted to represent a population scarcely exceeding that which in any other portion of the nation is entitled to but a single member of the House of Representatives, while the average for two Senators in the Union as now constituted, is at least one million people. It would surely be unjust to all other sections of the Union to enter upon a policy with regard to the admission of new States which might result in conferring such a disproportionate share of influence in the national Legislature upon communities which, in pursuance of the wise policy of our fathers, should for some years to come be retained under the fostering care and protection of the national Government. If it is deemed just and expedient now to depart from the settled policy of the nation during all its history, and to admit all the Territories to the rights and privileges of States, irrespective of their population or fitness for such government, it is submitted whether it would not be well to devise such measures as will bring the subject before the country for consideration and decision. This would seem to be evidently wise, because, as has already been stated, if it is right to admit Colorado now there is no reason for the exclusion of the other Territories.

It is no answer to these suggestions that an enabling act was passed authorizing the people of Colorado to take action on this subject. It is well known that that act was passed in consequence of representations that the population reached, according to some statements, as high as eighty thousand, and to none less than fifty thousand, and was growing with a rapidity which, by the time the admission could be consummated, would secure a population of over a hundred thousand. These representations prove to have been wholly fallacious; and in addition the people of the Territory, by a deliberate vote, decided that they would not assume the responsibilities of a State government.

est sanction or warrant of law. The proceeding upon which the present application is based was in the utter absence of all law in relation to it, and there is no evidence that the votes on the question of the formation of a State government bear any relation whatever to the sentiment of the Territory. The protest of the House of Representatives, previously quoted, is conclusive evidence to the contrary.

But if none of these reasons existed against this proposed enactment, the bill itself, besides being inconsistent in its provisions in conferring power upon a person unknown to the laws and who may never have a legal existence, is so framed as to render its execution almost impossible. It is indeed a question whether it is not in itself a nullity. To say the least, it is exceedingly doubtful propriety to confer the power proposed in this bill upon the "Governor-elect;" for as, by its own terms, the constitution is not to take effect until after the admission of the State, he in the mean time has no more authority than any other private citizen. But even supposing him to be clothed with sufficient authority to convene the Legislature, what constitutes the "State Legislature" to which is to be referred the submission of the conditions imposed by Congress? Is it a new body to be elected and convened by proclamation of the "Governor-elect," or is it that body which met more than a year ago under the provisions of the State constitution?

By reference to the second section of the schedule, and to the eighteenth section of the fourth article of the State constitution, it will be seen that the term of the members of the House of Representatives and that of one half of the members of the Senate expired on the first Monday of the present month. It is clear that if there were no intrinsic objections to the bill itself in relation to purposes to be accomplished, this objection would be fatal; as it is apparent that the provisions of the third section of the bill to admit Colorado have reference to a period and a state of facts entirely different from the present and affairs as they now exist, and if carried into effect must necessarily lead to confusion.

Even if it were settled that the old and not a new body were to act, it would be found impracticable to execute the law, because a considerable number of the members, as I am informed, have ceased to be residents of the Territory, and in the sixty days within which the Legislature is to be convened after the passage of the act, there would not be sufficient time to fill the vacancies by new elections, were there any authority under which they could be held.

It may not be improper to add that if these proceedings were all regular, and the result to be obtained were desirable, simple justice to the people of the Territory would require a longer period than sixty days within which to obtain action on the conditions proposed by the third section of the bill. There are, as is well known, large portions of the Territory with which there is and can be no general communication, there being several counties which, from November to May, can only be reached by persons traveling on foot; while with other regions of the Territory, occupied by a large portion of the population, there is very little more freedom of access. Thus, if this bill should become a law, it would be impracticable to obtain any expression of public sentiment in reference to its provisions, with a view to enlighten the Legislature, if the old body were called together; and, of course, equally impracticable to procure the election of a new body. This defect might have been remedied by an extension of the time and a submission of the question to the people, with a fair opportunity to enable them to express their sentiments.

The admission of a new State has generally been regarded as an epoch in our history, marking the onward progress of the nation; but after the most careful and anxious inquiry on the subject I cannot perceive that the proposed proceeding is in conformity with the policy which, from the origin of the Government, has uniformly prevailed in the admission of new States. I therefore return the bill to the Senate without my signature.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

* In 1850.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Accompanying the message are certain documents from the Territory of Colorado. What order will the Senate take on the message and accompanying documents?

Mr. WADE. Let us have a vote on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill returned by the President is now before the Senate to be reconsidered, and the question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. JOHNSON. Senators were not advised that a vote was to be taken during the morning hour, I suppose, and a great many are not here. I suggest, therefore, to my friend from Ohio whether he had not better postpone action on the bill until one o'clock to-morrow and let us have the message printed. There will be no debate, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. GRIMES. What is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall this bill pass, notwithstanding the objections of the President of the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the subject be postponed until to-morrow morning.

Mr. WADE. I hope that will not be done. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON. The message has not yet been printed by the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. There are certainly some new facts and views set forth in this message that deserve the serious consideration of the Senate, and that ought to be duly deliberated and passed upon by it. This is certainly a communication of very great importance, not only to the present, but to the future; and it seems to me that it is due to the occasion and to every aspect of the subject that this veto message should be printed and should be made the special order for to-morrow, so as to admit of a reasonable amount of debate. I suppose there is not a gentleman who would sustain the veto message of the President that desires needlessly to protract the debate or to postpone vexatiously the decision of the Senate upon the question, finally, whether Colorado shall be admitted as a State into the Union. Certainly I have no such purpose, and I believe no gentleman in the Senate has.

But, sir, the gravity of the occasion, the importance of the principles involved both in regard to the power of Congress and the right of the people of a Territory to determine the question whether they will have a State government or not, and other matters connected with that general question, in my mind render it peculiarly proper that the motion of the Senator from Maryland should prevail. I think, therefore, the gentlemen who have this matter in charge should allow it to go over until to-morrow, and to be the special order of the day, and thus that Senators shall have an understanding as to when debate shall terminate and the vote be taken. I would advise, so far as I am concerned, that the question should be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. WADE. I certainly should not attempt in this manner to urge this matter to a vote now if it was a new question; but we have passed this bill through the Senate, I believe, three times, and it has been debated for a long period. Certainly at this session no question has occupied so much of the attention of the Senate as the question of the admission of Nebraska and Colorado. I believe there has been more debate upon the question whether these Territories should be admitted into the Union as States than there ever was before upon such a subject from the foundation of the Government until now. We are told it is an exceedingly grave question, now for the first time. After we have been admitting States almost yearly from the foundation of the Government, all at once it becomes an exceedingly grave and difficult question to determine whether a Territory shall be admitted into the Union as a State or not!

I shall not argue the question now; I believe every Senator on this floor has made up his mind and is as ready now to give his vote as he ever will be; and as the session is drawing to a close and the great business which must necessarily be done is hardly commenced, I want, if possible, to get rid of this eternal debate that does not seem to enlighten anybody after a certain period. You may debate the same subject during this session and the next, and gentlemen accustomed to debate will have no difficulty in finding topics to talk about, but we have no time to indulge in that kind of amusement now or from this time to the end of the session. We must cut our debates short somewhat, or else give up legislation altogether. I trust we may get a vote on this matter. I shall not detain the Senate now.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope the motion will prevail, and that the question will go over until to-morrow. Sir, the President of the United States has been attacked in this body in a manner which I think unwarranted in senatorial debate. I was his personal friend when he was a member of this body; my relation with him is that of personal friendship and not of political connection. I wish the subject to go over until to-morrow that I may have an opportunity to reply to the unwarranted attacks made upon the President of the United States, and if it goes over until to-morrow I shall take occasion to review some of the charges which have been made against the President of usurpation and of using vulgarity of language, and to bring before the Senate some exhibits of the debates in this body, for I have heard with my own ears vulgarity here under the disguise of the French language. I have heard gentlemen rise upon the floor of this Senate and charge the President with being guilty of vulgarity when they themselves in debate clothed vulgar language in French phrase. I have heard upon the floor of this Senate vulgarity in comparison with which the President of the United States has never said anything, and I have heard those same men arraign the President as being guilty of vulgarity and in the very charge which they made couching their language in words disgusting to ears polite.

I hope the motion to postpone will prevail. While I now disavow the advocacy of the President as a political friend, I avow myself as his personal friend ready at all times to vindicate him against the vulgar assaults that have been made upon him on this floor.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio, who has this bill in charge, why in the third section there is a difference of phraseology between the Colorado and the Nebraska bills. The third section of this bill provides that it—

Shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Colorado there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or any other rights to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed, and upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature elected under said State constitution by a solemn public act shall declare the assent of the said State to the said fundamental condition.

This is submitted to the Legislature elected under the constitution. Now, in submitting it to the Legislature in Nebraska different language is used. Just what that difference is I am not prepared to state, not having the Nebraska bill before me; but there is a difference. I want to know why the difference is made in the two cases, if the Senator can inform the Senate. The fact is communicated to the Senate by the veto message that one branch of the Legislature of Colorado has expressed views which would be hostile to this proceeding. I want to know if the vote upon this question is taken away from that Legislature because it is supposed that Legislature is hostile to this particular measure; and I think the Senator when the subject was up before should have called the attention of the Senate to the difference in the two bills. I know that when we voted I supposed the third section of each bill was in precisely the same language. Afterward it was found there was a difference. Now, I ask the Senator from Ohio, who has the bill in charge, to explain the difference and to give the Senate to understand why there is a difference in the two bills in these sections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow?

Mr. WADE. The yeas and nays are demanded on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As the Senator from Ohio declines to make any explanation we have a right to assume that there was some purpose in this matter, that there should be a difference in the same provision in regard to similar bills. We have a right to assume that if this were submitted to the Legislature of Colorado in the same terms in which it is submitted to the Legislature in Nebraska it would probably be rejected. Then we have before Congress the spectacle of one bill submitted to one Legislature to secure a particular result and a similar bill under exactly the same circumstances submitted to another and a different Legislature in the other Territory, for the purpose, I assume in the absence of an explanation, of securing a result which could not be secured if the submission was in the same language as in the other bill. I do not think, that being properly understood, the Senate of the United States would be a party to a business of this sort. If it is right to submit it in Nebraska to the territorial Legislature, then in Colorado the same submission should take place. If in Nebraska that Legislature represents the popular will in such a manner as to bind the people, the submission ought to be to the same Legislature in Colorado.

Mr. President, I am indifferent as to when this vote shall take place. If it is the pleasure of the Senate of the United States by a two-thirds vote to give to twenty-seven thousand people in Colorado the voice in the Senate of the United States given to the million and a half of people in the State of Indiana, we have to submit to it. This was not at one time the judgment of the Senate. Before this question assumed any political character, and before there were any purposes to accomplish, the vote upon the admission of Colorado stood 14 for it and 21 against it; and it will be a singular fact if now two thirds can be secured for a bill, when on the first vote there were nearly two thirds against it. No such case has occurred in our history, that a State should be admitted with so inconsiderable a population as this. One or two cases can be found in which States have been admitted without a population sufficient to entitle them to a Representative in the House; but in the great body of the cases the population has been much above the Representative ratio.

It seems to me that the majority here are not so straitened for votes as that they need to do this, to give a power in the Senate of the United States to men scattered over a Territory almost a hundred times greater than is enjoyed by the people of the State I represent. Upon what principle of right is it that this State, with a less population than the county in which I live, with a much less population than the city in which I live, should have a political power in the Senate of the United States, in the making of laws, and in the vote basis for President, if that should ever go to the other House, equal to the entire State of Indiana, when that county in which I live is not entitled to a single Representative in the House, but in order to have a Representative has to be joined with five other large and populous counties? It is not right, Mr. President; and although a gain politically may be made for a day, and results may be carried for this year, perhaps for next year, and perhaps in the presidential contest of 1868, I say to gentlemen in the majority that in the long run political power is not held by wrong. I denounce this as a wrong upon the people I represent, a wrong that ought not to be done upon the plea of political and party necessity. That one million five hundred thousand men in the State of Indiana shall have the voice in the Senate of two votes, and twenty-seven thousand men in a Territory, scattered over a large extent of country, few of them having permanent homes, many of them adventurers among the mines, shall have a voice equal to the great population of the State that, in connection with my able colleague, I represent, is not right, and, when done, in my judgment, in the long run, will not bring advantage to the political party that claims an interest at this time to do it.

What is it, sir? A thing that had no regularity from first to last; a State formed, not pursuant to law, but pursuant to an arrangement made by political parties; a convention called not by act of Congress; a convention called by no act of the territorial Legislature; but a convention called to form a State government and to lay the foundations of a new State by the representatives of political parties; an election governed by no law; an election for delegates to that convention as irregular as the proceedings that characterize the selection of delegates to a political convention; and then when it is all done, and the constitution submitted to a popular vote, without the restraints and guarantees of law for the honesty of the vote, and after every effort of this sort has been resorted to, a majority of one hundred and fifty is found in its favor. Sir, I am not surprised, and no man will be surprised, that nearly a two-third vote of the Senate was against it when it came up first; but it is a matter of surprise that now it is thought two thirds of the Senate can be found to vote down the veto message of the President.

Sir, whatever may be said here or elsewhere of that message, it goes upon the Journals of the Senate and becomes a part of history, and it is sustained by the vote of this Senate when there were no political ends to accomplish. This Senate said that under the circumstances this State ought not to come in, and said it by a very decided vote. Now, it is claimed that the veto message can be overridden, not because the population has grown, not because these proceedings have become any more regular, but for some other reason; and men will inquire what is the reason. When the Senator from Ohio led the majority against this bill a year ago it was well understood what was the reason. There were not people enough there firmly established and domiciled to authorize them to the political power that a State government would give them in this Union. That was well understood.

Mr. WADE. The Senator has made the same argument that he has now made five times to my certain knowledge, and he has also stated that I went against this bill, and I have told him the reasons as often as he has made it. It was because the Governor of the Territory, who now opposes its admission, was guilty of a gross fraud in sending to us not much more than half the number of inhabitants that were on the census by substituting a wrong paper in the place of the true and certified paper. Therefore I went against it, because there did not appear to be inhabitants enough there. When that was corrected by his secretary, and he showed the amount of the population, then I went for it. Now, sir, when you state that, I wish you would state the whole of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will state the whole of it, and I will state to the Senator that the fact he now speaks of came out long after he became the champion of this bill—came out at this session.

Mr. WADE. No, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At this session. The first I heard of that being read in the Senate or referred to was in a discussion at this session. I heard nothing about any report from the secretary at the last session of Congress. But, taking all the evidence we have, there is no question about the population in the Territory.

Sir, I do not care if I have made this argument five times. If I believe it to be my duty, now that we come to vote upon the reconsideration of the question upon the veto message of the President, I choose to make it again, and upon that I am answerable to but one authority, and that authority does not include the distinguished Senator from Ohio. It is to the million and a half of people of Indiana, upon whom I regard this bill as an outrage. I am ready to respond to them whether I object to the admission of twenty-seven thousand people as a State or not, and to the people of Indiana alone.

I do not believe, sir, I would vote to admit such a State with such a population, whatever might be the party politics of the State. I cannot believe I would. I do not believe there is more than twenty-seven thousand of a population in this Territory. I have not believed it; and the Senator from Ohio cannot prove by any document that there is more. The late census does not show more. The census taken this past year does not show more. The census taken in 1860 does not show more. In 1860, when, according to the census, there were thirty-four thousand of a population, they had a vote of ten thousand at the next election. When the census of 1861 showed twenty-five thousand of a population, it showed nearly ten thousand of a vote; and now you can rally about six thousand voters in the Territory. Tell me there is an increase of population! It is not so, sir. Therefore I am against the admission of this State earnestly, because I think it disturbs the equality, the fair, just equality of political power in this country. I do not care when the vote is taken.

Mr. President, I have felt it to be my duty to say this. I have said it, and leave the consequence to gentlemen who choose to vote for or against the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. In making the motion to postpone the bill until to-morrow I certainly had not the least purpose to delay unnecessarily a vote upon the measure. The importance of the measure no one can question. My sole object was to enable us to understand exactly the facts stated by the President of the United States, many of which are new to me, although they may not be new to the Senate. My individual purpose was, therefore, to ascertain for myself what weight, if any, the facts stated by the President should have upon the measure; and my other motive was that the Senate might be full when the question is taken.

I am not about to make a speech twice upon the same subject. I have, on a former occasion, stated to the Senate why it was that I was unable to vote for the admission of this State. The grounds for that opinion remain still; but it is possible that there may be facts stated by the President which will operate upon the members of the Senate who have heretofore differed with me upon that subject. Now, he states what has recently, as I understand, taken place, that the Legislature of the Territory protest against the admission of the Territory as a State. There may be—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe I must interrupt the honorable Senator and call for the order of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and it is the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. WADE. If this subject is to go over, I move that the veto message be printed, so that there shall be no argument on that score when it comes up again.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what I was about to move.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the message, with the accompanying documents, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. With the consent of the Senator from Maine, I desire to present a petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being another subject before the Senate it requires unanimous consent. Is there any objection?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I must object to petitions being presented this morning. We want all the time we can get on this tariff bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it cannot be received.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA—VETO.

During the consideration of the tariff bill a message was received from the President of the United States, by his Secretary, Mr. W. G. MOORE, returning, with his objections in writing, the bill (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union.

TARIFF BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CATTELL to amend the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, on page 39, section eight, line fifty-one, by striking out "thirty" and inserting "forty;" so as to read:

On nickel, forty cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The yeas and nays were ordered on that question, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Cowan, Cresswell, Fowler, Frothinghams, Howe, Lane, Morrill, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Stewart, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Guthrie, Howard, Johnson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, and Ross—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CATTELL. I now move to amend the bill by striking out, in line fifty-four of section eight, on page 40, the words "ten per cent. ad valorem," and inserting "thirty cents per pound;" so as to make the clause read:

On nickel matte, speiss, or oxide, thirty cents per pound.

I believe this amendment meets the approbation of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. Its object is to prevent frauds on the revenue, for this is nickel almost in a perfect state, and requires about the same rate of duty as upon the nickel itself.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that is right. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 56 I move to strike out line three hundred and sixty-seven of section nine, in these words:

On acetate of lead, or sugar of lead, ten cents per pound.

It is provided for in another part of the bill. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to amend the eighteenth section, the free list, by adding to line fifty-one, on page 100, "and rough diamonds;" so as to make the line read:

Diamond dust or bort, and rough diamonds.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There are three or four amendments which have been submitted to the commissioner, and I think meet with his approval, which I will suggest. On page 31, line one hundred and forty of section seven, I move to strike out "two and a half" and insert "three." This raises the duty "on wrought-iron washers, nuts, bolts, or rivets, wholly or partially finished of all descriptions, punched or unpunched," from two and a half to three cents per pound, because the material out of which they are made has a duty of two and a half cents a pound imposed upon it, as will be seen by looking at page 27, from the forty-first to the forty-ninth lines of the same section. My motion is simply to make the duty on the manufactured article half a cent more than the duty on the material out of which it is manufactured.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On page 34 I move to strike out "six," in line two hundred and seventeen of section seven, and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read?

On steel carriage-springs, eight cents per pound.

This has also been submitted to the commissioner. It is utterly impossible for the springs to be manufactured here with no greater duty than six cents a pound. If there is any objection to the amendment I will give the reasons for it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I thought the amendment the Senator proposed to offer there was to affect the definition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is another one.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not object to making the specification more definite, but I do object to raising the duty. I think six cents is high enough.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is found impossible to manufacture these springs here at less than twenty cents per pound; and they can be manufactured in Canada, where the steel is admitted free of duty, and come in here at seventeen and a half cents after paying our duty of six cents. The object of this increased duty is to apply principally to the imports from Canada where the steel is imported free; and it is necessary, as I am told by many manufacturers of springs, for their protection. There is a class of springs made of poor material which can be made for seventeen and a half cents, as cheap as those that are imported from Canada; but good springs, those which are generally used, cannot be manufactured and sold for less than twenty cents a pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator that perhaps the House of Representatives may adhere to its original idea with reference to this item. It was put in the House bill at eight cents a pound. The Finance Committee thought six cents enough. Perhaps the Senator had better let it stand at that, and if the other House insist upon their original rate the matter will be arranged on some fair basis. I have no objection to putting on such a duty as will afford the protection needed, and the impression of the committee was that six cents a pound was sufficient. I do not feel authorized, therefore, to accede to the amendment. I presume, if the case is as the Senator states, the House of Representatives will adhere to their original rate probably, as fixed in the bill, and then the difference will have to be arranged.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The insistment of these manufacturers was ten cents a pound. A good deal of investigation was made in the House, and they finally fixed the rate at eight cents. Nothing has been altered in this bill so as to create any propriety in lessening the amount; and I think the Senate had better fix this rate at what will be considered just, especially as there is no serious opposition to the amendment from the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is not, perhaps, aware that the rates on iron are very considerably decreased from those fixed in the House bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But these springs are manufactured from steel.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a decrease in the duty on steel in this bill from that fixed by the House of Representatives; and this item was arranged to correspond with that decrease of duty.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But the Senate will also remember that the decrease of gold is very great since the House passed the bill, which more than compensates for any decrease in the duty on steel. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Connors, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Johnson, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Fessenden, Grimes, Henderson, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Poland, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Doolittle, Fogg, Fowler, Guthrie, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, McDougall, Nye, Patterson, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Stewart, and Trumbull—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move now to amend the seventh section, on page 34, by inserting after the word "carriage," in line two hundred and seventeen, the words "railroad-car, locomotive, wagon, and truck;" and after "springs" the words "wholly or partially finished;" so as to make the clause read:

On steel carriage, railroad-car, locomotive, wagon, and truck springs, wholly or partially finished, eight cents per pound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I voted against the other amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, and upon the same ground I oppose this amendment. In the State in which I live we use carriages, and we purchase them from persons who manufacture them upon this side of the continent, and I do not know how much more they desire to add to the price of wagons than we are now compelled to pay. Certainly the prices at this time are enormous; and I know of no reason why the manufacturers of these articles may not make them under the existing tariff and be compensated by the prices they now receive.

But in addition to the imposition of an additional duty on carriage-springs, an effort is now made to strike at the railroad interests of the country, in which the people of the Pacific coast and the West are deeply interested. So far as I am concerned, I am determined to oppose these exorbitant duties upon the materials out of which the railroads of the country are constructed; and if there is much more additional duty put upon these articles, notwithstanding the fact that I am one of the committee who concurred in the report of this bill, I shall vote against the whole of it, because there is a limit beyond which the manufacturers ought not to go in the burdens which they impose upon the consumers of the country. In this respect the people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent here are altogether consumers, so far as wagons are concerned, and they will be so far as the materials and articles which enter into the construction of railroads and railroad cars are concerned. It is for the development of the country, and the promotion of its best interests that these articles, which are necessary for the construction and operation of railroads, should not be put at such exorbitant prices as to check and impede their construction. And I have heard no representation made here to satisfy me that the persons who are engaged in the manufacture of these articles are not now engaged in a lucrative business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The object of this amendment, allow me to say to the Senator, is not to increase in any way the cost of or the duty on springs. It is a mere matter of construction of the report of the committee, the committee having intended that the term "carriage springs" should apply to all kinds of carriages, railroad, truck, and wagon; and when I suggested the amendment I stated that it was meant simply to remove a doubt as to the signification of the term "carriage springs," so as not to leave it open to controversy. This amendment is not to raise the duty, but merely to explain and make clear what the committee intended by their report.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that the amendment puts the articles enumerated in it under a tariff of eight cents per pound, and that certainly is adding a duty to the one that was reported by the committee. I object to this additional duty upon these articles; and I understand that if this amendment be adopted these materials which are used in the construction of railroad cars will pay eight cents per pound, while under the report of the committee they would pay only six cents per pound. It is to that increase of duty that I object. I object to it because it is adding greatly and unnecessarily, as it seems to me, to the burdens of the consumer, and because there is no sufficient evidence to my mind that this additional duty is necessary to enable the men who are engaged in the manufacture of these articles to prosecute their business; but it is simply taking so much money out of the pockets of the people on the Pacific coast and in the West and putting it into the pockets of the manufacturers of those articles. That is all there is in it, in my opinion. I know that I am not altogether advised as to the condition of these manufacturing establishments; but before we proceed to impose this additional duty I think there should be some other showing than the one that has been made.

The tariff upon iron, as proposed by the House bill, was reduced by the report of the committee, and the tariff upon steel as proposed by the House bill was likewise reduced. Iron and steel are ingredients from which these articles are made; and yet, notwithstanding the reduction made upon the proposed tariff in regard to the materials, you still propose to put the articles up to the same duty that was fixed in the House bill. I think as this part of the bill was altogether arranged so as to harmonize and systematize all these things the report had better be left in its present condition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The amendment now before the Senate, as I understand it, is not to increase the duty on anything; it is to give construction to the word "carriage-springs," that term being intended to apply to wagon-springs, car-springs, and truck-springs. Unless the word "carriage-springs" does apply to these different kind of springs, there is no duty at all on railroad car and truck springs. My amendment is simply a construction of the language used in the bill, which I understand was accepted by the committee. I ask for the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Dixon, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Davis, Fessenden, Fogg, Fowler, Grimes, Harris, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Norton, Patterson, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Williams, and Yates—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Connors, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Doolittle, Edmunds, Guthrie, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ross, and Wilson—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. On page 22, in line ten of section six I move to strike out "twenty-five" and "fifty," so as to read "on Russia, Manila, Italian, and all other hems, unmanufactured, fifty dollars per ton.

In line twelve I move to raise the duty on tow of flax or hemp from five dollars to twelve dollars per ton; in line fourteen, to make the duty on jute, unmanufactured, and Sisal-grass twenty dollars instead of five dollars a ton; in line twenty-six to make the duty on cordage and rope ten cents instead of three cents per pound; and in line thirty-two to add to the specific duty on gunny-cloth, gunny-bags, &c., an ad valorem duty of thirty per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish his proposition to be regarded as one amendment or as separate propositions?

Mr. DAVIS. Let the question be taken on all the propositions together.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. I have moved a group of amendments that are restricted to a very small space in the bill, all the subjects of which are so closely and intimately united that they may be considered together. With the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] I concede that as abstract propositions or in connection and as parts of a well-arranged tariff bill, the propositions of increase that I make ought not to be allowed; but in connection with the bill under consideration I consider them altogether proper and legitimate; indeed, I know them to be below the rate of protection that is generally afforded by the bill to the interests protected by it.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this tariff bill has been framed in support of a few leading and controlling interest with the purpose of giving an undue amount, if not a prohibitory protection, to certain classes of capital and industry at the expense of all other interests. Hemp, in any of its forms, does not enter into this ring of high protection. On the contrary, the interests of hemp are among those to which are assigned the lowest protection by this bill.

All the propositions to amend it have been to get higher protection for particular local interests. Gentlemen seem to be merely playing the game of grab. They are dissatisfied with the amount of protection that the bill proposes to give to their special interests, and they make a dash to capture a little more. I confess that I am acting upon the same principle, but not being an adept in the game I am apprehensive that I shall play it without any result or advantage to my constituents. Nevertheless I maintain that the just proportionate pro rata protection that hems as articles specified in my amendment ought to receive, in comparison with the other interests that are protected by this bill, are greatly too low. Now, Mr. President, I propose in connection with my amendment at this time to move to commit the bill to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to examine and consider it in connection with the laws to provide internal revenue and the laws imposing duties on foreign importations, and that the committee shall report bills reducing the aggregate amount of taxes imposed by those laws in the sum of at least $100,000,000.

Mr. President, it is my purpose thus to suggest a decided movement in the regulation of American industry, and the taxes imposed upon the people and the produce of our revenue laws. I wish this bill to be recommitted with the command of the Senate to the Committee on Finance to consider it, in connection with all existing laws imposing duties both on foreign imports and internal taxes, as a revenue system, by reducing the amount of taxes by all existing laws not less than $100,000,000, and then readjusting the laws imposing duties, imports, and internal taxes, so to give to the people not less than that amount of reduction.

Sir, ought not such a policy as that to be entered upon at once? Will not the receipts under the revenue laws now in operation authorize that amount of general reduction in the taxes of the people? What was the produce of the revenue laws last year? I am indebted for most of the facts I am about to state to my learned and industrious friend, the Senator from Missouri. He has proceeded, with his usual diligence and accuracy, to collect and collate these facts, and he has presented them to the Senate in connection with arguments and views so forcible that to my mind his positions and conclusions ought to receive the immediate assent of the Senate.

As the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury show, the produce of our revenue laws the last fiscal year was $558,000,000 and a fraction. The honorable Senator from Missouri gives us a statement of the produce of the first quarter of the present fiscal year, and also including a period of five months; and the same rate of receipts for the whole year, its aggregate would be the rise of $540,000,000.

Now, what is the object of the bill? It is to increase the taxes upon foreign importations. But for that object the bill would not have been devised. Its friends do not attempt to disguise that the purpose is, by increasing taxes upon certain articles, and numerous articles, to give an additional protection to the producers of those and similar articles at home. Notwithstanding the laws imposing taxes now in existence during the last fiscal year raised $558,000,000, and this fiscal year promise certainly to produce $540,000,000, yet the measure under consideration has been devised still further to swell receipts into the Treasury by imposing additional heavy taxes upon the people in the form of additional duties on foreign imports, varying from twenty to forty per cent.

Is that sound policy? Is it good statesmanship? Is it true and able financiering? I believe it was Peter Pinder who said that "there is nothing certain but death and taxes;" and if Wolcot were now living he would have suggested at least another proposition in relation to the United States: which is the most terrible—death or the taxes of our people? They are taxed nearly five hundred and fifty million dollars by our existing laws, and the majority in Congress propose still further to pile upon them. No people were ever before so burdened and ground down by taxes. The cry is, still they come!

I have before me the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury of the public expenditures for the passing fiscal year, and they exhibit only an aggregate of $328,000,000. That is the amount which he gives as the proximate necessary amount of revenue required for all the purposes of the Government within the passing fiscal year. When we are just out of a great war, when the industry of the country in all its branches, and especially in the middle and southern States, has been so greatly disorganized, and when the people are groaning under the weight of such enormous taxation, and when the Secretary of the Treasury only estimates that $328,000,000 are necessary for this year to answer all the purposes of the Government, I ask why is it that new bills to burden the people with still more taxes are devised?

Sir, there is no pretext of any necessity for it. It springs from a sectional and monopolizing spirit—a spirit to rob the many for the benefit of the few; a spirit that exacts from the industry of the producer and the laborer for the purpose of adding to the wealth of the capitalist, the manufacturer, growers of wool, and the great manufacturers of iron. It is impossible that this aspect of the case can be disguised. It is reflected by the official papers from the Treasury Department, and it shows that the people of the United States are being taxed to the amount of about one half of five hundred and forty million dollars above every legitimate demand of the Government. As was intimated by the Senator from Missouri, this appetite for protection is not sated, but it grows by what it feeds on. The more protection that is given above a certain wholesome and legitimate point the more is rendered necessary. The best protection in my judgment, in addition to moderate duties to prevent ruinous competition with foreign labor, is a moderate amount of capital, industry, manufacturing skill, economy, and cheap subsistence. They are the elements of cheap production, of prosperous manufacturing interests, and of a prosperous people generally. They are principles upon which the whole country flourishes and grows wealthy, without any injustice or oppression from one interest upon another.

The taxes of the country amount annually, as I have said, to over five hundred and fifty million dollars. This enormous amount of taxes enters into the general aggregate of the prices of almost everything. It is an onerous burden upon all the people, and particularly upon the producers and the laborers, who constitute the great mass of the consumers and the tax-payers. If Congress now should remove an aggregate of $150,000,000 of taxes from this people, as it well might, what a great amount of relief would be afforded to them! If a reduction of but $100,000,000, as contemplated by my motion, should be made, the whole country would be made to breathe easier by it. But the abolition of an aggregate of $150,000,000 would leave $50,000,000 annually of surplus revenue, and that would be enough not only to meet all contingencies, but to make other and large reductions of the public burdens.

Sir, we have had a most deplorable view of our industrial interests given in the decay of our shipping, the decrease of our tonnage; our commercial marine, which was once the largest that floated on the ocean, now being reduced more than fifty per cent. What have the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Michigan told us? What we all know and what all the gentlemen here tell us who want further protection: that labor and production are so costly in the United States that our products cannot come into competition with the foreign product and foreign labor. The honorable Senator from Vermont told us that while the laborers in the British Provinces were working in the stone quarries at from seventy-five cents to one dollar per day, in his State they were charging three and four dollars. The same statement was made by the Senator from Michigan in relation to the laborers in that State.

It has been said here again and again, and seems to be conceded by everybody, that a mechanic or laborer skilled in the highest workmanship of manufacture wants from four to five dollars per day, while the European laborer of the same class only gets about one fourth or one fifth of the same wages. Why is it, then, that our manufactures and laborers are no longer able to compete with the manufacturers and laborers of the world as heretofore in our market, with the same amount of reasonable protection that they were wont to receive in former years? Why is it? As you informed us, sir, there is but one principal ship on the stocks now in the United States. Why is it that our vast magnificent commercial marine is diminishing to such an extent as to be the shame and the great loss of the whole country? It is because of the enormous amount of taxation that is bearing down the labor and the enterprise of our people; because it oppresses not only their capital and their production, but very labor and subsistence.

Why is it that the man in New Brunswick can afford to work at one dollar or seventy-five cents a day, and a man in Michigan or in Vermont must have from three to five dollars per day? What are the elements of the cost of labor? Independent of the time and muscle of the laborer, there is principally his subsistence and the subsistence of his family. Everything upon which he can live, that is to sus-tain his life, and to clothe and lodge him and his family, and of the elements of the price of his labor, and every article which he uses, they are directly or incidentally heavily taxed; and the amount of accumulating taxes which this consumer has ultimately to pay constitute the greater part of the cost of the subsistence of himself and his family; and it has all to be saddled upon his labor. If you would unfetter him from this slavery and give him cheap and full and sure subsistence, remove the taxes from those articles which form it.

In the same proportion that you abolish or reduce those taxes you reduce the price of his labor and cheapen production. You do not impoverish him by reducing his labor, because even at his present high rate of wages the most are consumed by the payment of taxes, and he has little or no surplus of profit. The true statesman would relieve the laborers and consumers of our country from their difficulties by abolishing their taxes. To the extent of between one hundred and two hundred million dollars it is your duty to abolish their taxes; they have the right and will demand it of you, and unless you accord it to them they will put other men in your places who will.

The honorable Senator from Missouri made other remarks which ought to arrest the attention of the Senate and receive its most serious consideration: that one of the principal elements of the enormous prices of everything in the United States is our redundant currency. We now have an exclusive paper currency of upward of $900,000,000. Is not that an excessive currency, greatly beyond the demands of a healthy condition of the country and of its legitimate business? How can prices come down in the presence of such an enormous and spurious currency? We all know, as the Senator remarked, that the currency of the world is gold and silver, and that people who would enter into its trade and business generally on terms of fair competition must also have a similar currency. The idea of one people having a vicious, inflated, and irredeemable paper currency, in amount two or three times greater than the aggregate of gold currency that would be needful and useful for the business of the country, entering into an equal and successful competition with the great manufacturing and commercial nations of the world who have a metallic currency, is preposterous. Our paper currency was not intended to answer the purposes of times of peace. It was the straits and necessities of the war that induced the Government and people to resort to a paper currency. That great need has passed, and it is time that the Government and the country were adopting measures for the resumption of specie payments.

No paper currency will ever answer the necessities of a circulating medium unless it is convertible at the pleasure of the holder. No gentleman would want our country to come back to that condition suddenly. But, sir, to reach it at all, there must be a beginning, and now is the time, and in my judgment the appropriate time, to make the beginning. I think that Congress ought to second the views and policy of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the return to specie payments. I would not have it suddenly done. I would have it proceed very slowly and gradually, so as to permit no great disorders in the business of the country and to cause no ruinous losses, or at least to as few a number of persons as possible. But let a tendency toward the resumption of specie payments now be entered upon, and let the enlightened statesmen of Congress and of the country determine that in the course of four or five years that condition of things shall be reached; in the course of that time the resumption of specie payments could be made so gradual that no prudent man's interests need be materially affected.

But, sir, a return to specie payments can never be made without producing more or less of disorder and bankruptcy. Some men must fall, and a great many before such an operation. It is a necessity, though; to resume specie payments, an absolute indispensable necessity. The true, wise policy is to resume them so gradually and to reach that result with such slow approaches that the smallest number of individuals will be injured in their circumstances and business by it. That policy sooner or later must be undertaken and it must be consummated. This Congress, with all its puissance, cannot long delay that day.

As one of the operations for the resumption of specie payments, as well as for the relief of the people from grievous burdens of taxation and the great charge which is thus made upon their industry, the Committee on Finance, in my opinion, ought to consider the whole question of revenue and protection in connection with every act of Congress imposing taxes in every form, whether by internal excise or duties upon foreign imports, and they ought to fashion and adjust all such measures together. They ought to be settled upon the principle of relieving the people of the United States, I would say from $150,000,000 of taxes, and then Congress would be enabled to determine with better judgment how much of protection against foreign imports the industry of the country requires by being brought to the scale upon which internal taxation should be adjusted.

I therefore, Mr. President, move the Senate to recommit the bill under consideration to the Committee on Finance, to examine and consider it in connection with the laws to provide internal revenue and the laws imposing duties on foreign importation; and that said committee report bills reducing the aggregate amount of taxes imposed by said laws upon the people by at least $100,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to recommit the bill to the Committee on Finance with the instructions moved by him.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for a division of the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks that the motion be divided. It is susceptible of division, and the first question will be taken on the motion to recommit; and the next on the instruction proposed to the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish simply to say that it would be useless to recommit the bill without instructions, because we should probably report the bill back as it is; and the effect of recommitting with the instructions proposed would be that we should not be able to report the bill again at this session in time for action.

Mr. GRIMES. When I asked for a division of the question I did not mean or desire that it should be divided as the Presiding Officer has directed that it should be divided. I meant to divide the clauses of the instructions. I should like to see this bill recommitted; or if it cannot be recommitted, I should like to see it postponed until we can have an opportunity of seeing the character of the bill which is said to be under consideration in the other branch of Congress, regulating the internal duties that are to be placed on manufactures and other things. It seems to me that is the place where we should begin; that is the bill which should first be taken into consideration; and after we have passed upon that we shall be prepared to vote understandingly on this tariff bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not mean to limit the Senator from Iowa by the decision he made as to the motion to recommit. It is competent for the Senator to move to amend the instructions proposed by striking out any portion of them or adding to them at his pleasure.

Mr. GRIMES. I was going to say that I am in favor of the first clause of the instructions proposed by the Senator from Kentucky; but whether it is advisable to instruct the committee to reduce the amount that shall be levied under the internal and external taxes to the extent of $100,000,000 per annum or not I cannot now say. I would rather have some expression of opinion from the committee on that subject, without undertaking by any sort of declaration of this kind to bind them to any specific amount. I shall therefore vote for the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, if we can have a division of the instructions proposed by him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is competent for the Senator from Iowa to move to strike out any portion of the proposed instructions by way of amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I move to amend the motion by striking out the latter clause of the instructions—so much as relates to the specific amount of the proposed reduction of taxation—unless the Senator chooses to withdraw that part of his motion.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not think I have any objection to the proposition of the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky accept the proposed modification of his motion?

Mr. DAVIS. I will make a remark first. I think that all the revenue bills ought to be considered together by the Committee on Finance. I think it would be more convenient, and it would more certainly secure a wise adjustment of our revenue system, internal and external, to have all branches of the subject considered together by the Committee on Finance. I think that if all the laws imposing internal revenue and all the laws imposing duties upon foreign imports were considered together it would be wise. They belong to the same system of revenue. It is true, the features are different; but they are so intimately connected and blended together that it is impossible wisely to adjust one except upon consideration of and in the closest connection with the other. I therefore hope that it will be the sense of the Senate that its Committee on Finance shall not consider the two subjects apart; that the present bill shall be delayed until the bill regulating internal revenue comes from the House, and that the Senate will then instruct the Committee on Finance to consider them together and to report proper bills, and understanding their mutual connection with each other.

In the instructions which I moved I did not propose to restrict the committee to a reduction of only $100,000,000; I proposed that the reduction should be at least to that extent. But when the estimates of the Treasury Department show that only about three hundred and twenty-eight million dollars will be necessary for the whole service of the year, and also show that under the existing laws the aggregate produce of the revenue will be $540,000,000, it seems to me that there cannot be a reasonable doubt that a greater reduction than $100,000,000 could be made in the aggregate taxation. I accept the modification proposed by the Senator from Iowa, by striking out of the instructions moved by me the last clause relative to the amount of reduction.

Mr. HENDERSON. As the motion now stands I really think the Senate ought to adopt it. I feel satisfied that it is the proper disposition of this measure. I appreciate the difficulties under which the Committee on Finance have labored, and I am not at all surprised that they have failed to report a tariff bill that is satisfactory to every interest in the United States. That is an utter impossibility. Taking the bill altogether, it is, on the principle upon which it is based, a good bill; but the principle itself, in my judgment, is wrong. We are attempting to increase, when, in my judgment, if we touch the tariff at all, we ought to decrease the rates. What the country wants is a decrease of the excise taxes, in my judgment. I think that is perfectly clear; it is one of those things that can be demonstrated; and I think we should act on that question before we dispose of this bill. I say so without meaning to put a single log in the way of the passage of the bill, if the Senate is disposed to pass it. I really do not wish to unnecessarily retard the transaction of business; and, if a majority of the body desire to pass the bill, they may as well do it at once; but if the contrary policy is to prevail, if we are to reduce the internal taxation and then adjust the tariff to the excise taxes, this is the proper course to pursue.

In the remarks I made the other day I indicated that at the proper time, after Senators had got all their interests fastened upon the bill, or else when it had been demonstrated that a majority of the Senators would not consider these special and local interests, and after the bill had been perfected to the satisfaction of the Senate and they had fully discovered the fact that it was not the measure required by the true and the best interests of the country, I should move to postpone it until we should consider the question of internal revenue. The Committee on Finance seem to differ with me as to the general policy. They think there ought to be an increase of the tariff rates: I think not. If the Senate has made up its mind to this effect, of course the bill may as well be pressed to its passage now. That view is contrary to my judgment; and I shall of course vote for this motion, not because I believe the Finance Committee has not discharged its duty, but simply because the bill itself is predicated upon a wrong principle.

If we pass this bill we may as well make up our minds at once that nothing is to be done in regard to the excise taxes. It is useless to speak of a reduction of the excise taxes after the passage of this bill. A reduction of excise taxes is but equivalent to an increase of the tariff in one sense; and if you reduce the excise taxes after having increased the tariff the result will be that, instead of putting the amount of the reduction of the excise taxes into the Treasury, we should pay it as a bounty to the domestic producers. Is not that a clear proposition? Prices are not going to be reduced under this bill; on the contrary its effect will be to enhance them. If you do reduce internal taxation after the passage of this measure, prices will still maintain a higher rate; labor will be higher; the raw material will be higher; everything will be advanced, making it absolutely essential to keep this high, stilted condition of affairs in this country while all of us say that we ought to be looking to and soon should approach specie payments. Sir, it is chimerical and idle to talk about specie payments when we pursue this system of legislation. We cannot arrive at it in that way. I do not want to force specie payments all at once. I think a great many persons are talking wildly on that subject. I do not desire to force specie payments in a moment, but to let the future operations of business bring about that state of affairs. All that we have to do is to discharge our duty, relieve the country of its present burdens in the shape of excise taxes, which come home to every manufacturer, come home to every farmer. Relieve the country from the oppressive weight of those taxes. That being the burden which holds business down, take it off, and business springs up as if it had new life, as if it had new energy. It will be revived from one end of the country to the other. The manufacturer will make money and be satisfied with the present tariff.

I am represented as having said the other day that the present tariff is exactly what the country needs. I said no such thing. I said that this able committee who have digested the present bill and placed it before us, after they have reduced the internal taxes will be perfectly able in my judgment to present a tariff bill founded upon the reductions thus made in the internal taxation, which will secure the confidence of the country as well as the approbation of this body. That is my judgment, and therefore I sincerely hope that the Senate will recommit this measure to the committee. It is the proper motion. Let it go to the committee, not with instructions to make any specific decrease, but to make a partial decrease anyhow in internal taxation, because we do not need the amount that we must collect under the internal revenue law.

I have said that if you adopt this bill you cannot reduce internal taxation. If you do not reduce internal taxation you get more money than you want. Why is it necessary now to oppress the people of the United States with high, excessive duties in the shape of excise taxes for the mere purpose of filling up the Treasury? Mr. President, as long as you increase the prices of labor and material you cannot arrive at what we all desire, and that is a contraction of the currency; and as long as you keep up the present condition of affairs you cannot secure a better credit for your Government than you have got to-day. Gold, as has been properly said, is the cheapest article to-day in the American market, and why? Because all of us want specie payments, and gold tends in that direction. We all want it. Gold moves more rapidly than other metals. If we want to bring about that desired state of affairs let us begin at the right end and reduce internal taxation, thereby relieving the country.

What is the object of filling up the Treasury with a vast amount of currency and gold? Will any gentleman tell me? Why are our public securities to-day less valuable in the market than the English securities? Can anybody tell me? Great Britain has double our wealth; but Great Britain has nearly double our public debt. Her securities stand twenty per cent. higher in the market than ours, and her interest is only three per cent., while ours is six per cent. Does Great Britain undertake to pay any part of the principal of her debt? Surely not. She looks to the future to pay the principal. Is there any man in the United States in any doubt about the ultimate payment of our securities? Mr. President, let us pay the interest on the public debt, and the principal will be paid in due time. All we want to do now is to relieve the burdens of the community. We have imposed excessive taxes in the shape of impost duties and internal duties for the last five or six years, the country looking forward to the termination of hostilities with the cherished idea that taxes would then cease, except so far as are necessary to maintain the credit of the Government; and now we pursue a system which instead of decreasing will increase them.

I sincerely hope that the Senate will put this measure back before the committee and let us act upon the internal revenue laws first. That is the true plan. If that is not done, the Senate will find that after debating this bill for another week or ten days we shall be just where we are now, with a continual clash of individual interests.

Mr. SHERMAN. When the honorable Senator from Kentucky first made this motion I was not disposed to think it was a serious matter; but now I wish, speaking only as a single Senator, that this should be a test vote. The Senator from Missouri is correct, that if we are to debate this bill and load it down with private interests the sooner we defeat it the better. Unless the friends of an increased tariff, in order to promote our industry and to secure increased revenue, are determined to stand by it, the bill may as well be killed now as at any other time. To refer this bill at this stage of the session is a defeat of the bill.

I have been a little surprised at the course of the honorable Senator from Iowa. At the last session we had two bills before the Senate, one in relation to internal revenue, and the other in relation to the duties on customs. The two bills were here together; they were considered together; this very bill was being considered in the House while the internal system of taxation was considered in the Senate. Then, however, he desired to separate them. He himself moved that this identical bill should be postponed until the present session, at the time when we had the two bills before us. Now it seems he thinks we ought to have the two under consideration at the same time in order to equalize the one with the other. The reference of this bill at this stage of the session, and especially with instructions or intimations that we must not consider this bill until the House matures an internal revenue bill, is a defeat of the bill, and might as well so be considered.

My honorable friend from Kentucky is a great stickler for the Constitution; but he proposes to instruct us substantially to report an internal revenue bill. The Constitution declares that all bills for raising taxes shall originate in the House of Representatives. The Senate have no power to introduce a bill to provide for taxes. We have to await the action of the House. We might, perhaps, by amendments to this bill, add an internal revenue bill; but it would be a violation of the spirit of the Constitution. We have to await the action of the House.

If after having this bill before us for months and months; after having a most patient examination by an officer of the Government; after having it fully considered in committee; after the committee spending days and weeks during the holidays, when everybody else was enjoying himself, in a patient and laborious examination of the bill, the Senate now see proper to recommit it, as a matter of course that is the end of it for this session. I, for one, as an individual member of the committee, have no interest to subserve in this bill; and I may state that so far as the State of Ohio is concerned perhaps our interests are opposed to this bill. There is not a single interest embraced in this bill that affects my constituents except the increased duty on wool of four cents. All the other duties weigh upon us as consumers. So far as my individual interests or the interests of my State are concerned we have none in the passage of this bill. Other Senators seek to load it down with various matters for the protection of their local interests. I, for one, have not offered, and do not propose to offer, any amendments. As I said before, there is not a single interest in this bill that affects favorably my constituents except it is the slight additional protection on wool. As Ohio is one of the great wool-growing States, producing about one sixth of the whole crop, we shall be benefited to the extent of a protection of four cents per pound additional duty on wool. All the other duties weigh upon us as they do upon the rest of the people of the United States.

My object in voting for this bill, and the only reason why I shall vote for it, is because I believe it will yield us more revenue by the amount of about ten or twelve million dollars than the present tariff under present circumstances. My honorable friend from Missouri says that the present tariff last year produced $179,000,000, and during the first quarter of the present year it produced at about the same rate. Now, I know he is too shrewd and too intelligent not to know the reason why during the last two quarters the present tariff has produced so much. Importations were forced into the country by the pendency of this bill. Now, there is a sudden contraction, and either under the old tariff or under this tariff bill the revenue will fall off largely. If Senators are willing to take the responsibility of leaving a probable deficiency in the gold revenue of the country to meet the interest on the public debt let them do it. I must bear the responsibility with the rest.

I can only state as one member of the committee, and perhaps not the most industrious, because I have not probably been as faithful as some others—the chairman has had the chief part of the labor—that this bill has been considered day by day, after all the benefit of the labors of the House, after an examination and report by an officer of the Government who was especially designated to examine into this particular subject, with all the information that could possibly be obtained on the subject, with interested parties on both sides pulling from diverse views representing their interests before us, their statements patiently heard and patiently examined, and if the result of that deliberation has not produced a bill that in the main is satisfactory to the Senate it is utterly idle to refer the subject to that committee again. To require us to wait until the House frame a bill in regard to the internal revenue, and then consider the two together, is simply to consign the bill to defeat. That an internal revenue bill will come to us eventually and that it will largely decrease the excise taxes, I have no doubt whatever. I agree with the honorable Senator from Missouri that from the internal taxes we may throw off a very large sum; the larger the better. The passage of this bill would enable us to throw off more than if we leave the tariff stand under the old law. The reason why the Committee of Ways and Means, if I understand it, are holding back the bill in regard to internal taxes is to enable them to judge how much internal tax they may throw off.

If, under these circumstances, it is deemed advisable to recommit this bill, I am sure I am not going to waste any more labor upon it. The chairman, as a matter of course, will have the chief responsibility upon him; but certainly it is unreasonable to ask that committee to consider this bill over again when the appropriation bills, the internal tax bill, and all the bills in regard to currency, finance, and banks have yet to be considered in the next five or six weeks of the session.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, it seems that in the view of the Senator from Ohio I have been guilty of some very inconsiderate conduct, or am likely to be guilty of some when I vote for the motion to recommit this measure to the Committee on Finance. I must confess that he is gifted with a much keener mental vision than most people if he can see any such thing.

What was the condition of this bill at the last session? Did it come before us in conjunction with an internal revenue bill? I am not aware of it, and I do not think he is. I do not think that is a fact known to members of this body. It is true, at the last session I did move to postpone this bill and it went over, or rather that which then formed the basis of this bill. The title is left, and I guess that is about pretty much all there is left, except perhaps the duty on iron and wool alone. We then went to work upon the internal revenue law. We perfected that. We reduced, in the interest of some of these iron men, the internal duty on pig iron and railroad iron. We relieved one establishment with a capital of $1,000,000, although they have a nominal capital of $2,000,000, from $225,000 of internal revenue a year, a very respectable profit, I apprehend, in the judgment of most people upon the amount of capital they had in their concern; but they are not content with that, and they come here this year and ask for this additional protection.

Now, sir, I say, as I said before, that the way to begin to legislate on these financial questions is to begin with the internal revenue law first. We are told that the House is considering such a measure as that. We know that they are. We know that it is necessary that there should be a new law on that subject passed. Some of us believe that that is the place and the only place where relief to the country will be found; and therefore we propose to begin with that law. I have simply asked that this bill—I do not care whether it be recommitted or not; postpone it if you choose—shall not be disposed of finally until the House shall have an opportunity to perfect their bill and send it to us.

The Senator says that the State of Ohio is not interested in this measure. Has not the State of Ohio some salt-works? Has it not got bituminous coal taxed at $1 50 a ton? Have you not by this bill imposed one hundred and sixty per cent. on salt? Now, for example, suppose the House shall consent to take off the internal revenue duty on salt. I undertake to say they will do it. I think I am justified in saying that the Committee of Ways and Means have already agreed to it. We have put a duty on foreign salt to the amount of one hundred and sixty per cent., and that is followed the next week by a law which takes off the entire internal duty upon the production of salt. The amount that then comes into the Federal Treasury from the customs only upon salt is just so much additional burden imposed upon the consumer. That is all there is of it; and I think that is a very good illustration to show the necessity of our beginning at that end of the line rather than undertaking to raise the impost duties in the first instance.

Mr. President, I am not as familiar with the history of this character of legislation as the Senators from Ohio or Maine; but, according to my recollection, in every instance during the last six years we have passed our internal revenue law before we passed upon the tariff law. Why should there be a deviation from that rule now?

Mr. SHERMAN. Because you made it necessary by the postponement last session.

Mr. GRIMES. I have not made it. The Senate made it. The Senate made it after due consideration. The Senate made it wisely. I think the country has pronounced a judgment upon that subject, and has said that we did act wisely. Now, I only ask that the same precedent shall be followed that has been followed in the past.

The Senator says that if this bill is recommitted to him he will not labor upon it. He will not perform his duty to the Senate and to the country and to his own State, because the judgment of the Senate may be that they are not prepared to act upon this bill now, but prefer to act upon some other bill in preference to it. Well, sir, I have no remarks to make upon the Senator's idea as to what his duty to himself or to the country may require. I have only to say that when I have a bill recommitted to me as a member of a committee I shall attempt to carry out the views of the Senate that sends it to me as far as I am able.

Mr. SHERMAN. The inconsistency in which the Senator was involved was this: at the last session of Congress a bill in relation to the internal revenue was sent to us, fully considered, and passed, and immediately upon its heels the tariff bill came to us, was brought up for consideration, and on motion of the Senator from Iowa was postponed to the present session. The very course that he now indicates was the course he then prevented. He says the Senate prevented it, but the Senate prevented it upon his motion, and it was by the same course of argument that he now makes. If we had considered this subject at the last session we might have then seen the operation of the two laws together, and we might have made the proper changes at the present session.

But he says that Ohio is interested, and that I am mistaken in saying that Ohio has no special interest in this bill. I say Ohio has not. He instanced the item of coal. Why, sir, no Ohio coal ever reaches the Atlantic coast. It is not in the interest of Ohio that the duty on coal is raised. It is in the interest of Maryland and Pennsylvania, if any. It is for the protection of their coal-fields. The coal of Ohio is consumed in the West. And so with salt. The salt boiler of Ohio does not ask any protection. All the salt that is produced in Ohio is along a single valley on the Ohio river, and is consumed in the neighborhood.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator permit me to inquire in whose interest this duty of six cents additional is imposed?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that Ohio asks no favors of that kind. The salt that is protected by this bill is the salt of New York and Michigan. No portion of the Ohio salt ever even reaches the lake shore. The Senator is not aware where the salt valley of Ohio is.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, I am.

Mr. SHERMAN. It all goes down the Ohio river, and none ever touches either the lake shore or the eastern market. It floats down along the Ohio river, and is consumed in that region of country. So that in fact the people

I represent have no particular interest in this bill except that which they share with Iowa in being the owners of flocks of sheep; and on the question of wool, the Ohio wool-grower does not ask the average rate of duty in this or any other tariff bill. The average rate of duty imposed by this bill on wool is not near equal to that imposed on almost any other article—ten cents a pound and ten per cent. ad valorem; so that on that point we have no special protection in this bill.

When I said I would not consider this matter I did not say I would disregard the will of the Senate—not at all. I simply said the Committee on Finance could not consider it, and would not because it could not; that is, could not make a reexamination of this whole subject; and why? That committee have got to consider the subject of internal taxation; they have got to consider all the appropriation bills; any bills in regard to loans and currency and debts; and surely they have enough to do without a reexamination of this question, to which they have given all the holidays and every hour of leisure which other Senators have enjoyed to their hearts' content. I simply desired to say that if the bill is referred, no new light could be thrown upon it, no new examination could be had; we could only hear the statements of interested parties. We have now all the official information we can possibly get, and the Senate can dispose of it. There is not a Senator here now but what has access to every report, every document, every information that he can reach by any possible postponement. The only object of a reference is to get information, new light. What new light can the Committee on Finance throw on this subject? None whatever.

As to the question of the postponement of the consideration of this bill, that is a question of the order of business. Everybody knows that we have but five or six weeks left of this session; and if we do not dispose of bills now in their regular order and in much less time than has been consumed in the consideration of this bill, as a matter of course a large portion of the business of the session must go over. It is to be remembered that we must pass at least fifteen or twenty important legislative bills this session before the session closes, and even the debate on this very important bill has been prolonged much longer, it seems to me, than was necessary for the consideration of the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I concur entirely with the Senator from Ohio in saying that if any movement of this sort is successful it is the end of the bill for the present session; there is no doubt about that; and therefore the Senate in voting upon it will express its opinion whether the bill ought to be passed at all or any bill on the subject of the tariff. If it is recommitted to us, in the first place we shall have to wait until the internal revenue bill shall be perfected by the Committee of Ways and Means; and I am informed that that committee is now, supposing this bill about finished, waiting to see what we do about it before acting upon that bill. Then, after that bill has been perfected and carried through the House, it must come to us and be examined by our committee, and in connection with it this tariff bill must be examined, and after all that has been done, and we have acted upon both and sent them both back again to the House, all that remains of the usual description of business is then to be done. It is perfectly obvious to everybody that the thing is utterly impossible. There is not an idea in the mind of any man who thinks a moment on the subject that it can be otherwise. My friend from Iowa unquestionably knows just as well as anybody that that is the effectual way of disposing of this bill, which he has avowed his determination to vote against, and to which he is so much opposed.

Now, sir, the only way by which we can get along by any possibility is to pass this bill as rapidly as we can—we have but very little time left—and send it to the House, and there it may be examined, if the House pleases, in connection with the internal revenue bill, which has not yet been acted upon. Then the House will have the whole subject before it, and it may modify the bill, if we send it there, in a way to suit itself, and act in accordance with that modification upon the internal revenue bill, and then send that to us. That is obviously the only mode that can be adopted which by any possibility will accomplish the object of having this bill, or one like it in any degree, and an internal revenue bill also, become laws at the present session.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall vote for this proposition in the hope that it will defeat this bill at this session; but I cannot altogether agree with the statement of the Senator from Ohio that the reference will furnish no work for the committee. This bill now is not what it was when it came from the House; it is not at all what it was when it came from the Committee on Finance into this body. Each Senator has had his particular proposition, and amendments have been made upon particular considerations; and now hardly any Senator can tell exactly what this bill is, and what may be its general effect upon the trade and business of the country; nor indeed can any of us tell how the taxes are relatively upon the different things taxed.

But my main purpose in voting for this motion is to defeat the bill. I am not in favor of the bill. I think the western country is taxed enough now. I saw a statement the other day which I believe in substance, though it may not be literally true. The statement was that the products of the western country, if carried to a market wherever in the world the best prices could be found, could be sold, and from their proceeds twice as much brought back to the people of the western States if there were no tariff as under this proposed bill. In other words, the earnings of western labor under this bill will not bring to the people of that section half as much of the comforts and necessities of life as if there were no taxation like this. As a representative of western labor I could not vote for such a bill. I would cheerfully vote for a revenue bill, and am willing reasonably to discriminate in favor of the industries that have a right to claim discrimination; but we have undertaken in this bill to protect every thing. Some minerals that a good many Senators have never heard of before have been provided for in this bill. Why, sir, it is as if we undertook almost to create minerals.

It is suggested that we shall wait to see what the House is going to do with the internal revenue system. From that intimation I understand we have got to change the internal taxes of the country. This is the fourth session that I have been in this body, and I believe at every session the revenue system of the Government has been changed, the internal revenue and the tariff. Nothing is understood to be fixed, nothing is stable any longer in this country. We give an intoxicating support to a particular industry for a while, and then we change the tax upon that, and so prices go up and come down according to the action of Congress, and Congress changes its action at every session. My opinion is that the manufacturing interests as well as the agricultural interests of this country now ask for stability more than anything else, and I cannot conceive of anything more vicious than the changing at every session of Congress of the revenue system of the Government.

It has been a remarkable spectacle that we have witnessed here for a week past. If you propose to tax a particular article the friends of that article say, "You must give us a compensation in some other direction." If you tax wool the manufacturer of woolen goods says to us, "You must tax the manufactured article from abroad so that we can pay the increased price upon the raw material and still make a profit." If you put an internal revenue tax upon any article of manufacture the producer of that article will say to us, "You must put a prohibitory tariff, at least a tariff so prohibiory as to allow us to raise our prices so that we shall lose nothing by this internal tax;" and the argument being carried into practical legislation an entire interest of the country is exempt from the burdens of Government. Take the manufacturer of woolen goods. For the protection of the farmer a duty is imposed upon wool. He says at once, "Then put an additional duty upon manufactured woolen goods," and he raises his price so as to make a profit, notwithstanding the increased price of the wool. Lay an internal tax upon the manufacturer of woolen goods, and he says at once, "Increase the tariff so as that my profits may be the same still," and in the end, according to this argument, he is to bear none of the burdens of Government.

But, Mr. President, I did not intend to go into the argument of this bill. I do not intend to discuss it now; I do not know but that it will be better that it should pass. I would like the western people to fairly feel for once this policy. They have not understood it yet; but let this bill go into operation and I think they will understand it. I can say to gentlemen that in my opinion from the day a system is firmly adopted here which taxes western labor for the benefit of another section of the country agitation will commence that will not stop until this system is swept out of existence. I think the true interest of the manufacturer is to take such protection as is reasonable, such as will be agreeable to the people of the western country, and such as will throw upon all interests of the country their fair portion of the public burdens. Why, sir, there is nothing that is not now agitated in Congress. When the negro ceases to be agitated here then comes the tariff, then come the banks, and that question is to be agitated—an abandonment of the present system of banking—until at this very hour in the country no man knows what is going to stand. The banks do not know whether they dare loan out any money to-day. They do not know but that next month they will be required to call in their credits. It seems to me it is the duty of the Finance Committee to give the country to understand that there is something settled, some one thing settled and fixed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to my friend that if he and other gentlemen will stop talking so much and making so many amendments we will settle one thing very soon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The remark of the Senator does not apply to me at all. I have offered no amendment to this bill, and this is the first time I have occupied the attention of the Senate for four minutes upon it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no particular reference to the honorable Senator.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the Senator refers to the gentlemen on his own side of the Chamber. It has not been a controversy between the Senator from Maine and Senators on this side. It has been a controversy among the various interests, and it has been a strife as to what interest can get the better share of this bill. Everybody can see that. An amendment comes from one interest, and then a corresponding or compensating amendment must come from some other interest. It has been a system of exchanges, bargain, equalization; and what there is in the bill now I doubt very much whether the Senator from Maine has a very clear understanding of himself; he had, no doubt, when the bill was reported to the Senate. I think he will find something to do in correcting all the inequalities in this bill if it should be referred to his committee, even if the bill should ever come back again.

For the interests that I represent here all that I ask is equal legislation; that when a man raises some corn or some wheat or cattle or pork in the western States he shall have some fair show in the markets of the world. I do not think this Government was established to take the profits from profitable labor to build up unprofitable labor. It is an absurdity in political economy. If agriculture in this country is naturally, and because of our condition and position, profitable, and some other pursuit is not profitable, I cannot understand the wisdom of taking the profits from agriculture and handing them over to build up a labor that is not profitable. But, sir, we need a revenue; we need to maintain the credit of the Government; and I think all the eastern interests are sufficiently protected when we have a revenue system adjusted with a view to the maintenance of the public credit.

It seems to me that the condition of the Treasury to-day ought to attract the attention of Senators. There is locked up in the Treasury to-day about ninety-three millions of gold. The tariff already established has brought into the Treasury $93,000,000 of gold that no demands upon the Treasury will send out again into the channels of trade. With a currency of eight or nine hundred million dollars, nearly one hundred millions, under your present legislation, is locked up.

Now, Senators say we must increase the tariff, because we are going to fail to meet the public obligations. Upon what statement of fact do Senators assume that? The present tariff has been in existence two years. The first year it brought into the Treasury between eighty and ninety million dollars, and during the fiscal year ending on the 30th of June it brought in $179,000,000, $90,000,000 more than during that year could be used, and $40,000,000 more than can be required the next year. And yet Senators say they are justified in the opinion that the present tariff will not meet the demands of the Government.

The Senator from Ohio asked the question, what will be the responsibility upon Congress should we not increase the tariff and should there be a failure to meet the demands upon the Treasury? Mr. President, I would rather meet that result than to have a revenue system that locks up $93,000,000 of gold in the public Treasury. I would rather see the Government strained to meet her obligations than to see her holding in her coffers one ninth of the currency of the country. We need this gold now; we need the currency now, as I think, to keep up our trade, to keep it well alive, and I cannot vote for any tariff that proposes upon the short and unsatisfactory experiment we have had of the last bill to increase it.

Mr. President, I am in favor of leaving things for a while as they are. I was not in favor of the present banking system; but it is established; it is fixed upon the country; business is being carried on under its influence, and using the currency that it furnishes; and I think it is madness at the present time to disturb it, to agitate it. I cannot agree altogether with many persons in the popular idea that we must rapidly return to a specie currency or a specie basis. I think that has to be done very gradually indeed. As a Democrat, of course I have been accustomed to the doctrine of a specie currency, and that if we have any paper currency it should be a currency that could be redeemed at any time in specie; but we all know that that is not now possible without bringing on a financial crisis; and my judgment is, that we had better for the present leave the laws as they are. I would rather vote to reduce the taxes. When I see such an excess of money above the present demands of the Government brought into the Treasury and locked up and nobody able to tell what to do with it, I would rather reduce than increase. No Senator can to-day tell us what to do with the gold that is in the Treasury. Some talk about authorizing the Secretary to sell it in New York. As soon as he does that he disturbs prices all over the country, and that is not right.

There are a great many inconveniences brought about by hasty legislation. The present condition of the Treasury, I think, is an illustration of it. Take the tax upon whisky. Everybody knows now that it is not only unjust to the interest, but it is a failure with a view to revenue. All over the country everybody believes it was an unjust tax, and therefore men will cheat the Government. We all know that if the tax was one dollar a gallon we should receive twice as much revenue as we do now; but see the difficulty! If we reduce it to one dollar, or to sixty or seventy cents, as perhaps it ought to be, then all the men in the country who are holding liquors are broken up and an entire interest destroyed, so far as the holders are concerned. I refer to this as an illustration of the difficulty of coming down after we have once raised the taxes to a high standard. We ought to be very careful about doing it. For these reasons I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I think any one who has listened to the debate on this bill will be satisfied that it is not a measure for increasing the public revenue. Whatever may be alleged generally as the opinion of some of the members of the Finance Committee, yet wherever a single item has come up for discussion, wherever any point in the bill has been subjected to criticism, it has been found that the duty laid is a duty for some other purpose and not for revenue. Is the duty on iron or steel laid for revenue?—or wool or coal or nickel? No one pretends it. The salient features of a so-called protective policy has characterized every part of the debate on this whole bill; has been the burden of every speech, the argument of every plea.

Now, sir, the amendment which is pending increasing the duty or putting rather a prohibition on the importation of hemp, might benefit some of the hemp-growers of the State that I represent. It might enable them to charge a higher price for their hemp and require the balance of the community to pay to them the impost thus indirectly levied. But, sir, because it would benefit a portion of my constituents is no reason why I should approve or sustain a species of legislation that I think wrong in principle. I shall therefore not vote even for the amendment increasing duties on hemp.

It would seem to me, sir, as if those who favor protection as a principle might be content to levy their discriminations against this or that class within the limits of a revenue tariff under the extraordinary surroundings which by virtue of internal taxes go to render its duties necessarily high. Under that disguise they might, perhaps, successfully pluck other sections for a number of years to come, and it would be difficult to expose the injustice in such wise as to force its correction by an appeal to the country. But success hitherto has emboldened the rings who find a profit in this species of legislation to clamor for still greater duties, and the result is a still further concession and a still higher tariff. The Finance Committee make a boast that they have had all these interests before them. Sir, we might have imagined that from the bill that has been reported. But they do not tell us that they have had before them any of those who are to pay these bounties on manufactures, or those who protest against this unfair and unequal legislation.

This question as it stands is in very truth a question not so much of protection as it is a question of prohibition. It is to exclude from importation, and thereby to reduce the revenue derived from the tariff; not to increase that revenue by larger collections on imports, thereby to enable us to reduce the taxes on internal productions. If there were no other reason, therefore, I should be compelled to vote against the bill on that ground alone. I think, however, there are a great many other reasons in the case.

I am perfectly familiar with the argument which has been adduced all along, that if you will only give protection to manufactures you will thereby build them up and enable them to reduce the price of these articles which they manufacture; but it is a singular characteristic of this whole scheme as now presented in national legislation that you find to-day all these manufactures, which for twenty years you have been building up, asking higher rates of duty than they did in their infancy. You find the manufactures that go into all the uses of domestic life, such as the iron manufactures, the wool manufactures, the worsteds and cottons and chemicals, asking higher rates of prohibitory duty than they have ever asked heretofore. If that is to be the result of a continuation of protection, I think the sooner we get rid of the system the better. At all events, I think it is a very conclusive argument, going to show that there is no truth in what is alleged is its general tenor and effect.

I think, sir, that a system of prohibition such as we are asked to enact here to-day is neither more nor less than a legalized plunder. It is a wrongful taking out of the pockets of one man to put in the pockets of another. It is making lawful that which every morality condemns as wrongful. It is statutory theft and pillage. That is my judgment about the whole prohibitory system. We have just emerged, Mr. President, from a long and exciting conflict, in which we have labored to get rid of one system of oppression; we have abolished slavery in so far as it relates to personal bondage; but, sir, in my opinion, the measure now before you in its principle, and to a very large extent in its applications, is neither more nor less than the incipient reestablishment of slavery in another shape. It is a slavery to capital, a servitude which will be just as onerous, just as trying to this nation, and just as productive of evil consequences to the oppressed classes and sections as ever was any other form or type of slavery.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If we get the negro into this bill we are gone.

Mr. BROWN. That may do as a retort; but, sir, if you get the white man into slavery the western farmer paying his tribute to the eastern manufacturer, and continue to clench his fetters and extort from him more and more, as seems to be now proposed, you will not end without violence either.

Now, sir, so far as this tariff bill goes, if you were to make it equal in its advantages or disadvantages to all parts of the country, if you were to equalize all these prohibitions, if you were to give anything like equipoise to the different interests in the community, the only result that you could by possibility have from it would be a general inflation of all your values, and such an inflation as would necessarily exclude all the great producing interests of the country from the markets of the world. Your high prices being altogether comparative would benefit nobody in this country, and yet would make it impossible to ship abroad and compete with grain or produce or manufactures in foreign markets. That would be the sum and substance of your whole prohibitory system, for bear in mind it is prohibitory duties that are clamored for here to-day. That, I think, is substantially the operation of the existing tariff; and the present bill, I think, so far as its duties are higher, will operate still more strongly in the same way with all the producing interests of the country. I think, therefore, that nothing can result from this measure but a more permanent inflation of prices, a reduction of revenue from custom duties, and a still further exclusion of your products from the markets of Europe and Asia.

I do not intend, Mr. President, to make any extended remarks on the details of this bill. I simply rise now to enter a protest, in the name of the constituency that I represent here, against its passage, as being an unjust and wrongful and detrimental act to them, one in which their interests are sacrificed to benefit those whose interests have long been fostered and protected, who do not require it longer, and who have no right to demand it from them if they did. Sir, the people of my State are looking to this Congress with eager eyes, asking strictest economy in the administration of your Government, and the largest possible reduction in the taxation which is now bearing so heavily upon all their business interests. But, on the contrary, what is it proposed to do? To surrender the revenues Government might derive from customs into the hands of certain large moneyed interests as bonus on their productions—for that is what prohibition comes to—and by this surrender to preclude the possibility of any important reduction in the internal taxes.

I think, Mr. President, when this bill passes and goes to the country—loaded down with the extortions practiced in the name and behalf of special interests—you will find that its advocates have not rightly calculated the patience of the people.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Kentucky that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Finance, with the instructions which have been read at the desk, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. POLAND (when his name was called) said: I desire to state that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KIRKWOOD] was obliged to go out for a moment, and I agreed to pair off with him on this question. I should have voted against this motion to recommit, and he would have voted in favor of it.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Lane, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Cresswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Yates—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cowan, Fowler, Guthrie, Howard, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, and Ross—12.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DIXON. I move to amend the amendment on page 80, section eleven, by inserting after line thirty-three the following:

On lenses for stereoscopes, one dollar per dozen pairs, and, in addition thereto, forty per cent. ad valorem.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment to the amendment, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to have a division on that question. I desire to say that that amendment is consented to by the chairman of the Finance Committee, and I believe by all interests.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not understand exactly what it was. I do not know but that it is right, but I should like to have a little explanation of it. It strikes me to be rather high. I should like to hear it read again.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. DIXON. It is precisely the same protection, indeed much less protection, than is given to lenses for spectacles. On this same page, commencing at the twenty-seventh line, there is this provision:

On lenses for spectacles, whether of glass or pebble, forty per cent. ad valorem; and, in addition thereto, for lenses ground and polished on both sides, two dollars per gross pairs.

This only asks for one dollar, and I will state that there is a large interest engaged in this manufacture which will be entirely destroyed without this protection. We only ask the same protection that is allowed to lenses for spectacles.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That clause reads:

On lenses for spectacles, whether of glass or pebble, forty per cent. ad valorem; and, in addition thereto, for lenses ground and polished on both sides, two dollars per gross pair.

I did not understand how the lenses are described in the amendment. Does that say "ground or polished on both sides?"

Mr. DIXON. These are ground and polished on both sides. We only ask one half what is allowed to lenses for spectacles.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is it so described in the amendment?

Mr. DIXON. I do not recollect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let the Senator correct the description.

Mr. DIXON. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment again.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. DIXON. I understand that these lenses require to be ground on both sides. At any rate, there is a great deal of work upon them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is a difference. It is fixed at two dollars per gross pairs on lenses for spectacles. This amendment should read "gross pairs," and the description should be changed. If the Senator will make it read, "on lenses for stereoscopes, forty per cent. ad valorem, and, in addition thereto, for lenses ground and polished on both sides, one dollar per gross pairs," I will not object to it.

Mr. DIXON. Very well; I ask the Clerk to make that alteration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so modified, and the question is on the amendment as modified, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

On lenses for stereoscopes, one dollar per gross pairs, and, in addition thereto, forty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not right. It should read:

On lenses for stereoscopes, forty per cent. ad valorem, and, in addition thereto, for lenses for stereoscopes ground and polished on both sides, one dollar per gross pairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so modified.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the bill on page 93, by inserting at the end of section fifteen as a new line the following:

On barley, twenty cents per bushel.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will see that barley is already in.

Mr. GRIMES. I am aware of the condition it is in. On page 89 there is a clause which reads:

On barley, not including pearl or hulled, fifteen cents per bushel.

That was the way the committee reported it to the Senate, but if I am not mistaken it has been amended since it came to the Senate by striking down the duty from fifteen cents to ten cents. How is that, Mr. Secretary? I wish the Secretary to read lines thirteen and fourteen of section fifteen, page 89, as they now stand.

The SECRETARY. These lines as they have been amended read:

On barley, not including pearl or hulled, ten cents per bushel.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a mistake.

Mr. GRIMES. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that it is a very great mistake to reduce it from fifteen to ten cents, and I think it is a greater mistake still not to raise it from ten cents up to twenty. As I understand it this bill is intended to promote the interests of all sections of the country, the laborer and the agriculturist as well as the manufacturer and the commercial man. It will be observed by reference to the bill that the agriculturist who raises barley if he imports his machinery from abroad, his rakes, his hoes, his reapers, and his plows, must pay thirty-five per cent. ad valorem on the value of the articles, and if he makes them himself he must pay the enormous duties that we impose upon iron and steel. But if the Canadian farmer or the farmer in any of the British Provinces who raises the same description of barley, which he sends into the American market to compete with our barley, chooses to come over into Massachusetts or Vermont to procure his agricultural implements, there is a drawback under the bill of the whole amount of duty that has been paid for the iron and steel that enter into the manufacture of those implements. There is therefore just that extent of advantage given to the farmer in the British Provinces who produces barley against the American farmer on this side of the line.

This is an article that is produced to a very considerable extent in the northern States of the Northwest, in the State in which I live, in Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin, and I cannot conceive of any possible argument that can be urged against this amendment, unless it be one which might be considered perhaps a very sound one in the mouths of temperance men, that according to the theory of this bill it will so enormously increase the production of barley that it will render malt and beer so cheap that it may have a demoralizing tendency upon the character of our population. That can be the only possible argument I think which the Senator from Maine can urge against raising this duty from ten cents to twenty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not suppose it makes any difference in point of fact whether this duty be ten cents or twenty cents; the effect on the farmer will be the same; but in order to take the argument out of the mouth of the Senator at home in regard to this bill I will make no objection to this amendment. Let him have it fixed at twenty cents, and I hope we shall hear no more about barley.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I presume now that we shall hear no more from the honorable Senator from Iowa as to the selfishness of certain persons who represent particular local interests in trying to incorporate into this bill legislation favorable to their particular interests. I find that the honorable Senator in that respect is very much like other Senators here. When he supposes that any portion of the bill touches the local interests which he represents, he, like others, is anxious to have the protection increased. I simply wish to say that hereafter when this objection is made to propositions of a like nature I shall plead estoppel upon the honorable Senator and claim that if this particular interest, in which he says his State is concerned so deeply, is to be so largely protected, other interests must have a corresponding protection.

So far as I am concerned I object to the increase of this duty upon barley. I think fifteen cents per bushel is as much as can be reasonably demanded. I have heard no complaints that the duty is not sufficiently large; and the article is one that is used extensively in the United States in brewing. There is a vast amount of capital invested in the business of brewing, and there is a market at good prices for all the barley that is raised in the United States. So far as I know there is no necessity, to promote the interests of the farmer, that this tax should be added to the price of barley, and it is absolutely necessary that importations of this article should be made in order to carry on the business of brewing in the country. I object to the increase.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator does not seem to understand what the bill is as it now stands. This duty instead of being fifteen cents as he seems to suppose is put at ten cents a bushel.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It has been changed without my knowledge or consent.

Mr. GRIMES. The change was made on the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I trust the Senator from Oregon has relieved his mind on the subject of my selfishness. All I have to say is that I propose to make this bill as little incongruous as possible, even if I do not vote for it; and because I propose to raise up the duty on wheat or barley or some other agricultural product that may be stricken down by the bill to something like an equality with, or to the level of, the protection given to the manufacturing interest, I do not know that I am to be charged with any peculiar selfishness. There is not a bushel of barley that will find its way from the State of Iowa to an eastern market, but this will be for the interest of other agricultural portions of the country where it may be raised.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that he had better leave this item in the place where it is in the bill, according to its alphabetical order. The committee proposed fifteen cents a bushel; if it is now put at ten cents there must be some mistake.

Mr. GRIMES. Very well; I am content to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty" at that place.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was put at fifteen cents because that is the same rate at which other agricultural productions are put. Barley is cheaper than wheat.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not content with the rate fixed on wheat. I want to raise that also, and I trust I shall have the cooperation of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SHERMAN. If really the Senator from Iowa is afraid that the wheat and barley raised in Iowa and Ohio cannot compete with wheat and barley raised in other parts of the world, I am willing to give them the protection he desires.

Mr. GRIMES. I do really think that under this bill, when you give the agriculturist across the line in the British Provinces a drawback upon all that has been expended under the bill for the iron and steel that go into the composition of his agricultural implements we are not capable of competing with the men who have that advantage over us to the extent that they may raise agricultural products. If the Senate will recur to the twenty-first section of this bill they will see that it provides—

That, from and after the 1st day of April, 1867, there shall be allowed on the following articles, when exported, a drawback equal to the amount of duty paid on the imported materials used in the manufacture thereof, less five per cent. on the amount of such drawback, which shall be retained for the use of the United States, and such drawback shall be ascertained in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, namely: on mowing-machines, reaping-machines, plows, axes, hatchets, scythes, cotton-gins, shovels, spades, hoes, hay and manure forks, chisels, augers, and carpenters' tools.

It includes everything they want—the tools with which they erect a house, the tools with which they plow the ground and cultivate their crops. They have that advantage over us, and surely we on this side of the line should have some protection. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to hear the amendment read as it now stands.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed in line thirteen of section fifteen, page 89, to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

On barley, not including pearl or hulled, twenty cents per bushel.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Conness, Creswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Norton, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cattell, Cragin, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Morgan, Patterson, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Williams—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Guthrie, Howard, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ross, and Van Winkle—19.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. There is one injustice in this bill to which I wish to ask the attention of the Senate; and that I may bring the Senate precisely to the point I shall move on page 85, line twenty-three of section thirteen, to strike out "$1 50" and insert "fifty cents."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That whole clause has been stricken out and a new one inserted. All the words from line seventeen to line twenty-four have been stricken out.

Mr. SUMNER. Let the Secretary read the clause that has been inserted.

The SECRETARY. On page 84, lines seventeen, eighteen, nineteen, twenty, twenty-one, twenty-two, twenty-three, and twenty-four of section thirteen were stricken out, and in lieu thereof these words were inserted:

On candle or cannel coal, and on all bituminous coal, $1 50 per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to bring back the provision to where it was before that amendment. I therefore move to insert what in the original bill is lines twenty-one, twenty-two, twenty-three, and twenty-four, as follows:

On all bituminous coal, mined and imported from any place not more than thirty degrees of longitude east of Washington, fifty cents per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member will permit me to suggest that his object will be accomplished by refusing to concur in that amendment made in committee; if the amendment be not concurred in, the bill will stand as reported in that respect.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that the question is upon concurrence with the amendment made in committee?

Mr. JOHNSON. It has not been concurred in that I know of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, in the opinion of the Chair, is in order: he moves to strike out and insert.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt of that; I only wanted to save some trouble.

Mr. SUMNER. But there is another way to get at it, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, and that would be not to concur in that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question does not arise on that identical amendment, because it was an amendment to an amendment. The amendment to be concurred in is all one amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Then, in order to make the proposition perfectly clear, I simply move now to insert lines twenty-one, twenty-two, twenty-three, and twenty-four of this section as they stand in the printed bill; and if this amendment be adopted, the other clause can be made to conform to it.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

On all bituminous coal, mined and imported from any place not more than thirty degrees of longitude east of Washington, fifty cents per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel.

Mr. SUMNER. The object of the amendment is to bring the bill back to where it was at first. The Senate will remember that in committee a motion prevailed by which the duty of fifty cents per ton on the coal mentioned was raised to $1 50. I am at a loss to understand the precise object of this increased tax on coal. There are strong reasons against any tax on coal; and the reasons are stronger still against this increased tax. Its movers must have an object. What is it?

It seems that there are imported into the United States about five hundred thousand tons, being three hundred and fifty thousand tons from the British Provinces and one hundred and fifty thousand tons from Great Britain. And this coal it is proposed to tax at the rate of $1 50 a ton in gold. If this same amount of importation continued, this tax would yield $750,000 in gold—a handsome addition to the revenue. But I am sure the tax is not imposed on this account. It is imposed, of course, with some vague hope of benefit to the coal interest. But here, as we look at it, we are mystified. Is it supposed that the price of coal throughout the country will be raised to this extent? The idea is monstrous. There are some twenty-two million tons now produced, which if raised in price according to this tax will cost the country thirty-three million gold dollars in addition to the present price. This might be advantageous to certain proprietors but it would be damaging to the country. Nobody can expect this. The object, then, is something else. I will not say that it is merely to take advantage of the States that do not produce coal, for this would be sheer oppression. I suppose that it must be to exclude foreign coal, and thus open to that extent the market to domestic coal.

But this tax will be positively oppressive to coal purchasers in New England, to say nothing of New York. Nature has denied coal to this region of country, or rather nature has placed the natural supply for this region outside of our political jurisdiction. It is in Nova Scotia, on the other side of our boundary line. Coal in abundance is there, easily accessible by water, and therefore transported comparatively cheap. But there is another part of our country which has a different supply. On the other side of the mountain ridge which separates the sea-coast from the valleys of the West, is an infinite coal-field, the source of untold wealth, which, beginning in the mountains and filling West Virginia and western Pennsylvania stretches through the valley of the Ohio, enriching the States that border upon it, and then crossing the Mississippi stretches through other States beyond, even to Colorado. This is the greatest coal-field, as it is also the greatest corn-field in the world. It is magnificent beyond comparison. This is the natural resource for the immense region west of the Alleghanies. But why should New England, which has a natural resource comparatively near at home, be compelled at a great sacrifice to drag her coal from these distant supplies? The supplies are bountiful, and we share in the wealth which they contribute to the whole country.

I hear that at Pittsburg people complain of the price of coal when they pay only two dollars a ton currency. But imported coal in New England costs at the mine two dollars a ton in gold. Add to this three or four dollars a ton for freight. And now it is proposed to pile on this duty of more than two dollars currency. If the people of Pittsburg complain of coal at two dollars a ton, what must the people of Boston say when you make it nine dollars? Is this just? Is it practically wise? But I forget, there can be no wisdom without justice.

If it be said that the interests of New England are protected even by the bill before the Senate, I have to say in reply that no interest of hers is protected at the expense of the rest of the country. All that we ask is fair play. Let it be shown that there is any part of the country which will suffer from the favor you accord to New England to the extent that her coal purchasers must suffer from the favor you accord to the distant coal-owners of the mountains, and I will do what I can to see justice done. I ask nothing but that justice which I am always willing to accord. We constitute parts of one country with common interests, and the prosperity of each is bound up in the prosperity of all.

It is said that this proposed tax will be of advantage to the Cumberland coal in the mountains of Maryland. Perhaps; but not to any considerable extent. I understand that not more than sixty thousand tons of Nova Scotia coal are imported in competition with that of Cumberland. This is mainly at Providence, where it is used in the manufacture of iron. But the Cumberland coal is so completely adapted to glass-works, railways, ocean steamships, blacksmiths' forges, that it may be said to command the market exclusively. Nature has given to it this monopoly. Why not be content?

There are peculiar reasons why coal should be cheap, whether viewed as a necessary or as a motive power. As a necessary it enters into the comforts of life. As a motive power it is the substitute for water-power. What reason can you give for a tax on the motive power from coal which is not equally strong for a tax on the motive power from water, unless it be that one is "black" and the other is "white"? But I plead that you shall not needlessly add to the public burden in a particular portion of the country. I have already alluded to the cheapness of coal at Pittsburg. In other places it is cheaper still. At Pomeroy, in Ohio, it is $1 40 a ton; and at Cumberland itself it is $1 50 a ton; always in currency. And yet New England is to pay $1 50 tax in gold, being more than the coal is worth to its producer, besides the large cost of transportation.

Next after the industry of a people is cheap coal as an element of national prosperity. Without it even industry will lose much of its activity and variety. It is coal which has vitalized and quickened all the mighty energies of England. From coal have come all the various products of her manufactories, and these again have furnished the freights for her ships, so that she has become not only a great manufacturing nation, but also a great commercial nation. Coal is the author of all this. Coal is the fuel under the British pot which makes it boil. It ought to do the same for us, and even more if you will let it. Therefore I end as I began: tax coal as little as possible.

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment suggested by my friend from Massachusetts, if I understand it, is to reinstate in the bill what was stricken out in committee. That is to say, it is to impose a tax upon all coal imported from beyond a certain point of $1 50, and a tax of only fifty cents on all that shall be imported from this side of that point. I understood the honorable member from Massachusetts to tell us—and he will set me right if I am wrong—that there are about five hundred thousand tons of coal imported.

Mr. SUMNER. So I understand.

Mr. JOHNSON. One hundred and fifty thousand tons of that he says are imported from a point outside of the line which he has designated. The other is imported from this side of that line. If he succeeds in persuading the Senate to reduce the tax determined upon in committee to fifty cents he will reduce the revenue, provided the coal can be imported, some three hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, so that the honorable member is wrong in supposing that the tax of $1 50 is not a tax that will bring additional revenue into the Treasury.

Now, I understand the honorable member to say that the proposed tax of $1 50 upon coal imported from Nova Scotia, which by the line that he proposes to adopt will be included within this side of that line, will be an enormous and an unjust tax upon the poor of New England. He does not propose to take care of the poor anywhere else; he is very willing to leave the tax of $1 50 upon the coal to be imported from Europe, and he is willing to do that because that coal is not imported into New England; it goes to New York or the ports south of New York, and if the duty on it operates at all to the prejudice of the poor it is to the poor of New York and the poor elsewhere than in New England. So that the very enlarged view that my friend takes of what should be the philanthropy and charity of the Government is confined entirely to the poor of New England.

I do not know that what I am about to state is true, but I rather suspect it is true. A tax of fifty cents is to operate to the benefit of the New England manufacturers as well as the New England man who uses Nova Scotia coal in his own fireplace. To that extent, therefore, New England is benefited to the prejudice of the rest of the country who have to use, if they use imported coal, coal imported at a revenue tax of $1 50. But New England may be very materially benefited from another consideration. If her citizens own the Nova Scotia mines in whole or in part, as I have heard is the fact, then they are benefited by having the exclusive market for the coal. Then coal sells at any price they may think proper to charge for it less than the price at which Cumberland or any other bituminous coal can be purchased. New England is benefited therefore to the extent that her manufactures are benefited by the cheap fuel, while some of her citizens are also benefited as the owners of the Nova Scotia coal.

Now, sir, I say in great sincerity to the honorable member from Massachusetts that I am as far from desiring to legislate either now or at any time to the prejudice of New England as he himself. I have a very sincere reverence for New England. It is unnecessary to say why. The reasons are to be found in the history of the country, and they are sufficient as I think to challenge for her the admiration and the respect and the gratitude of all the rest of the people of the United States; but while she is seeking to take care of herself she ought to be magnanimous enough to look to the interests of her fellow-citizens elsewhere.

This tariff system—I hope my friend from Maine will indulge me for a moment in saying a word on the general subject—was forced upon New England by southern votes, but she has availed herself most enterprisingly and most wisely of the system, and she has grown rich (although she protested against it) in consequence of the system. At any rate, she has not grown poorer than her neighbors because of the system; she has gone on to prosper about as rapidly as any of the people of the neighboring States. What has built up the large and valuable manufactories of New England? Were they not brought into existence and are they not now kept in existence by means of a protective tariff? Frequently a tariff protective upon its face and designed to be protective; at other times a tariff incidentally protective because of the revenue derived from the tax itself.

Now, what does she ask us to do in Maryland and New York and elsewhere? We have in Maryland mines inexhaustible in supply, but at a distance from the sea-board of some three hundred miles. We have to get the material to the sea-board to supply the wants of the whole community. Maryland has been obliged to construct a railroad from Baltimore to the mines, and she has almost entirely—for there was very little aid obtained elsewhere in the construction of the canal—constructed the Chesapeake and Ohio canal. The investment in the latter, the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, has never yielded her one dollar, and perhaps never will. The investment in the railroad for years and years did not give her a dollar. It is now becoming a remunerative enterprise. But the coal never could have been brought to market except by means of the railroad, and we are able to get now to the sea-board coal at a price of some four or five dollars. The present toll upon coal on the railroad may be for aught I know too high; but notwithstanding the toll and the expense of taking it to market it can be sold for some five or six dollars in Baltimore, and sold in Boston after awhile for some seven or eight dollars.

Now, why does my friend object to our having the protection which this duty will afford us as against Nova Scotia coal? Why, to put it in another form; do we legislate in reference to a foreign Government territorially? Is such a thing done anywhere by any other Government? "Bring your coal from Europe," says my friend's amendment, "and we will charge you $1 50; but we choose to protect your territory, your Provinces, and if you will bring it from your territories or your Provinces we will charge you only fifty cents." Suppose the New England people did not own Nova Scotia coal, would they think of discriminating against the proprietors of coal mines in Europe by making them (although the expense of bringing the commodity to market is five or ten times as great as that of bringing the commodity to market from Nova Scotia) pay $1 50, and only charge the Nova Scotia coal fifty cents? I am satisfied they would not, and such a thing never has been done anywhere.

The only reason that can be assigned for describing the line as the honorable member's amendment does is because it includes the Nova Scotia mines, in which many of his constituents are interested as owners. I have every reason to believe that the honorable member will not contradict me in that particular; and the rest of them who are not interested as owners are interested as the owners of the factories.

Then, Mr. President, if he is right in his statistics, if you reduce the tax from $1 50 to fifty cents you lessen the revenue between three and four hundred thousand dollars, and while you are lessening the revenue to the amount of three or four hundred thousand dollars you are striking a blow more or less serious upon the domestic interests of our own country.

Mr. SUMNER. I moved the amendment as I did when informed, as I was for the first time after I rose, that the clause which I moved to insert had been stricken out. I had been told by a member of the committee that the second clause had been preserved, and therefore had I simply moved, as I proposed, to substitute "fifty cents" for "$1 50" in that clause, I should have accomplished all my purpose. Understanding, however, that the clause itself was stricken out, I then, in order to bring the question before the Senate, moved to restore the clause; but I think I can bring the question still more closely to the Senate, and as that amendment is entirely within my own power I shall withdraw it, and move to substitute in the clause which has been adopted by the Senate "fifty cents" for "$1 50," so that the tax on all imported coal shall be fifty cents.

Mr. JOHNSON. That will reduce the revenue a great deal more.

Mr. SUMNER. No, I think very likely it would increase the revenue. I do not go, however, into that calculation. I have not the details. I have not the statistics. By that change in my amendment I meet precisely three quarters of the speech of the Senator from Maryland; I eliminate all that he has said with regard to coal imported from Great Britain and the partialities that I am supposed to show for New England in comparison with New York. I make the proposition general: I ask that all imported coal shall come in at fifty cents a ton; in other words, that the proposed tax shall be reduced from $1 50 to fifty cents.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to say to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that I think he will hardly be so likely to accomplish his object by doing that as he would by his first proposition. I shall feel bound, as chairman of the committee reporting the bill and reporting the conclusion of the committee, to vote against the motion myself, although I should desire to have a fifty-cent duty on Nova Scotia coal, and I think it is enough and would not interfere with anybody; but if the Senator makes his amendment general, so as to put me in the situation of voting against the conclusion the committee came to, I shall be obliged to separate from him on this question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply rise to express the hope that the friends of this bill will not give the enemies of it the right to make the allegation that my honorable friend from Missouri did awhile ago, that when we come to an article that yields us a handsome revenue we throw that away and abandon the idea of protection. There are four or five articles in the tariff list on which we propose to throw off revenue, and one of these is the article of coal. We now get a duty of $1 25 per ton, and the Senator from Massachusetts says we imported five hundred thousand tons last year. He states it too strongly, I think.

Mr. SUMNER. I am so informed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Taking it at his own measurement, then, the Senator proposes that we should surrender $625,000; or, if we reduce the duty to fifty cents, $375,000. If we do that on the article of coal, and then on the article of scrap iron throw off about one hundred thousand dollars, and go on in that way with regard to various articles which are consumed wholly in the East, along the coast, we shall subject this tariff bill to the very objections already made against it by western Senators.

I preferred to keep the duty on coal at $1 25, but in voting for the proposition of the Senator from Maryland to fix it at $1 50 my motive was simply to secure the revenue derived from the article. The United States possess more coal than is possessed in all the continent of America besides. The United States contain more coal than is contained in all Europe, and our coal is finer than any in the world, our anthracite being unsurpassed anywhere. If, therefore, there is any article that ought not to be imported into this country it is the article of coal, because we have the raw article in unbounded extent, it is quarried out by our own miners, thus giving employment to a class of hardy and adventurous laborers; we employ in its transportation our own railroads and canals, thus supplying our internal improvements; and our ships carry every ton of coal that is transported along the sea-coast from one port of the country to another; so that every item in the price of coal in Boston is American labor; and hence if there is any article to which the doctrine of protection ought to apply it is coal.

Now, you propose to surrender the revenue derived from coal under the tariff, upon the principle that cheap coal would be advantageous to New England. Then you surrender the whole argument. If it is important to have cheap coal in New England, is it not important to us in Ohio to have cheap iron? Is it not important to us to have cheap cloth? Is it not important to us to clothe all the poor people with the coarse jeans that are necessary for their comfort? Is it not necessary to reduce the price of the commodities which enter into our consumption? Are not food and clothing and all those articles which we purchase as important to us as coal is to New England?

I think Senators ought to apply the principle logically. I believe I have not in any case voted to reduce the duty on any article that now yields a revenue, and I think I shall not do so. I consented originally, at the urgent request of several others, to waive it on coal to a certain extent; but, on consideration, I think that if we waive it on so important an article of revenue as coal, we shall subject this bill to the criticism that has already been very forcibly made against it, and we shall probably lead to its defeat, because we cannot surrender the revenue derived from these various sources without endangering the passage of the bill; and certainly the revenue consideration is the only reason I have for supporting the measure.

I shall vote, therefore, for a reasonable duty on coal. Now, a duty of $1 25 a ton, although it appears to be high, is only about thirty per cent., and therefore a less rate of duty than is imposed on many other articles. The value of Cumberland coal in the mountains, I suppose, is not more than two dollars a ton; but when brought to market at Baltimore it is worth five or six dollars, I presume, so that a duty of $1 25 is only about twenty-five per cent. on the article in the market. It is at the lowest revenue rate. It seems to me that to throw off this duty or to reduce it to fifty cents a ton, which is only ten per cent. on the market value, when the article yields $625,000 according to the Senator from Massachusetts, is going too far.

Mr. SUMNER. I am obliged to the Senator from Ohio for the speech he has interpolated into the remarks I was making.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. SUMNER. I am obliged to the Senator. I always listen to him with pleasure. He knows that. He has certainly shed light on the discussion now. But he will allow me to call him back to the precise point. The Senator says we should lose a revenue. Are we not now disposed to reduce the taxation of the country? Is not that an urgent need? Is not that a call that we have from all quarters? You have listened to-day to a proposition from the Senator from Kentucky to instruct the committee to reduce the taxation $100,000,000. Now, without following the Senator from Kentucky in that proposition, I do insist that, where we can, on articles of prime necessity, we should reduce taxation. Therefore when the Senator from Ohio tells me that if my proposition is adopted we shall lose a certain amount of revenue derived from coal, I have an easy reply. Very well, let us lose that amount of revenue derived from coal; you ought not to obtain it; coal ought not to be one of your taxed articles. So far as possible coal should be cheap. That is the proposition with which I began and ended; and if I do not impress that upon the Senate I certainly fail in what I attempted.

Mr. GRIMES. Why should it be cheap?

Mr. SUMNER. Because it enters into the necessities of life, and because it is a motive power that works our manufactories.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to inquire how much of this Pictou coal is used for any other purpose than manufacturing purposes and for making gas? Is it ever used at all for fuel?

Mr. SUMNER. I think it is.

Mr. CRESWELL. The Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] the other day based his entire argument on the supposition that Cumberland coal could not come in competition with Pictou coal, for the reason that the latter was used exclusively for gas and the other was not fitted for that use. Now, sir, let us have the argument in some shape consistent.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well, I give you the argument in the shape in which I use it. I say that the article is necessary to us in New England. It enters into our daily life; it enters into the economies of every house; it enters into the expenses of every citizen. It enters, therefore, into the welfare of the community, and you cannot tax that coal without making the whole community feel it, whether rich or poor. Every poor man feels it. If I said the rich man felt it, you would reply, "That makes no difference, let him feel it." I insist that every poor man feels it, and I insist still further that all who are interested in the manufactures, of the country necessarily feel it, not only the producers and the owners of the manufactories but all who use the products of their looms. I say that as a motive power it ought to be made cheap and to be kept cheap. Now the policy seems to be to make it dear and keep it dear.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I like the Senator's argument just where he is now; but I wish to ask him whether, if by a tariff you raise the price of every yard of cheap woolen goods and cheap cotton goods, it is not a direct tax on the labor of the poor man of the West who has to buy them?

Mr. CRESWELL, [to Mr. SUMNER.] That is the application of your argument.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Maryland says that is the application of my argument. Pardon me, not at all; because the tax that is imposed on cotton and on woolen goods, though on that I say nothing—I have had very little to do with imposing any such tax—is not oppressive on any part of the country, it does not bear hard on the constituents of the Senator nor on the constituents of any Senator on this floor, whereas the proposition now under consideration, the increase of the tax on coal, will bear hard upon a whole community and upon all its interests; and that is the precise difference between the two cases.

The Senator from Ohio seemed to speak of this with perfect tranquility, as if there was nothing in it oppressive or even open to criticism. He thought we might tax coal as we tax any other article. I differ from him on that proposition. I do not think you should tax coal as you tax other articles, and I further do not think you should impose any tax which bears with special hardship, so as to be something akin to injustice, on any particular part of our country. That is my answer to the arguments that have been put forth by the Senator from Maryland and to the inquiry of the Senator from Indiana. And now I come back—

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if there is any difference in the uses made of the coal which is brought from beyond the thirtieth degree of longitude and that which is brought from within that degree?

Mr. SUMNER. I am not aware that there is any difference. I think that the two coals are very much alike.

Mr. FOWLER. Do I understand the proposition to be to put all down to fifty cents?

Mr. SUMNER. I am coming to that now. When the Senator interrupted me I said that I would now ask attention to the form of the proposition. When I made my motion a little while ago I moved to restore a certain clause which had been struck out. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] objected to that on the ground of the discrimination it would introduce between what we will call Nova Scotia coal and British coal. To meet that argument, and at the suggestion of those who were interested in the question, I proposed to modify my amendment. I should prefer the amendment in the modified form, as I should prefer to have all coals as cheap as possible; but the Senator from Maine, who is chairman of the Committee on Finance, having the subject specially in charge, objects to that proposition. He says that it cannot have his support; he does not think so favorably of it as of the proposition that I first presented. I shall, therefore, without hesitation, go back to the proposition I first presented, for I wish to unite upon it as many votes as possible. I do not wish by broadening it to throw off any support which it might naturally have. I therefore shall renew that proposition and shall leave open the question after the Senate has acted upon that proposition, what shall be done with coals coming from east of the line of thirty degrees of longitude.

And now one word as to the discrimination between those two coals. I understand that we derive that from what I may call the traditional policy of the country for ten or fifteen years certainly, beginning with the reciprocity treaty. By the reciprocity treaty the other coal came in free, and it was then arranged that the English coal should be taxed $1 50. If that tax should be left in the bill we should only continue the traditional policy of the Government. What I desire now is to have a vote of the Senate with regard to what we will call the Nova Scotia coal; the coal trade with the British Provinces which is this side of the line of thirty degrees of longitude, east of Washington, and therefore I will move to restore the clause that was stricken out on page 85, being lines twenty-one, twenty-two, twenty-three, and twenty-four, the effect of which will be that all coal from any place not more than thirty degrees of longitude east of Washington will come in at fifty cents a ton duty.

Mr. CRAGIN. When this question was before the Senate a day or two since on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] I voted for the amendment to place the duty upon this coal at $1 50, the same duty as that provided in the bill for coals from Europe. For one I could see no good reason why coal coming from New Brunswick or Nova Scotia should pay a less duty than coal coming from Great Britain of the same description and precisely alike. Being the only Senator in this Chamber from New England, I believe, who voted for that amendment, I desire to make this statement. I yield to no man on this floor in my love for New England or my desire to promote her substantial interests; but I remember that there is an impression abroad in this country that the people are greatly taxed for support of New England interests and New England manufactures; and as a New England man I do not believe that it is for our interest as a whole that we should single out one article, like this coal coming from Nova Scotia, and make a difference in favor of that section of country. As a man interested in New England and its prosperity I believe such legislation is injurious to our interests.

I agree that coal is an essential article for manufacturing purposes and for fuel, and I should be glad if it could be furnished cheap to all the people of this country; but our necessities require that certain taxes should be raised; and if it is the policy to tax coal coming from beyond thirty degrees of longitude east of Washington $1 50 a ton, then I shall adhere to my vote on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland and vote to place the coals of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in precisely the same category.

My impression, Mr. President, is that the owners of the coal mines in Nova Scotia are more interested in this proposition than the consumers of that coal. I am not aware that my constituents to any considerable extent have any interest in these mines in Nova Scotia; but I know that there are gentlemen in Massachusetts who are interested in these mines, and who have already made large fortunes out of the working of these mines and the sale of the products. Sir, I am in favor so far as possible of equal legislation upon this subject, not class legislation, not legislating specially for any one interest, but for the whole country; and let us not make any discrimination in this direction. I believe that New England's interests will be safe if we are judicious and prudent in our legislation; but if we attempt to grasp too much, if we seek to confirm this impression, which I think is not correct, that our interests are being provided for unduly, we may in the end lose. Therefore, I think that in my vote the other day and the one I shall cast to-day I vote for the substantial interests of New England.

Mr. CRESWELL. This question was so fully discussed the other day that I do not deem it necessary to enter into any complicated investigation of the figures as applicable to the amount of importations and the amount of revenue. It is sufficient, I think, to say, as the Senator from Ohio said in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, that the proposition cannot certainly in any light be regarded as a measure for revenue, because by the admission made by the Senator from Massachusetts, there being an importation of five hundred thousand tons, under the present rate of duty the amount derived would be $625,000. Now, sir, one of two things is true: either the gentleman expects that the revenue will be diminished, or else he expects that the importation will be greatly increased. Take either horn of the dilemma and he must abandon one or the other of the arguments which he makes, because in the first place he must no longer contend that it is with a view to revenue, or in the next place he must cease to insist upon the bill remaining as he designs it shall because of the small amount of importations into New England when the very expectation entertained is that the importation shall be increased four or five fold. It fell with great pertinency from the Senator from New Hampshire when he said just now that this controversy was not as between the consumer and producer, but between different producers, and any gentleman who will review the history of this measure cannot but be led conclusively to that opinion.

This measure started in the other House in the custody of this Nova Scotia interest; and the fact is that they were not content merely to insist that coal should be imported from a line west of the thirtieth meridian at a low duty, but in order to increase their profits they actually increased the rate of duty upon coal to be imported from any port east of that meridian. Who asked for that increase? Was it the coal interest of Maryland or the coal interest of West Virginia or the coal interest of Pennsylvania? Was it any coal interest in this country? No, sir; that addition was made to this tariff, started in the other House, in the interest of these Nova Scotia operators and with a view to give them an opportunity to charge an additional price for the coal they might import into New England.

How was it when the bill came to this House with the provision making the distinction by a geographical line stricken out and with a rate of duty on this article the same that we now ask for, namely, $1 50 a ton? This same interest went before the Finance Committee, and they were not content there to have the duty remain as the entire coal interest of this country was content it should be, at $1 25 a ton; but in order to increase their profits, in order to give them an opportunity to charge an enhanced price in the ports of New England, they again interpolated the same clause into the bill, and provided that there should be an increase in the rate of duty charged upon coals coming from any point east of the thirtieth meridian of longitude.

Are there any petitions before this body, or were there any before the other House, asking that Nova Scotia coal shall be imported free of duty for the reason that the consumers are affected? I ask if there has been before the Finance Committee of either House of Congress one solitary man in the interest of the consumer asking that this Nova Scotia coal shall be admitted free of duty, or at the low rate proposed? If so, I wish some member of the committee would inform me of the fact. I have not heard a word of that kind. It is only when gentlemen find themselves driven to the wall that they change their ground.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts has treated us to a free-trade speech in the Senate of the United States. The commentary of the Senator from Indiana was just and correct; it was a deduction that he had a right logically to make; and I tell the Senator from Massachusetts that his course in the Senate to-day is in its effects a better free-trade speech than has ever been made in any of the middle States during the last ten years. "Cheap coal" is the Senator's cry. Why not "cheap woolen goods?" Why not "cheap cotton goods?" I have in my hand a statement showing the advance made in this tariff bill upon cotton goods, the rate of duty being from fifty-four to thirty-nine per cent. upon everything; and yet they cannot allow us a duty of $1 25 on coal because they use it in their manufactures! And that is the whole story.

Sir, I have honored New England; I have looked to New England, during at least portions of my life, for lessons upon political economy; but I wish to tell the Senator from Massachusetts that if I am to regard his teachings logically I shall no longer look to him for any lessons on that subject. I must abandon him, because his position neither he nor any living man can maintain before the people of this country. If this is to be the course of New England, if this is to be the system she is to give us, dear upon everything that we consume, cheap upon everything that we produce and she consumes; if this is to be her teaching, the Senator has satisfied me and every man in the coal-producing regions that New England manufactures shall also be cheap, or else that they shall not compete with foreign manufactures. That is the whole case.

The question then is, shall the home producer of coal be protected, or shall these gentlemen speculators—I do not use the word in any offensive sense, for I know that pretty much everybody is anxious to make all that he can out of his money—shall these operators who have left New England, carried their capital into Nova Scotia, invested it upon such terms as they deemed profitable when the reciprocity treaty was in force, produce the coal? Or shall the men who remained at home in our own country with their capital, subject to all the taxation which it is necessary now to impose with a view to protect the credit and interests of this Government, have the benefit of this protection? If our policy is to be to take coal from the foreign producer let us vote down this bill; all the time we are expending on it is futile, and the only question we should consider is the question of revenue, and there is the end of the whole matter; and if it is not free trade, it is to be tariff only for the sake of revenue; no discrimination for protection.

Sir, I am not jealous of New England. I have no disposition in any way to restrict any industrial interest in New England. On the contrary, it has been the study of my life, so far as I have been able to carry it into effect, to promote the interests of New England and every other industrial interest in the country. Upon that position I stand to-day, and upon that position I consider that my argument is the only consistent and the only proper one.

I made a remark the other day to which I did not intend to allude again in regard to the operation of the reciprocity treaty and the purposes for which it was made, but the Senator from Maine took exception to it and said he was here in the Senate at the time that treaty was made, and that he perhaps understood all about the treaty and the purposes for which it was made as well as any gentleman who was then in the Senate. I do not doubt it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not say any such thing; I beg pardon of my honorable friend. He quoted from the present chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House something that he had said about the motives which led to the adoption of the reciprocity treaty. I said that I was a member of the Senate at that time, and he was not a member of the House then; and I thought I knew as much of the motives that influenced the adoption of that treaty as he did. I did not say "as much as any member of the Senate."

Mr. CRESWELL. Then my remark was a little too general; and in order to bring it within the scope of what the gentleman intended, I will say that he knew as much about it as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of the considerations which led to its adoption.

Mr. CRESWELL. That brings the issue up still more sharply, and it comes up between the Senator and the authority I am about to read, and he must settle it with his New England brother. As everybody knows, Mr. MORRILL, of the other House, has given this subject a vast deal of labor and study, and everybody is disposed to pay deference and respect to his judgment and opinion on all subjects of this kind. On the 6th of March, 1866, in debate upon a bill which he introduced with a view to restore some of the features of the reciprocity treaty which had before that time been discontinued, he said:

"When the reciprocity treaty was made a low tariff prevailed in Canada, and England only eight years previously had adopted the doctrine of free trade. Great expectations were held out by the negotiator, Lord Elgin, feeding the not unwilling hopes of our people, of an increased demand for American manufactures; but suddenly the Canadas adopted the principles of protection and largely increased their tariff on manufactures. The imperial Government did not veto these acts, and these great expectations were nipped in the bud. The United States never expecting to find in the Provinces a market for the productions of its agriculture, nor of its mines, forests, or fisheries, at once found their manufactures also practically excluded. But now, making no complaint, we yet tender a law conceding certain privileges. If this shall not be met by a corresponding liberality, sufficiently indicated in the conditions embodied in the bill, we have the right, and it will be our duty, to change the terms of the present bill for such as will be most advantageous to us, regardless of the interests of others."

Now, when the reciprocity treaty has been disposed of, and when the little benefit that could be derived from it in other shapes has been taken away from our people, we are to have restored and fastened upon us that feature of it which was to us the most objectionable, namely, the point wherein they brought their coals directly in competition with ours and with our great and all-absorbing branch of industry.

The Senator says reduce taxation as much as possible. So say I; but are we reducing taxation? The point, as I understand it, and the very turning point of this whole struggle, depends upon the fact of our raising sufficient means to maintain our credit for the payment of our debt, and sustaining such a policy as will enable us properly to diminish our currency until we can come down to a gold standard, and then prices will be reduced and the spirit of speculation will be in some manner checked. I am rather old-fashioned in my notions in regard to currency; but I still entertain the notion that a gold and silver coin basis is best and the one to which we must ultimately return. Our struggle is to get back to that as gradually as possible and with the least possible injury to the various interests of the country.

But, sir, I have spoken longer than I intended when I rose; and I apologize to the Senate for having occupied so much time.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Maryland said, and I thought he said it in a manner as though some of us were concerned in it, that if certain views were to prevail here we had better vote the bill down. I wish simply to say to the Senator from Maryland that I shall have no regrets if the bill should be voted down. If anybody in Massachusetts believes that this great tax upon coal, upon iron, upon steel, and upon wool is to be compensated by anything in this bill, he is mistaken. It is not a Massachusetts measure; and in my judgment it is more against her than for her; and if I vote for the bill—

Mr. CRESWELL. The general principle of the tariff is usually supposed to be a Massachusetts measure, and if this tariff does not suit Massachusetts it is only because the old tariff suits her better. My argument went to the whole tariff system. If the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts—and I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him—prevails, it applies equally and as forcibly against all tariffs as against this tariff.

Mr. SUMNER. Oh, no.

Mr. CRESWELL. I think it does.

Mr. SUMNER. Oh, no.

Mr. CRESWELL. Well, I will maintain it anyhow.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I do not enter into that controversy. I am speaking of this tariff, the measure before us; and I say that Massachusetts does not demand it, and in my judgment there is nothing in the bill to compensate her for this increased duty upon coal, upon iron, upon steel, and upon wool. You increase the duties upon these articles that enter into our manufacture and our mechanic arts in their various forms. I see what the contest is to be in the future. It will be pretty hard lowering the duties on iron, on steel, or on wool; but the war upon textile fabrics and upon the various productions of the mechanic arts in our part of the country will go on; it will be made upon every stump in the country against us; and while the benefits of this measure are to go to others, the reproaches are to be heaped upon us; and that is about all we shall get of it.

You cannot smuggle iron, nor steel, nor wool into the country, but you can smuggle articles similar to the products of our manufactures and of our various mechanic arts to a great extent if the duties be very high. There is a good deal of smuggling now, and after the passage of this bill there will probably be more. Now, I want gentlemen here to take the full responsibilities of this measure upon themselves. I protest against this talk here in the Senate or in the country, in the press or before the people, that this bill before us or the bill passed by the House of Representatives at the last session is demanded by the people I represent, or is to promote their interests. If I had my way to-day I would prefer, for our interests, to stand upon the laws as they now are.

There is one interest of ours, and but one interest alone, that I see is to be promoted to any considerable extent by this bill, and that is the worsted interest. That interest grew up under the reciprocity treaty, the wools being imported chiefly and mainly from Canada, and when that treaty went down, the eight or ten million dollars invested in that product was imperiled. The persons who made those investments have lost hundreds of thousands and probably millions of dollars. This tariff will be a benefit to them; but as regards the varied mechanical interests, the vast interests of my section of the country, I see nothing in this measure, and I have no anxiety about it. What I protest against is, that anybody here or elsewhere shall name it or consider it as a measure called for by the State of Massachusetts. We have various mechanic shops into which iron and steel enter to a great extent. Our people are largely engaged in railroads in our own section, in the West, and everywhere else in this country. Our people are interested in railroads all over the West, and largely in the central and southern States. What are we to gain by this great increase of duty on iron or on steel? And taking the next half a dozen or ten years before us, I do not see that the cotton manufacturers are to gain by this great advance of duty on wool.

Sir, if I vote for this measure, I shall vote for it on grounds general to the country, without expecting any special benefit for my own section. I have noticed that nearly all the votes that have been taken have a squinting to crowd us very hard in this matter; and I see very plainly from what has been said here that when this measure is passed, if it be passed at all, the responsibility for it and the war upon it is to be made upon us and upon the productions of our manufactories and machine-shops and the various mechanic arts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Creswell, Davis, Fowler, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Patterson, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Yates—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Sprague, Stewart, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Kirkwood, Lane, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Poland, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, and Williams—22.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I should have contented myself with giving my vote in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts had not the debate gone to a considerable length and covered a good deal of ground. I sympathize with the ideas of the Senator from Massachusetts, but I desire to take a ground that he has not ventured upon, and that is, that this increase of duties is of no advantage whatever to the mineral regions of the respective States that are desirous to have this increase of duty. I know something about the mineral region of Maryland, and also of the mineral region of Pennsylvania; and I know that under the present system there is hardly a mine in that whole region that is not connected with a great railroad interest that can pay a dollar. With all the prospectuses and all the advertisements of mines that are brought to the attention of capitalists there is not one, in my judgment, that possesses sufficient remunerative prospects to enable them to invest in that description of property. The fact is, that the whole country, other than those engaged in the railroad interests in these particular localities, pay a tribute to the railroad interests. Why, sir, I know that during the war, one or two gentlemen controlling the railroad interests of Pennsylvania, and having also an interest in the mines, were able to absorb many millions of dollars when the coal was at eight or ten or twelve dollars per ton.

Now, sir, that system is no advantage to anybody. As for the great States of Maryland and Pennsylvania, thinking to obtain advantages growing out of building up a great railroad system whose owners are foreigners to them, as I know the fact to be, it is most suicidal to their interests and unprofitable in every respect.

Sir, New England will very soon get out of the difficulties that are placed upon her in this respect. By a recent improvement in mechanics she has discovered that one ton of coal will produce the power which has heretofore been obtained out of two tons of coal. She has also discovered another important fact in the matter of fuel, and it is a fact that should receive the attentive consideration of the gentlemen who are advocating this protective tariff upon coal. She has within her own territory a fuel which she is developing, which will soon make her independent of both Pennsylvania and Maryland in this respect. Why then drive this thing to these extremities? You will certainly destroy your own interests, and you are promoting nobody's interest except the interest that I speak of, and that is the railroad interest, and the railroads are not owned by your own people. They are concentrated in the hands of the great capitalists of the country, and the people who consume this article pay them tribute.

Sir, it seems to me that there should be reason in all things, that there should be some sort of consideration of the exact condition of this article. There is hardly a mine disconnected from the railroad interests that can get over seventy-five cents per ton for coal delivered into the railroad car. Not more than a year or two ago I visited the district in western Pennsylvania which has for its center the Cumberland coal region. They could deliver coal into the cars at a particular point at seventy-five cents per ton, and it cost six dollars per ton for railroad freighting. Look at that! The coal interest is not prosperous, because these people have a monopoly of that territory, and because they put these restrictions upon the development of the country and particularly of the State that the gentleman [Mr. CRESWELL] has so much at heart and so ably represents. It really does nobody any good except those connected with this railroad interest, who are owners in both railroad and coal mines, and no territory can be developed unless it is owned by them.

Mr. President, I should have contented myself with simply giving a vote in the affirmative on the question brought up by the Senator from Massachusetts had not the debate covered the ground that I spoke of, and was it not as clear to me as it is possible for anything to be that the market for the gentleman's coal, if this high duty be imposed, will be somewhere else than where it now is, in New England.

Mr. CRESWELL. As the gentleman speaks of the restricted policy of Maryland, I will avail myself of this opportunity to give him and all other capitalists like him an invitation to come down and invest in our lands and mines of all sorts. We shall give him a most cordial welcome and be delighted to see him.

Mr. SPRAGUE. But we cannot do it. No capitalists in this country can go into Maryland with the restrictions put upon them by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. It is an impossible condition of things. You cannot develop another mine disconnected from that railroad. Now, the gentleman is playing into the hands of this great railroad interest and to the prejudice of his State; and so are the gentlemen from Pennsylvania. There is not a coal mine that can be developed at present disconnected with the owners of the great systems of railroads who own coal lands. Nobody is benefited by such a condition of things. These States are not benefited. The coal lands are not being developed. I know of these things. I have had experience of them. I know who gets the money. It is not the people of these States.

Mr. CONNESS. It is rather a late hour to inflict even a short speech on the Senate, and I shall confine myself to a very few remarks.

Mr. President, I was more interested in listening to the brief speech of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] than to any other that has been made to-day. It was a very singular speech, to my mind, for a Senator from Massachusetts to make. I have not the language before me, but the substance of it was this, as I understood it: "This is not a Massachusetts tariff. It does not stop with the protection of the products of the laborers of Massachusetts, but it goes further and protects coal and wool and iron and steel and a few other articles. There is something exceedingly scandalous in a high tariff. Whoever votes for or supports a high tariff must expect to be abused, because it is something that should not be done. Since you do not confine this tariff to the support of Massachusetts interests, but go outside of them and make a tariff to protect interests outside of Massachusetts, we of Massachusetts wash our hands of the whole matter; we take no further responsibility. You have stopped giving us all the profits of a tariff; you now begin to divide them with others, and those others must take the odium: we will not bear it all." So I understand the honorable Senator in effect to have spoken.

The honorable Senator will excuse me for saying that that was not a speech for a Senator from Massachusetts to make at this time. Massachusetts has arrived at her distinction as a manufacturing State because of tariff; because they gave the necessary protection against the cheaper labor of Europe and other portions of the earth, and enabled the mechanics of Massachusetts, paid better and higher wages for their labor than those of England or France or Germany, to produce articles and find a market for them at home against the product of foreign labor. It was laws for this purpose that made Massachusetts what she is, preëminent now in the product of nearly all the articles for which skilled labor in this country is so remarkable in the production of. But when she attains that position, if you extend to others the same kind of protection that she has had, and that she yet wants, and that she can still profit by, we are told "we wash our hands of it; we have nothing to do with it; your iron and your steel and your coal and your wool-producers must take the scandal of the attacks that are made, for it is a kind of scandalous business at any rate!"

Mr. President, I do not know that it ought to be considered that protecting American industry is a scandalous business. The people of the State that I in part represent pay more to the manufacturers of Massachusetts and the East, in proportion to their numbers, than the people of any other State in the Union, by reason of extravagant habits contracted during a period of gold production for fifteen or eighteen years last past. Our people probably buy more to each inhabitant than any other State in the Union. They produce less in the shape of manufactured articles. They buy more in proportion to what they consume; and they buy it where? Abroad? Not at all. They would like undoubtedly to buy in the cheapest market; but the wise legislators from Massachusetts and the other States of the Union—I say wise, I believe they were wise who so legislated as to encourage the production of articles necessary to man for many years past—made such a home market and have protected it so well that our people buy in it, and they pay their money and they pay their profits to eastern labor and eastern capital for what they consume.

Sir, if California and I, as one of her Senators here, were to consider what might be called the immediate interests of the people of that State I should vote against all tariffs and vote to import our goods from England, from Germany, from France, from Italy, or wherever they produce anything, getting those articles that we require from the cheapest market. But, sir, we believe that that is not good national policy. We believe that we as a nation attain a better and more leading position in the world by building up in our own country such industries as have made Massachusetts, Vermont, and New Hampshire the great workshops that they are; and we want to get into our own midst those very manufactures by which they have grown rich and opulent and powerful; and there is no way for us to get them but by favoring the passage of such laws as will encourage capital in engaging in those various industries.

But the Senator from Massachusetts concedes the whole argument by admitting that strokes are to be given and received because we support the doctrine of protection. I do not concede it, and I am less interested in maintaining it than the Senator from Massachusetts. I am prepared, in my humble way, to defend the votes that I give here as given for the benefit of the entire country, Massachusetts included, Maryland with her coal included, New England and Ohio and California with their wool included, and Pennsylvania with her iron and steel included. And who is it that will attack us because that protection is given? Those who prefer foreign markets to domestic markets; those who prefer to buy of the Englishman or the Frenchman or the German when they can buy in their own country articles better adapted to them merely because they are at a little higher price here.

Mr. President, I vote thus because I believe the more we make at home and buy from each other at home the more solid and substantial and powerful we become as a people. At the same time, sir, I would reach our statesmanship a little further, and I would encourage the carrying trade too. I would have commerce one of the great branches of the industry of the nation; and in place of seeing our steam marine driven from the Atlantic ocean by foreign subsidized lines, I would reach out a little of the money that pours so freely from the pockets of the people into the Treasury of the United States; and I would have the star-spangled banner still keeping the van of commerce in these waters. It is a shame and a scandal that while we have voted the freest measures of legislation for the protection of manufactures, we who believe in the system, and I agree with those who believe in it, have at the same time almost turned our backs upon our great marine.

But, sir, I said that I should only make a few remarks, and I shall keep my word good. I am very anxious for a vote; I only make these remarks to warn Senators who represent States that have grown rich and great by a protective policy against any such want of generosity and fair dealing to their neighbors as to propose an abandonment of the measures by which they have grown rich and great because their neighbors now propose to come in and participate in the benefits of the same policy.

Mr. WILSON. I have but a word to say in reply to the Senator from California. The Senator thinks that the remarks I saw fit to make should not come from a Senator from Massachusetts, for the reason, I suppose, that during the last forty years Massachusetts is supposed to have been greatly benefited by the tariff policy of the country.

Mr. CONNESS. "Supposed!" Do you not know that she has been?

Mr. WILSON. I have only to say on that point that we had to raise money to support the Government, and we adjusted the duties generally on revenue principles. Sometimes and in some things we departed from the revenue principle and adopted protection; but generally the protection that we have received in Massachusetts and in the country generally has been incidental to revenue. Now, we have to raise one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty millions a year in gold. Duties must be laid to produce that result. I know that as a consequence of the imposition of duties to that extent, if they are laid fairly and according to any principles acknowledged and accepted as sound principles at home or abroad, there will be incidental protection enough to the productive interests of the country; and I have no anxiety upon that point.

But, sir, I have no idea that there is any principle in this bill. Put a principle of any kind in it, and you can blow it to atoms. It is simply an arrangement, a sort of a conglomeration. I do not complain of it because it is so, for I do not see how we could adopt anything else in the present condition of the country. Our great trouble has been brought upon us by the necessities of the country, by the enormous currency that we have. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] told us in his speech to-day that he was opposed to reducing this currency; and I have discovered lately that from portions of the country where the bill now pending is denounced, and portions of the country, too, from which denunciations are heaped upon Massachusetts or New England in regard to it, petitions are coming in against any reduction of this seven or eight hundred millions of irredeemable paper. I believe sound policy requires that this Government should tend toward the resumption of specie payments at as reasonable a day as possible. I would not press it beyond a reasonable, steady policy. In adjusting these tariff duties at this time I have no fear whatever of the result so far as my State is concerned.

But I have noticed another thing here, and I have noticed it with pain, that the general drift and tendency of the amendments that have been made has been to strike at my State or section of the country. Now, sir, I am ready to take my share of the responsibility of the action upon this bill. I voted last year against acting upon the House bill in order that the measure might be deliberately and carefully considered; and I believe more mind, more thought, more reflection has been put upon this tariff bill than all the tariff bills that have been made for the last half a century in this country. I have not a doubt of it; and we shall have a better bill now than we would have had if we had acted upon the House bill at the last session. I say I am ready to take my share of the responsibility of passing this measure and of every denunciation that may be made upon it. I am anxious to make these adjustments on as sound principles as possible, to make the bill as perfect as we can, to take care, not only of the interests of Massachusetts, but of all sections of the country, manufacturing, agricultural, mechanical, and commercial. But what do we have here? Everybody is talking just as though we of Massachusetts were living on the bounty of this Government; as though they hold us in the hollow of their hands, and if they close their hands we die. I tell them we can live, adjust your tariff as you please. We are no pensioners, and we are reasonably independent.

Mr. CATTELL. I suggest to the gentleman that that arises in part from the fact that you have been protected for the last thirty or forty years.

Mr. WILSON. Not half as much as you gentlemen are disposed to say. We have been protected as others have been protected under this Government, nothing more and nothing less. While I do not denounce the policy of the past nor deny the reasonable benefits that have grown out of it, I do object to this holding up of Massachusetts and of my section of the country as responsible for this measure. What did we hear here to-day? What have we heard on the stump during the last few months? What have we heard in the public press and everywhere? Denunciations of the manufacturers and the mechanics and machine-shops of Massachusetts and of the eastern States, as though we were getting up, advocating, and forcing through measures unjust to the other sections of the country. Now, sir, what I said just now is true: that the great duties upon coal, upon iron, upon steel, and upon wool are not compensated to us by anything in this bill; and in no sense of the word is it a Massachusetts measure.

I say that here. I am ready to stand by it, and events in the future will demonstrate it. The war in the future will not be upon Pennsylvania steel and iron, nor upon Ohio wool, but it will be after all upon "the manufacturers, the great mammoth corporations of Massachusetts and New England." What I demand here is that gentlemen who are putting on these duties for their own sections of the country shall take their full share of the responsibility for the tariff we are passing; and I want the country to hold them to the same responsibility they hold us.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I voted against adjourning some time ago in the hope of getting a vote on this amendment; but as there is evidently no quorum present, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 8, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Creswell, Morrill, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, and Yates—8.
NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Sprague, Stewart, Wade, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Patterson, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Trumbull, and Williams—28.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 8, the nays 16. The Senate refuse to adjourn, but there is no quorum voting.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent members.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the motion by adding "to appear to-morrow at twelve o'clock." [Laughter.]

Mr. FESSENDEN. "And to stay until dinner is ready."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine accept the modification of the motion?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I move that amendment to the motion.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 29, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. JENCKES. I desire to call up a motion that I made last evening.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned last evening the gentleman from Rhode Island had moved to suspend the rules so as to enable him to report bill of the House No. 889, to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof. The gentleman from Rhode Island stated that many gentlemen voted last evening with the understanding that the bill would come up this morning. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The House accordingly proceeded to the consideration of bill of the House No. 889, to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof.

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. JENCKES. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, and is as follows:

A bill to regulate the civil service of the United States, and promote the efficiency thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter all appointments of civil officers in the several departments of the service of the United States, except postmasters and such officers as are by law required to be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made from those persons who shall have been found best qualified for the performance of the duties of the offices to which such appointments are to be made, in an open and competitive examination, to be conducted as herein prescribed.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a board of three commissioners, who shall hold their offices for the term of five years, unless sooner removed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to be called the civil service examination board, among whose duties shall be the following:

1. To prescribe the qualifications requisite for an appointment into each branch and grade of the civil service of the United States, having regard to the fitness of each candidate in respect to age, health, character, knowledge, and ability for the branch of service into which he seeks to enter.

2. To provide for the examination of all persons eligible under this act who may present themselves for admission into the civil service.

3. To establish rules governing the applications of such persons, the times and places of their examinations, the subjects upon which such examinations shall be had, with other incidents thereof, and the mode of conducting the same, and the manner of keeping and preserving the records thereof, and of perpetuating the evidence of such applications, qualifications, examinations, and their result, as they shall think expedient. Such rules shall be so framed as to keep the branches of the civil service and the different grades of each branch, as also the records applicable to each branch, distinct and separate. The said board shall divide the country into territorial districts for the purpose of holding examinations of applicants resident therein and others, and shall designate some convenient and accessible place in each district where examinations shall be held.

4. To examine personally, or by persons by them specially designated, the applicants for appointment into the civil service of the United States.

5. To make report of all rules and regulations established by them, and of a summary of their proceedings, including an abstract of their examinations for the different branches of the service, annually, to the President, to be submitted to Congress at the opening of each session.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all appointments to the civil service provided for in this act shall be made from those who have passed the required examinations, in the following order and manner:

1. The applicant who stands highest in order of merit on the list of those who have passed the examination for any particular branch and grade of the civil service shall have the preference in appointment to that branch and grade, and so on, in the order of precedence in examinations, to the minimum degree of merit fixed by the board for such grade.

2. Whenever any vacancy shall occur in any grade of the civil service above the lowest, in any branch, the senior in the next lower grade may be appointed to fill the same, or a new examination for that particular vacancy may be ordered, under the direction of the department, of those in the next lower grade, and the person found best qualified shall be entitled to the appointment to fill such vacancy: Provided, That no person now in office shall be promoted or transferred from a lower to a higher grade unless he shall have passed at least one examination under this act.

3. The right of seniority shall be determined by the rank of merit assigned by the board upon the examinations, having regard also to seniority in service; but it shall at all times be in the power of the heads of Departments to order new examinations, which shall be conducted by the board, upon due notice, and according to fixed rules, and which shall determine seniority with regard to the persons ordered to be examined, or in the particular branch and grade of the service to which such examinations shall apply.

4. Said board shall have power to establish rules for such special examinations, and also rules by which any persons exhibiting particular merit in any branch of the civil service may be advanced one or more points in their respective grades; and one fourth of the promotions may be made on account of merit, irrespective of seniority in service, such merit to be ascertained by special examinations, or by advancement for meritorious services and special fitness for the particular branch of service, according to rules to be established as aforesaid.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That said board shall also have power to prescribe a fee, not exceeding five dollars, to be paid by each applicant for examination, and also a fee, not exceeding ten dollars, to be paid by each person who shall receive a certificate of recommendation for appointment or for promotion or of seniority, which fees shall be first paid to the collector of internal revenue in the district where the applicant or officer resides or may be examined, to be accounted for and paid into the Treasury of the United States by such collector; the certificate of payment of fees to collectors shall be forwarded quarterly by the commissioners to the Treasury Department.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That said board shall have power to prescribe, by general rules, what misconduct or inefficiency shall be sufficient for the removal or suspension of all officers who come within the provisions of this act, and also to establish rules for the manner of preferring charges for such misconduct or inefficiency, and for the trial of the accused, and for determining his position pending such trial.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That any one of said commissioners may conduct or superintend any examinations, and the board may call to their assistance in such examinations such men of learning and high character as they may see fit, or, in their discretion, such officers in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States as may be designated, from time to time, on application of the board, as assistants to said board, by the President or heads of Departments; and in special cases, to be fixed by rules or by resolutions of the board, they may delegate examinations to such persons, to be attended and presided over by one member of said board or by some person specially designated to preside.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the said board may also, upon reasonable notice to the person accused, hear and determine any case of alleged misconduct or inefficiency, under the general rules herein provided for, and in such cases shall report to the head of the proper Department their finding in the matter, and may recommend the suspension or dismissal from office of any person found guilty of such misconduct or inefficiency; and such person shall be forthwith suspended or dismissed by the head of such Department pursuant to such recommendation, and from the filing of such report shall receive no compensation for official service except from and after the expiration of any term of suspension recommended by such report.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the salary of each of said commissioners shall be $5,000 a year, and the said board may appoint a clerk at a salary of $2,000 a year, and a messenger at a salary of $900 a year, and these sums and the necessary traveling expenses of the commissioners, clerk, and messenger, to be accounted for in detail and verified by affidavit, shall be paid from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. The necessary expenses of any person employed by said commissioners, as assistants, and to be accounted for and verified in like manner, and certified by the board, shall also be paid in like manner.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That any officer in the civil service of the United States at the date of the passage of this act, other than those excepted in the first section of this act, may be required by the head of the Department in which he serves to appear before said board, and if found not qualified for the place he occupies he shall be reported for dismissal, and be dismissed in the manner hereinbefore provided, and the vacancy shall be filled in manner aforesaid from those who may be found qualified for such grade of office after such examination.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That all citizens of the United States shall be eligible to examination and appointment under the provisions of this act, and the heads of the several Departments may, in their discretion, designate the offices in the several branches of the civil service the duties of which may be performed by females as well as males, and for all such offices females as well as males shall be eligible, and may make application therefor and be examined, recommended, appointed, tried, suspended, and dismissed, in manner aforesaid; and the names of those recommended by the examiners shall be placed upon the lists for appointment and promotion in the order of their merit and seniority, and without distinction, other than as aforesaid, from those of male applicants or officers.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That the President, and also the Senate, may require any person applying for or recommended for any office which requires confirmation by the Senate to appear before said board and be examined as to his qualifications, either before or after being commissioned; and the result of such examination shall be reported to the President and to the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman propose to put the bill upon its passage to-day without its being printed?

Mr. JENCKES. It has been printed two or three times and is upon the files of members.

Mr. DAWES. We want to know if the gentleman has kept it in the same shape in which it was first printed.

Mr. JENCKES. I do not wish to interfere with the morning hour. If the Committee on Military Affairs are desirous of reporting to-day, and if, by unanimous consent, this bill can be taken up after the morning hour I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to go into Committee of the Whole on a regular appropriation bill after the morning hour.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman that nobody will object to his recommitting his bill and entering a motion to reconsider.

Mr. JENCKES. If I am entitled to the floor now, unless I can yield it by unanimous consent and resume it after the expiration of the morning hour I prefer to proceed, as this is a very important measure not second to any now before Congress.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman will submit the proposition to the House and see if there will be objection to his recommitting his bill and entering a motion to reconsider.

Mr. ALLISON. I object to that proposition.

Mr. JENCKES. If this bill is to be presented at all for action, it is full late to present it now; and as my proposition for postponement is objected to, I prefer to proceed now.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman yield to me to make a report from the Committee on Elections upon a question of privilege?

Mr. JENCKES. I will yield willingly if I do not by that means lose my right to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can yield for a question of privilege without losing his right to resume the floor when the question of privilege shall have been disposed of.

Mr. JENCKES. Then I will yield.

ELECTIONS IN MARYLAND.

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Elections, who were instructed by a resolution of the House of the 21st instant to enter into a certain investigation, have directed me to make a report, and with the indulgence of the House for a few moments I will submit the views of the committee. The resolution, with its preamble, is as follows:

Whereas by the constitution and laws of the State of Maryland persons who were disloyal to the Government of the United States, or gave aid and encouragement to the recent rebellion are deprived of the elective franchise; and whereas it is alleged that at the last election in the State of Maryland large numbers of the persons disqualified as aforesaid did vote for Representative in the Fortieth Congress and other officers; and whereas it is further alleged that armed forces of the United States were ordered by Federal authority to, and did, cooperate with the Executive of the State of Maryland and others who were engaged with him in overriding the constitution and laws aforesaid, and in securing the votes of rebels and persons disqualified as aforesaid, and whereby loyal and qualified voters of Maryland were deterred from the free exercise of the elective franchise and from resisting and preventing the violation of the constitution and laws aforesaid: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections shall inquire into and report whether the constitution and laws have been violated as aforesaid, and whether the President or any one under his command has in any manner interfered with the said election, or has in any way used or threatened to use the military power of the nation with reference to the said election, and if so, whether it was upon the requisition of the Governor of Maryland; and the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers.

The House will observe that the only matter embraced in this proposed inquiry over which this Congress can possibly have jurisdiction is the conduct of the President in reference thereto. The Committee of Elections were of opinion that inasmuch as the House had deemed it proper to instruct the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the official conduct of the President of the United States, it would serve only to distract and dissipate the investigation of that matter to instruct another committee to pursue the same inquiry. Therefore the Committee of Elections have instructed me to report back this resolution, ask that the Committee of Elections be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and on that I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion of Mr. DAWES was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. FERRY, by unanimous consent, presented communications from the Governor and adjutant general of the State of Michigan, in relation to the militia bills now pending before the Committee on the Militia of the House of Representatives; which were referred to the Committee on the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNTIES AND LOST DISCHARGES.

Mr. SCHENCK. With the permission of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] I desire to remind the House that while waiting for some disposition to be made of the bill in charge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and which yesterday was referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, I gave notice that as soon as that bill was disposed of I would, having leave to report at any time, report from the Military Committee the bill in relation to bounties and lost discharges. My friend from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] has anticipated me by reporting another bill, one in relation to the civil service of the United States, with which I have no disposition to interfere, because I recognize its importance. But I desire very much to report the bill to which I have referred; and I would inquire of the Speaker whether I can now, the floor being yielded to me for that purpose, report this bill, and let it come up the next thing after the bill introduced by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] shall have been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] with the consent of the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. JENCKES,] can report the bill to which he refers, and it will come up after the morning hour, whenever there is a morning hour. The House granted permission for the bill to be reported at any time upon giving one day's notice, the bill to be considered after the morning hour.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now report back from the Committee on Military Affairs House bill No. 836, to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines, who served in the late war for the Union, with an amendment in the form of an additional section.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to state that whenever I can get the opportunity I will move to go into Committee of the Whole upon a public appropriation bill, which is very necessary, and will not take a very long time for consideration.

Mr. SCHENCK. As I do not know how soon we may be able to take up and consider the bill I have just reported, I will move that it and the amendment to it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. Do I understand that the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. JENCKES] is compelled to go on now, because there is objection to laying his bill over till after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island asked unanimous consent that the bill might be postponed till after the morning hour. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] objected, stating that he desired after the morning hour to move that the House go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of an appropriation bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw that objection. This bill has to be considered at any rate, either now or after the morning hour.

Mr. KASSON. At the time I made the objection I understood that the morning hour had begun, that the bill of the gentleman from Rhode Island was a regular report of a committee, which the committee had the right to make at this time, and that the proposition was now to pass it over until after the morning hour. I learn now that the bill has come in by unanimous consent. I was under an entire misapprehension, or I should have felt it my duty to object. As the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has stated, the committee desire that the House shall go into the Committee of the Whole to-day on one of the regular appropriation bills. If we cannot bring that bill up as early as we desire I do not wish to interfere with allowing the morning hour to take precedence of the bill of the gentleman from Rhode Island.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Iowa withdraws his objection the Chair will again state the question.

Mr. STEVENS. I object to anything that will prevent our going into the Committee of the Whole after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to the arrangement suggested by the gentleman from Rhode Island, and the gentleman will proceed now.

CIVIL SERVICE—AGAIN.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, the bill just reported, and to which I am instructed by the committee to invite the favorable attention of the House, is intended to work an entire reformation in the method of making appointments to the subordinate offices in the civil service of the United States. It has been framed, and is now proposed, for no political or partisan purpose. It has no regard to the existing condition and relations of parties in the Republic, and no bearing upon the controversies between the different departments of the Government. The first draft of the bill was prepared when there was another head to the Administration, and before the present complications existed, and was presented to the House before these had become serious. The measure was the result of some study and thought in its origin. It has been subjected to the scrutiny and has been improved by the revision of two select committees. It is now presented and its passage urged in the hope that it will be found the suitable basis of a system which will improve the character and promote the efficiency of the civil service of the Government, and as a measure which has due regard to the magnitude of the subject with which it undertakes to deal.

THE SCOPE OF THE BILL.

This bill has relation to all that class of persons in the civil service which are described in the Constitution as "inferior officers."

"The Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

THE SAME PRINCIPLE HAS BEEN APPLIED TO THE MILITARY AND NAVAL SERVICE.

This clause in the Constitution covers all branches of the service. Congress has exercised the power therein granted by making provision for the selection of competent persons for officers in the military and naval service. With regard to these branches of the public service it has done more than this bill proposes. Military and naval schools have been established for the proper education of those who aspire to positions in those services. No one is admitted to even a probationary position except after a thorough examination into his qualifications and probable fitness for the service he seeks to enter. If he fails at any period of his preliminary career he becomes ineligible to promotion and is dismissed. Experience has taught us that in these branches of the public service the public interest demands the selection of the best applicants, who should be thoroughly trained to the performance of their duties before entering upon them, and who by thorough education and by gradual promotion and the teachings of actual service may become fitted to lead our armies and guide our navies.

It has been conceded that the laws which require satisfactory evidence of the probable fitness of each candidate for the career he enters upon are wise and just. The evils resulting from incompetency in its servants are among the greatest that can befall any Government in an emergency which requires it to put forth all its powers. Recent examples are too numerous to make any invidious mention or distinction. But every one knows that unto every young man who enters the military and naval service of the United States the portals of a glorious career are thrown open, and they cannot complain that the people require them to show that they possess talent which may ripen into the genius fit to conduct campaigns, organize and maneuver fleets, command armies, wage war, and win battles.

NOT APPLIED TO THE CIVIL SERVICE, AND REASONS.

No such regulations have been made applicable to the civil service. While careful in the highest degree in the selecting and training of those who adopt the profession of arms, we have been negligent and even reckless in the mode of choosing our civil servants. Perhaps we have unconsciously deferred to the old idea that war was the nobler pursuit. Perhaps, also, it may have been thought hardly worth while to attempt to organize and systematize the civil service and put it under discipline while its members were few and its force widely scattered. The fact is that it has been left almost entirely to personal and partisan control, and its members recruited and selected from local and political influences. While the annual expenditures of the Government were less than $50,000,000 and the revenue was derived almost entirely from customs, there was substantially but one Department of the civil service—that of the Treasury. The number of its officers was then not large, and their selection and appointment was comparatively a light duty. But the "Blue Book" has swelled from a small duodecimo "Official Register" to a large octavo volume. The expenses of the Government must for a long time exceed $300,000,000 a year. The growth of the nation, notwithstanding the check of civil war, is more rapid and sure than ever. Its civil servants will soon, if indeed they do not now, outnumber the military and naval forces combined. This increase shows the necessity for laws and regulations to govern them.

In the early days of the Republic, even with the rigid application of Jefferson's maxim, there was not entire success in the appointments to the civil service. Yet the plan was tolerable in its results until the change of policy in the administration of President Jackson. From the date of that change the evil results have increased in even a greater degree than the growth of the service. For a while they were not so glaring as to call for correction by positive legislation. The frauds and defalcations which then occurred, and were from time to time exposed, were considered as mere ulcers on a comparatively healthy organization, and not as the evidence of disease which required a thorough renovation of the system for its cure.

NECESSITY OF A THOROUGH REFORMATION IN THE MODE OF APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICE.

But the committee have become convinced, and they believe that the evidence taken before them and before other committees will convince the House and the country, that the true interests of the Government can be best served, its expenses lessened, the character of its officers improved, and its business more effectually done, by an entire reformation in the mode of making appointments in the civil service. It may be questioned whether a more vicious system, or rather want of system, than that now existing can be devised or imagined. The public sale of offices could hardly be worse, for in such case the tenure of the office would be required to be defined and its emoluments made certain before the office could have any marketable price. Something definite must be offered for sale before a sale can be effected. But at present nearly every one of these subordinate offices is filled by some person who gained his appointment by the recommendation of personal and political friends, and not by the application of any test to discover his fitness for the place he occupies. His compensation is subject to assessments or forced contributions to pay the expenses of conducting elections in which he is not a candidate for office. If he should show any decided ability or special aptitude for the service he has no assurance of promotion, or even of retention. His term of office is limited by the pleasure, caprice, or interest of his superior.

In the corruption of our politics all these places have become the rewards of partisanship. At every change of administration which brings a different political party into power, the time within which a clean sweep can be made depends upon the industry and zeal with which the incoming authorities can hear and decide upon the claims of the new horde of office-seekers clamorous for the reward of their partisan services. The good of the service is seldom consulted in making appointments, and more rarely in making removals, and the applicants care far less for the public interest than for their own. There is little or no scrutiny into the character and antecedents of the applicant other than as to his political services; no examination to test his qualifications; no probation even during which his fitness or unfitness for the office might be discovered. Not but that occasionally some good or faithful men, possessing both character and intellect, do find admission into these offices; I know, and each of us can name, many of them who do not only their own proper work, but that of many of the indolent and incapable who have been quartered upon the service through influential friends. These men also act as a check to the vicious and dishonest, and give to the service all the character it possesses, and more than on the whole it justly deserves. Many of these men have sought the public service as a temporary calling, moved thereto by accident or misfortune; for it must be admitted that the Government service holds out few attractions as a career to young men who are skillful, energetic, ambitious, and well trained to business. Though a young man may possess all these qualities and be diligent and faithful in the performance of his duty, yet he holds his place, if such a person should be unfortunate enough to accept one, by no definite tenure; he has no certainty of promotion either from seniority or from merit; and surrounded, as he must necessarily be as things now are, by men of lesser qualifications, his very virtues may impede his progress, and his ability to succeed may prevent his success.

Very few who feel themselves competent to attain eminence or even reputable positions in the learned professions or in business, ever enter the subordinate grades of the civil service. It has no rewards or honors to stimulate ambition; it gives the individual no position either in society or in the State. It must be confessed that this service has sunk into a sort of disrepute. Those active, energetic, and capable men who are scattered among its places feel called upon to give some reason for their being found there, whenever the character of their employment is the subject of conversation in their presence. The employés in the public service have not an equal standing in the community with those in corresponding positions employed by private persons or corporations. The merchant's bookkeepers and clerks, the bank cashiers, clerks, and tellers, the agents of express and insurance companies, and others who, although in subordinate capacities, urge forward the business of the world, stand higher in public esteem than those who have dropped into this treadmill of the public service. Even the great but more poorly paid class of teachers, with lives as monotonous, and with as slight rewards for successful toil, are much more respected. The reason is plain. In the pursuits of active life there is no place for the idle, the corrupt, the ignorant, the dissolute, or the dishonest.

If a man be an inferior lawyer or noisy primary-meeting politician, or both, no presumption is raised thereby in his favor that he will make a good bank-teller or accountant; although these qualities seem to avail him if he aspires to similar employment in a post office or custom-house. As a general rule, those who from some defect or incorrect habit in mind or character have been unable to succeed in the open competition of business, are quartered by their relations and political friends, as occasion may offer, upon the public service; and although, taken as a whole, the pay is greater and the labor lighter under Government than in other employment, yet the work is done with less promptitude and thoroughness. The Government runs every custom-house and considerable post offices with more men and greater pay and with greater loss from inefficiency and dishonesty than every successful individual or corporation manages an equal amount of business. In truth no merchant, manufacturer, or business corporation could succeed who selected their clerks and agents upon the recommendation of politicians and without examination into their qualifications or scrutiny into their private character. The wonder still is, not so much that the Government is served as well as it is, but that with such a mode of selecting its servants it is served at all.

DUTIES OF HEADS OF DEPARTMENTS AND MEMBERS OF CONGRESS WITH REGARD TO APPOINTMENTS TO OFFICE.

Beside, the people have a right to demand that the time and talents of their chief public servants should be employed in performing the duties of the offices to which they are elected or appointed. Of their members of Congress they require results in legislation; the enactment of wise laws, and the establishing of the best means for enforcing their execution. Of their heads of Departments they demand an unremitting attention to the management of the vast public interests they have in charge. Of their revenue officers they demand the utmost vigilance, fidelity, and zeal, in order that fraud and perjury shall not diminish the means by which we are to redeem the burdens of taxation. And above all, of the President of the United States they demand that his mind and heart, his whole time, energies, and talents shall be given to the high duties of that more than imperial office, to the general oversight and direction of its vast business, and the conduct and guidance of the great affairs of the Republic.

Yet what member of Congress does not find a large portion of his time taken from his legislative duties by the solicitations of office-holders and office-seekers? Who has not felt that his dignity has been lowered, as well as his time wasted, and that the independence of the legislator from executive influence, which the Constitution provided for, and which the fathers of the Republic so greatly esteemed, had been compromised by waiting in the ante-chambers of Secretaries and heads of bureaus for his turn to see the high official about the appointment to or retention in office of perhaps some deputy collector, assistant assessor, customs inspector, or temporary clerk, whom his political friends recommend as having claims upon his attention?

When Congress shall have regulated the mode of making these appointments by law, in exercise of its constitutional power, members of Congress would not be called upon and would have no right to interfere with the appointing power, but would be left free for the performance of their proper duties.

What Secretary of the Treasury has not been compelled to give to a contest for a collectorship of customs or of internal revenue or for the thousands of inferior officers within his control, the time and thought which might have been better bestowed upon the questions which constantly beset him in the performance of his duties, on the workings of the tariff with regard to revenue and protection, on the internal revenue law, so as to relieve the people from unjust and unequal taxation, on our finances and currency so as to propose measures which might tend to equalize the values of gold and currency and to prevent the great fluctuations which perplex, astonish, and frequently create ruin in the commercial world?

We have seen also that at the change of the collectorship in one of our great ports upwards of four thousand new applications for office were laid before the new collector, all urged against the incumbents and in favor of the applicants upon personal and political considerations. For hearing and decision upon this vast amount of cases his official term would hardly be long enough. In another port a most estimable man and worthy officer was driven out of his mind and into the sea unto death by the hordes of hungry office-seekers who beset his path by day and left him no rest at night. The time of all these principal officers is wasted and their energies diverted from their duties in listening to the contests of those who are competing to become their assistants, and whose claims, resting almost entirely upon political grounds, the officer being a politician himself, and looking beyond the uncertain tenure of his present office at the chances for the future, does not find it politic to ignore. And even the President himself is not secure from the importunities of rival local politicians for these subordinate places, and by entertaining and sometimes acting upon them himself, encourages the scramble for office on political grounds, which disgraces the administration of our Government.

Thus the people are deprived of a great portion of the time and services of their highest and most responsible officers. Assistants have to be provided by law in order that the duties of the great offices may be performed; and with the increased number of officers comes additional salaries and expenditures.

TENDENCY TOWARD CENTRALIZATION.

Another evil, and one which may become of greater magnitude and threaten greater danger to the Republic than any other, is that already suggested, of the direct interference of the Chief Executive in the appointment of officers which by law is vested in the heads of Departments, claiming to exercise over these chiefs the power of removal without the assent of the Senate, as well as exercising the power of appointment with the Senate's advice and consent. His will controls the heads of Departments, in whose discretion the Congress has by law under the Constitution vested the selection of these inferior officers. Thus the whole public civil service, in the language of the resolution appointing this committee, is "being used as an instrument of political or party patronage;" and with the leader of the political party in power, or of one that seeks to be in power, in the Executive Mansion, one of the greatest evils which can endanger the existence of a republic springs into existence in the very heart of ours—that of the centralization of all appointing as well as executive power in one person. The framers of the Constitution wisely guarded against this centralizing tendency by the clause already quoted; but under the present system that guard is a nullity.

CONCLUSION OF THE COMMITTEE UPON THIS SUBJECT.

When, therefore, the committee were instructed "to consider the expediency of so amending the laws under which appointments to the public service are now made as to provide" "for withdrawing the public service from being used as an instrument of political and party patronage," they, after deliberation, concluded to meet the evil at its two extremes, and to propose legislation against interference by the Chief Executive as the head of a party while the head of the nation, as well as against the management of that unofficial party machinery which selects and recommends for the subordinate offices none but political partisans. The appointing power is thus vested where Congress, acting under the Constitution, has seen fit to place it.

When, also, the committee were "instructed to inquire into the expenditures in all the branches of the service of the United States, and to report whether any and what offices ought to be abolished," they took into consideration the whole civil service of the Government, and came to the conclusion, after taking evidence and giving deliberation to the subject, that its present great expense and inadequacy of result to the expense which is everywhere found, is due rather to the quality and character of the personnel of that service and their mode of appointment, than to large salaries or to too great a number of employés. And when the committee came to the instruction respecting the amendment of "the laws under which appointments to the public service are now made," so "as to provide for the selection of subordinate officers after due examination by proper boards, their continuance in office during specified terms, unless dismissed upon charges preferred and sustained before tribunals designated for that purpose," it seemed to them that they had reached the root of the evil.

The further the investigation proceeded the better satisfied did the committee become that the best and surest mode of "curtailing the expenses of the services of the country" was by using proper care and judgment in selecting the persons whom it pays for such service. Thus, when in a division in a custom-house, or in a class of departmental clerks, they found twelve clerks, three of whom were competent and nine of various grades of inefficiency, and all were barely getting through the work which seven well-trained persons could perform with ease, they could not recommend the abolishment of five of the places, because under the present system there could be no assurance that the three competent men would be retained and that four of equal efficiency would supplant the nine inefficient ones. Unless the future seven should be competent to discharge the duties of the present twelve, the loss to the public from the obstruction and delay of business would be greater than the gain from the five discontinued salaries. The great point to be gained is in competency, efficiency; and the suppression of a five-hundred dollar office here and a thousand-dollar office there, although many such might be dispensed with, is but a small saving compared to the great gain which might be obtained from an improvement in the personal qualities of all our public servants. Let us seek to obtain skill, ability, fidelity, zeal, and integrity in the public service, and we shall not be called upon to increase either salaries or the number of offices. It is safe to assert that the number of offices may be diminished one third, and the efficiency of the whole force of the civil service increased one half, with a corresponding reduction of salaries for discontinued offices, if a healthy system of appointment and discipline be established for its government.

THE PROPOSED REMEDY.

The several Departments of the civil service are established by law; they are necessary for the proper administration of the Government; the salaries of the subordinate officers are fixed by statute, and are the subject of annual appropriations, and as compared with the amounts paid in other countries for similar services are ample and even liberal. The proposition upon which the bill is founded is, that the people are entitled to the best ability that can be obtained for the money they pay for the service required. This result is sought to be attained by tests and scrutiny applied to each person who seeks to enter this service. It is much easier and far better to exclude the ignorant, the incapable, the careless, the lazy, the idle, and the dissolute at the threshold, than to eject them if under partisan favor they are once admitted. Our present mode, as already described, is to appoint the man first and try to teach and discipline him afterward. The result is, that when once admitted into office, the incumbent does as little as, and no more than, will suffice to keep his place. Sometimes, also, persons of positive vices gain admission into the service.

This committee have initiated inquiries into the conduct of peculators in some Departments, and two committees of the House are now engaged in developing fraudulent practices, and seeking evidence against those who perpetrate them. It is certain that there are swindlers and thieves in the pay of the Government who cause a greater loss to it than the amount of their salaries. If only men of honesty and good repute were admitted into the service we should have less need of these investigating committees and their barren results. It is easier, cheaper, and better to keep the rascals out than to keep them under discipline and to remedy the consequences of their thieving propensities after they have once got in. In fact, the reports of our investigating committees, being rarely followed by legislation to prevent the frauds exposed, have served to educate the plunderers of the Treasury to sharper practice and more extended operations. If one set of full-fed thieves are removed in consequence of such reports, a new set of politicians, sharpened by hunger and guided by the experience of their predecessors whose acts go unpunished, are appointed to enter upon the same career of peculation. I doubt if there has been a single report of the evidence taken by an investigating committee which has been made public that has not proved injurious to the public interests. These publications, like the lives of notorious criminals, have disseminated the knowledge of successful vice, and as no one has suffered from them in any more severe manner than removal from office, the officer who has made up his mind to become peculator is stimulated to make the most out of his brief career, and these disclosures teach him how to do it.

The measure now before the House is an approximation to a remedy for these evils. The systems regulating the civil service of other nations have been examined, and the results of their experience have been embodied in this bill. The principle is not new, nor is the mode in which it is to be wrought out. The attempt has been to adapt it to the wants of this country, and therein is its merit, if it has any. This principle is to place practically in the hands of the Government the power of employing the services of the capable and of dispensing with the services of the incapable in every subordinate place and every executive department. In other words, "let the best attainable talent, the greatest attainable fitness, in every case be placed in office," and thus approximate as near as possible to having the right man in the right place. Let merit be the sole title to office, and we work a thorough reformation in our mode of appointments, and infuse new life and vigor into every branch of the executive service.

THE MODE OF APPLYING THE REMEDY.

I. Admission open to all.

All will agree abstractly upon this principle. The civil service, like the military and naval, should be conducted by the highest talent that can be procured. How it is practicable to obtain that highest talent is the first question that meets us. The best solution of this question seems to us to be to throw open all places in the initial grades of the service to the competition of all. It is the right of the people to have the best administrative officers which their allotted pay can procure; and as it is the duty of every one of the people to serve the country when required, so also it should be the privilege of every one to have an opportunity to enter the service if he wishes it and can show that he can serve better than any other in the position which he seeks. Let every one have a fair chance. Nor is there any danger that the people will become demoralized and all turn office-seekers when place is accessible to all. The preliminary tests, rigidly enforced, will exclude all those who cannot prove themselves to possess the requisite fitness. Any one can now obtain a place in the medical department of the Navy who can bring evidence of good character and pass the prescribed examination, and yet the roll is not full. So at West Point and Annapolis; the first nominations have rarely filled the class. So in the civil service, where the necessity of ascertaining the candidate's fitness is equally great, the requirement of a proper examination into qualifications and scrutiny into character will greatly diminish the number of applicants. The great class who are conscious of infirmity, and who now creep into office through political influence, will not make their appearance. Another great class, and one which now infests every branch of the service, will fear a scrutiny into their antecedents and habits, and will stay away.

While we may not allure the most promising in talents and character of our young men by the meager rewards of the subordinate service, yet by throwing the doors of admission wide open to all, one point will be gained absolutely, and another approximately. The problem is to find the best attainable talent for the place and pay offered. While the leading graduates of our colleges and academies, and the enterprising, energetic, self-trained youth will, notwithstanding the great obstacles, still continue to strive for the great rewards of the learned professions or of business, there will still be a large class of well-educated young men wishing for immediate compensation, and willing to be satisfied with slow and sure increase of recompense, who will come forward and compete for and gradually fill these offices. By leaving application free to all, the Government will ascertain to a certainty all who are attainable; and by open competitive examination they will discover approximately the best of those attainable. Inquiry into character will deter the knavish and the dissolute who will not risk the brand of rejection for cause, and the dull, the ignorant, the lazy, the imbecile, and the unambitious will not overcome their terror of open competitive examinations. Through these preliminary trials will pass only those who are worthy to enter upon the career which is offered to them. And by allowing promotions also from merit, the emulation and competition will continue after the career has been entered upon, and every man will be spurred to do his best, or else, while lagging in the race, become liable to be dropped from inefficiency.

II. The most worthy to receive appointment.

The theory of our appointment system, as best stated in, and, so far as it could be, justified by, the maxim of Jefferson, is that offices should be given to those worthy of them, detur digno. But this maxim implies that many equally worthy or worthier even may be excluded. Then how is this worthiness to be ascertained? A Secretary of the Treasury who, though sitting in his room in the Treasury building, should know everybody in the country, the education and antecedents of each person and any special talent he may have shown, and who could and would act without partiality, might select without difficulty or delay the best attainable person for each of his many hundred subordinate offices. He would simply have to telegraph for his man. But unfortunately our Secretaries are not omniscient, nor altogether wise, nor wholly just and free from prejudice. Yet when the population of the country was but a few millions, inhabiting the fringe of the Atlantic coast, it may not have been a laborious or difficult task for the chief executive officers to select worthy assistants and subordinates. But now, with our vast territory and increasing millions, it is simply impossible for them, with their accumulation of duties, to give the time to the subject necessary to secure a good result.

Hence the mode of appointment from local political influence and recommendation has crept into our system. It is intermediate between appointments from pure patronage, the favor and condescension of the superior, and a primary meeting selection of a party candidate. It has the vices of each system and the redeeming qualities of neither. The patron was not always guided by favor, and the people sometimes select from worthiness. In England the evils resulting from this hybrid mode of selection were sought to be obviated in the manner we adopted at the last session for regulating the appointments to the Military Academy. Several persons were nominated to any vacant office, and that one of the nominees who proves himself the better qualified on a test examination receives the appointment. Detur digniori expresses the result of this compromise.

But the American people have reached that point in their experience where they have found that the best thing for them to do in their public business is to do away with all compromises with error in all its forms, and to stand upon the firm ground of principle and justice. With regard to this class of offices the public sentiment undoubtedly is, as the public interest demands, that while competition for them should be open to all, yet only those who show the best fitness for them should have them. Detur dignissimo, let the most worthy have it, should in respect to office be the motto of the people of this great Republic. Their Government is of the people and for the people, and its rewards and honors should be given to those most fit and worthy for its service.

III. How the best attainable talent can be secured.

But how can this result be accomplished? Are not the extent of the country, the great and increasing number of its population, the multiplication of officers and their new duties,—reasons urged for the adoption of this measure,—the very reasons which will prevent it from being successfully carried into effect? Let us consider. If a measure is good and wise in itself the obstacles in the way of carrying it into effect should not deter a statesman from urging its adoption. All good things are difficult; even the vis inertiae of evil are not to be overcome except by strenuous efforts; but things which are difficult are not impossible. It would have been easier to have put this measure into operation thirty years ago than now. It is easier to do it now than it will be ten years hence. But that such a measure is necessary now, and will become more and more essential with the increasing years of the Republic, is as plain as that the Republic must live. A well-trained and thoroughly disciplined body of civil servants is as necessary to the preservation of the State as are an Army and Navy thoroughly trained and disciplined in arms.

This bill provides for a central board of examiners, who may call to their assistance eminent civilians and officers in all branches of the service of the Government in any part of the country, for the purpose of hearing and deciding upon the claims of all applicants for their subordinate civil offices. Upon the results of their examinations certificates of fitness are to be given or refused.

The fact that such a system has worked with great success in other countries may not satisfy every one of its practicability in this. In Prussia it has been more effectual than the needle-gun in perfecting, establishing, and enlarging the nationality. In the minor States of Germany it has been of vital importance. Such a system has enabled the French nation to carry on its Government, without great shock to its credit, although the heads of it have often been victims of the guillotine and the bayonet. In England the system, though but partially adopted, has given new life to the home service, and its full application to the colonial service is the vital element in its administration. It has been found necessary for the proper government of the vast colonial possessions of Great Britain that its officers should be selected out of the number of those who stood the closest scrutiny as to their fitness. This requirement has not been considered as a hardship, but the opportunity has been accepted as a favor by the aspirants for the service. In the colonial department the door is swung open to all. Power, favor, patronage, political influence are naught before health, energy, and merit. The young men of every nation, caste, or color, under the protection of the Crown of Great Britain, have the privilege of contending for admission to a career of certain independence and honorable though limited rewards.

What is practicable in and for Great Britain and its vast colonial possessions is practicable for the United States. If a central board of examiners, sitting in London, can select a class of persons from which the offices in India, Australia, New Zealand, and British North America, as well as in the home service, can be filled, not only without complaint on the part of the applicants, but with gratitude for the privilege of making application, then our board of commissioners, with the assistance provided for in this bill, can do the same thing for this country. In Great Britain it is necessary that the applicants should go to London; by the provisions of this bill it is not necessary that the applicants should all go to Washington, or that the commissioners should themselves go to Maine or to Oregon. The central board at Washington would determine the minimum degree of qualification for every subordinate grade of the civil service. They settle upon the questions to be asked of the candidate and the scrutiny to be made into his character. If the place of examination is at Washington they conduct the examinations themselves. If at New York or any other place conveniently accessible, they may all attend or send one of their number to act with other competent persons called specially to their assistance. In no part of the country can there be any deficiency in competent assistants. Well-educated officers of the Army and Navy, including surgeons, are stationed within or adjacent to every State and Territory. In every State are experienced educators who would gladly perform the service of examiners from an honorable sense of patriotic duty. In most of the States the members of the boards of education and school committees serve without compensation. Those of us who have selected our nominees for the Military and Naval Academies through competition have found no difficulty in securing the willing service of competent examiners.

Suppose the heads of Departments report that they need a hundred qualified persons to fill vacancies in the clerkships at Washington: thereupon the central board give notice that they will receive applications for such places within a given period from all parts of the country. In the mean time they will determine what questions shall be put to the applicants, and what inquiries shall be made as to their health, character, and antecedents. They will appoint places where the candidates shall appear, and designate the persons who are to conduct the examinations. The result will at once be reported to the central board. There may be ten thousand applicants for the vacant hundred places, and out of those ten thousand the board may find that two thousand are qualified for the appointments. The leading hundred get the places, and the people are sure of that number of good servants.

GENERAL EFFECT OF THIS SYSTEM.

The unsuccessful nineteen hundred get certificates of their fitness for such places, and may, under rules to be established by the board, become entitled to appointments within a limited time without further examination. Such is their relation to the Government; but to the world the certificate of fitness is a letter of credit, worth more than the diploma of any commercial college, scientific school, or even of any university, as a recommendation for employment, because it is the evidence of merit in a contest for prizes in which the alumni of all such institutions are competitors. The civil service commission will prove to be here what it has become elsewhere, the grand assay office, where all young men desirous of entering the public service have their qualities tested; as the mint, where those who show that they have the required fineness of metal receive the stamp which will give them currency throughout the nation. Such has been the result in Germany, in France, and in England. Young men strive to obtain the certificate of the civil service commissioners, although it does not bring them into office, because it is the best evidence of their qualifications for commercial or other business.

Although not ten out of a hundred who pass the examination and scrutiny enter the public service, yet the ninety find employment perhaps more profitable elsewhere. The fact once established and promulgated that the public service is a career that is open to all who possess certain well-defined qualifications, and that all those who prove themselves thus qualified can have either a place in the public service and a certificate of fitness for such place, will raise the standard of excellence in all the schools and colleges in the country. The certificate of the commissioners will have the same advantage over the diploma of a college as the bill of a national bank has over that of a State institution; it will have currency throughout the country by virtue of the national indorsement. Education is thus stimulated and nationalized; the result will be felt in every family in the nation, and the benefit will inure to the whole people and not alone to the educated individuals. When it was proposed to introduce this system into the British service John Stuart Mill wrote thus:

"The proposal to select candidates for the civil service of Government by a competitive examination appears to me to be one of those great public improvements the adoption of which would form an era in history. The effects which it is calculated to produce in raising the character both of the public administration and of the people can hardly be overestimated."

THE PROPOSED BILL DESTROYS WHAT IS CALLED "PATRONAGE."

It must be admitted that there still exists in this Government, with all its popular tendencies, some vestige of the thing once called "patronage." The word is used in connection with almost every appointment. The appointing officer, President or Secretary, thinks that he has "patronage," and is using it, whenever he orders a commission to be made out. Those who sign "the papers" of the fortunate recipient of the commission also think that they are patrons, and that the appointee is an officer of their own creation. The poor recipient of the commission finds before him a divided duty. The first to the Administration, the next to his friends who recommended his appointment and who may, if he does not serve them, require his removal and the appointment of some other more subservient. In most cases the interests of the Government and of the politicians are adverse, and the appointee finds that he must choose between two masters or patrons; the high appointing officer representing the Government on the one side, and his political friends and backers on the other. The collectorship of the port of New York is a notable example of this class of cases.

This measure proposes to extirpate, eradicate, or, in plain Saxon, dig up, root out, and throw aside any, every, and all kinds of "patronage" in appointments to the public service. The word, the thing, the act, have no place in a republic. In other countries and in past ages Government was the patrimony of princes, the heritage of kings; here and now it is the inheritance of the people. Unto every man who casts a ballot in this country is remitted at every election day his portion of the sovereignty of this great nation. The political career is open to all; the public service should be a career equally accessible. There is no place for "patronage" in our system; it is a solecism in itself. In practice it is a great public injury: "It 'curseth' him that gives and him that takes." The assumed right of control by one class of public servants over another on other than meritorious grounds ought not to be tolerated. The people do not elect a man President in order that he may have the privilege, the "patronage" of quarantining all his relations and personal and political friends upon the Treasury, but because they believe that their Government will be best administered by him. Inherent in the common sense of the people is the maxim concerning government, "That which is best administered is best," and the people demand that in their Government, which this is, all obstructions to the best administration shall be removed. The best way of doing this has seemed to us to be the securing of the services of the best administrators. When merit is the key that opens the gate to a career in the public service, the "patronage" which has introduced dullness, mediocrity, laziness, and profligacy into it, becomes extinct.

MINOR DETAILS OF THE BILL—THE EMPLOYMENT OF WOMEN.

Another feature of this bill is, that it authorizes the heads of Departments to designate certain offices for which women as well as men may compete. There are already hundreds of women in the public service, all of whom come within this class of temporary appointments, who have no clearly-defined duties and no certain tenure of office. It has been the fashion of late to decry them and to underrate the value of their services, and even to urge the dismissal of all of them. But here, as in all other branches of the service, the evils complained of are incident to the mode of appointment. They are thrust without previous training into places sought for them, and are retained under lax discipline, and the result is what might be expected of persons who have no hope of the recognition of merit or of the reward of promotion, and who are continually admonished that they may be dismissed at any time without notice and without cause. But once open and secure this career to them and the result is not doubtful. In many branches of the service, as in many branches of teaching, they will succeed to the exclusion of males, and at far less expense to the Government. In other branches they must yield altogether, or succeed only in rare instances, as they now do in sculpture, poetry, and in the arts and sciences. The fact that some do succeed, even under the adverse circumstances now surrounding the attempt, may, under the stimulant of an assured career, and through education and emulation, bring forward thousands of those who are now languishing for want of employment. The prejudice against the employment of women in the public service is only another mode of expressing the feeling that labor is a degradation, which feeling and prejudice it is one of the duties of the free people of this Republic to extirpate thoroughly and forever.

PREPARATORY TRAINING.

It may be asked how are young persons to become trained for the performance of the duties of these public offices? Let it be known that certain qualifications are required for admission into the service and there will be no lack of schools to furnish the training. We have already schools and branches of collegiate education which furnish the teaching upon most subjects where practical wants and scientific knowledge meet each other. It is one of the healthiest signs of these times that every educational want is supplied almost as soon as made known, and that our universities throw wide their gates to all seekers of knowledge, and make thorough search for and give due rewards to those who can give the desired instruction. In every other country where this educational training has been regarded as preliminary to employment in the public service schools have sprung up and universities have proposed to furnish the required education, and we do not admit that we are behind any other nation in educational skill. This system, if adopted, will call into existence new branches of study in those schools which endeavor to meet the wants of the times—I mean not alone the study of the principles of our Constitution, but of political science, the science of government, which few have mastered, and fewer still have presumed to teach, but which the exigencies of our times demand should be reduced to its elements and expressed in the "hand-book" for all who present themselves for admission into the public service.

THE ADVANTAGE OF CONTINUED DISCIPLINE.

Not inferior to the advantages expected to be derived from the proposed mode of admission into the service is that which will be due to the subsequent discipline. The rules and regulations under which each public servant labors will be constantly before him; the causes for which he may be suspended or removed will be impressed upon his memory; the certainty that no amount of personal or political influence can prevent charges being preferred against him if he violates these rules, or retain him in his place if he is found guilty of their violation; and the assurance of reward and promotion if he excels in the performance of his duties, will tend to make him observant, exact, faithful, diligent, earnest, and laborious. All these influences will create in the civil service that great stimulant to success so potent among companions in arms; that esprit du corps, that enthusiastic endeavor for success, which infuses a zeal into the career of arms and enwreaths it with the emblems of honor, although the pathways to its renown are more often the roads to death than to living success. Who can calculate the dynamic force of this power in the civil administration? We know what it is in war and under the flag. Let us utilize it and make it honorable in time of peace and in aid of peace.

THE CHARACTER OF THE PROPOSED BOARD.

I am aware that during all the time I have been explaining the provisions and scope of this bill the question has pressed itself upon the mind of every listener, how do you propose to secure the required degree of talent in these commissioners who are to form the central board and adjudicate upon the qualifications of all candidates; and how do you expect to prevent their acting upon political considerations in the selection of officers? Are you not constituting imperium in imperio, which may lead to abuses as great as those sought to be remedied?

This commission should undoubtedly be in good hands; and if constituted we must rely upon the President and the Senate in placing it in such hands, in the first instance, and keeping it there hereafter. There is a wide field from which to select these commissioners. I could name at least twenty fit and competent persons who would enter upon these duties with enthusiasm, and discharge them without reproach. I trust that the President and the Senate know many more. The proposed compensation is large enough to command the services of the most accomplished educators, men skilled in the arts of war and peace, and none others ought to be admitted into these offices. And no one need fear that the power of appointment will be attempted to be taken from heads of Departments and vested in these commissioners, or that the board will become a political instrument under the provisions of this bill. It gives them no political power or authority whatever. They merely select a class of persons from whom appointments are to be made, and they have no power to determine whether any incumbent of office should be removed, except upon trial after charges regularly preferred. They are, as before intimated, merely the assay officers in this great mint of mind and character, and they can have no inducement to betray their high trust. I do not fear the result of the mode of appointment provided in the bill. We have no fault to find with the appointees for similar commissions, and I doubt not both President and Senate will be desirous of procuring the services of the best men.

EXPENSE OF THE COMMISSION.

Nor am I disturbed by the cost of the proposed commission. The salaries may reach $20,000, and the expenses as much more in each year. A great portion, if not the whole, of this sum will be paid by the fees required of the applicants. But this sum is not equal to what has been paid in each year for many years for the expenses of investigating committees, whose reports have indeed exposed great rascality in the public service, but whose recommendations have led to very few enactments of positive law. If this commission can even approximately keep the rogues out of the public service, it will save tenfold more than all its expenses, and even more than all the proposed increase of salaries. In place of investigations which lead to nothing we shall have reports of the actual working of our reformed system in all its parts and details, with such recommendations as the officers who execute it may suggest for its improvement. The element of arbitrary power does not enter into the system. And by improving the quality and character of the public servants it is expected that the retrenchment and expense will be at least one third and probably one half of what is now paid, with a gain of fifty per cent. in efficiency. If our civil servants are appointed from their "official aptitude," as shown by their test examinations, and not from political or personal favor, it is safe to say that the Government will save all it now has to pay, or submit to be plundered for, by means of arrangements which hereafter could have no existence.

Thus, while this proposed system will stimulate education and bring the best attainable talent into the public service, it will place that service above all considerations of locality, favoritism, patronage, or party, and will give it permanence and the character of nationality as distinct from its present qualities of insecurity and of centralized power. A career will be opened to all who wish to serve the Republic; and although its range is limited, yet success in it will be an admitted qualification for that higher and more laborious and uncertain competition before the people, if any one should be tempted to enter upon it. The nation will be better served; the Government will be more stable and better administered; property will be more secure; personal rights more sacred; and the Republic more respected and powerful. The great experiment of self-government, which our fathers initiated will have another of its alien elements of discord removed from it, and in its administration, in peace as well as in war, will have become a grand success.

Mr. Speaker, I am also instructed by the committee to present a report on this subject, which I ask may be laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. That will be done unless objection be made.

There was no objection.

Mr. HALE. I desire to ask my colleague on the joint committee whether he wishes to bring this bill to a vote to-day. I wish to suggest that its consideration be postponed till after the morning hour, so that we may have at once the regular morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That motion would be in order.

Mr. JENCKES. I am willing to yield for that motion.

Mr. HALE. Is it the desire of the gentleman to bring the bill to a vote to-day?

Mr. JENCKES. As soon as practicable—perhaps not to-day.

Mr. HALE. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed till after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If I had obtained the floor just now I desired to move the postponement of this bill for a longer time.

The SPEAKER. When the bill is reached that motion will be in order.

SARAH A. GRAHAM.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Sarah A. Graham; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

RECONSTRUCTION COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. FARNSWORTH to fill the vacancy on the joint Committee on Reconstruction occasioned by the leave of absence granted to Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, for the remainder of the session.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order during the morning hour the call of committees for reports, beginning with the Committee on Agriculture.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. BIDWELL. Mr. Speaker, there was referred to the Committee on Agriculture the bill introduced by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DONNELLY] to reorganize the Department of Agriculture. I am under the necessity of stating to the House that the committee are not ready to report upon that bill; and for this reason I desire to ask that they may be allowed another morning hour at a later period. This is an important bill; and as chairman of the committee I desire to use every proper effort to have the committee consider the bill, so that we may report it to the House for its action. I am under a pledge to the House—I am under what I consider a responsibility in the discharge of my duty as a member of this House as well as a member of the Committee on Agriculture—to do what lies in my power to place the Department of Agriculture upon a footing that shall be commensurate with the wants of our country. I therefore ask that the Committee on Agriculture be allowed another morning hour in which to report on this subject.

Mr. STEVENS and others objected.

Mr. BIDWELL. Then I will state to the House, as an individual member of Congress, I will at an early day endeavor to bring before the House a bill to reorganize that Department. I will also state, in order to bring the matter before the House and country, that I have prepared a bill for that purpose; and I am willing it shall go upon the Journal of the House, so that members may see what it is proposed to do.

The bill proposed to be offered was, by unanimous consent, ordered to be printed.

PURCHASE OF SEEDS, ETC.

Mr. RITTER, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported a bill to regulate the purchase and distribution of seeds, &c., by the Commissioner of Agriculture; which was read the first and second time.

The bill provides that the Commissioner shall be instructed and directed to purchase for distribution only such seeds, plants, and flowers as are not common in the United States; and that all seeds, plants, and flowers which have been generally cultivated or raised in the majority of the States during the period of four years shall be considered as common in the country, and therefore are not to be purchased for distribution by or for the Department of Agriculture; and it provides further, that the moneys appropriated by Congress for specified objects and purposes for the use of said bureau shall not be used for any other object or purpose than the one appointed without the consent of Congress; provided seeds, plants, and flowers purchased by said Commissioner before the passage of this act shall be distributed as heretofore.

Mr. RITTER. That bill is for the purpose of attaining the object sought by the Government since the organization of that bureau. At the last session a provision was put into the appropriation bill that the Commissioner should only purchase such seeds as were new and useful.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend by inserting the word "Department" for "bureau." The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The gentleman from Kentucky yields to me for a few moments.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think the House fully understands the full importance of this measure. The Department of Agriculture was, in my view, established for the purpose of disseminating seeds grown in the United States, and the only benefit I can see arising from that Department is the exchange from one State to another of the different seeds grown in those States.

The proposition of this bill is to cut off this interchange from one State to another, and to confine the Department entirely to the purchase and distribution of seeds not generally grown in the United States. The great benefit now derived from the Department is in the fact that seeds grown in Illinois are brought here and sent to Pennsylvania, while the seeds grown in Pennsylvania are sent to Illinois, and we in the West derive the benefit from the experience of Pennsylvania. For my part I think the bill as now framed is entirely wrong, and will confine the Department to the purchase of seeds which we do not need.

Mr. RITTER. I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Mr. Speaker, as one of the agriculturists of the country I hope this bill will pass. The abuses of the Department as now practiced will eventually discredit and ruin the Department. The object of the Department was originally to distribute such seeds as were rare. Now, we get no seeds that are rare, but only those that can be bought out of any seed-shop in any portion of the United States are sent to us for distribution. So common are these seeds that members of Congress are made the laughing-stock of all the seed merchants of the country. The restriction is a proper one, that no seeds shall be purchased which have been common in the country for four years prior to the date of purchase.

The friends of the Department should see it is not broken down by existing abuses. I do not blame the present Commissioner. Twenty-five years ago I was here and distributed seeds from this bureau. The mail facilities and railroad facilities were not then as now. From that day to this great changes have taken place; but I do think it is the smallest business this country can engage in—to run in opposition to the seed merchants with money out of the public Treasury. Therefore I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. HILL. It appears to me the bill in its present shape will destroy the usefulness of the Department of Agriculture. It provides that it shall only purchase seeds, &c., not common to the United States within four years of the purchase. It does not say particular kinds of wheat or corn, but all plants, all grains; all kinds that have been cultivated shall be deemed common. Now, I would like to know what is to be purchased under this bill by the Commissioner. He cannot purchase wheat because almost all kinds of wheat have been commonly cultivated. Now, it was suggested the other day by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] that the usefulness of this Department is in transmitting from one portion of the country to another seeds that have, so to speak, been worn out, but which by a change of climate may be made to produce much more bountifully. The benefit to the country from that practice which the Department has been carrying out has been very great.

Mr. DONNELLY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RITTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. DONNELLY. I thoroughly concur in the purpose of the gentleman from Kentucky in offering this bill. It is, as I understand, to prevent the Department of Agriculture from degenerating into a mere seed-store. There is no doubt very just cause of complaint on that score, but it seems to me this bill would go too far. It is crude and imperfect. Now, the difference between certain portions of the territory of the United States is in respect to climate and soil as great as between almost any different portions of the world. The difference between the southern portion of the United States and the northern is as great as regards climate and soil as between Europe and the United States. I think therefore that a bill that would utterly exclude everything but foreign seeds would be improper.

I move that the bill be recommended to the Committee on Agriculture. The chairman of that committee in the bill to which he referred this morning has incorporated a proviso which I think would elevate the Department to new usefulness, making it the duty of the Department to superintend, transmit, and exchange the seeds from one portion of the country to the other, a work of itself of great magnitude and of great use, but which it seems to me would be utterly prevented by the passage of this bill. I would make that motion if it is in order, with leave to the committee to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be made until the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. RITTER] surrenders the floor.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. RITTER. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope this bill will be passed. I regard it as one of the most revolutionary that has been introduced.

A MEMBER. Radical. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. It proposes to break up settled habits of the people, and is therefore, if not radical, certainly revolutionary. For six years I have been in the habit of sending to my constituents china-asters, sweet-williams, pinks, and a long list of simple flower seeds, as contributions from the Agricultural Department, and I know nothing that would more astonish them than to get the seed of a new flower or one from a distant country.

A MEMBER. Do you get hollyhocks?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, hollyhocks in great abundance, single and double, but always out of the same bag, which has doubtless been on hand since 1860. I therefore regard the bill as a revolutionary one, and as a Radical I give it my hearty support. I regret exceedingly that the chairman of the Agricultural Committee could not report his bill to reorganize the Department to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I would suggest to the gentleman whether, under this bill, any flowers can be purchased.

Mr. KELLEY. If that be so, it would be so much the greater economy, for I doubt whether the Department would purchase any that are valuable or novel, so devoted are its agents to the old catalogue. I hope the bill will pass and any other bill contracting the power of this Department until it can be reorganized so that of the many thousands of dollars we appropriate to it some few tens of them may go to some useful purpose.

Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, I cannot claim the credit of originating this bill, for the subject has been before Congress since 1862, at the time the Department of Agriculture was established. I therefore am not desirous of claiming honors I am not entitled to.

Now, sir, as I remarked before, Congress very clearly in passing the law establishing this Department of Agriculture confined the business of the Department to new and rare seeds, showing conclusively that they did not intend the Department should purchase and distribute the common seeds of the country. They had no idea of making it a depot for the purpose of distributing seeds. Sir, in 1865 the Department purchased seeds amounting to $28,000, and the putting up of those seeds in little paper or cotton bags cost upward of forty thousand dollars. The gentleman knows that they might have been put up at a less cost. The largest proportion of the business of the Department is done in the furnishing of the common seeds of the country; and everybody knows that a large proportion of the seeds furnished do not germinate, do not come up at all. It requires a large expenditure of money to provide for the distribution of these seeds, and it is well known that the seeds when received amount to nothing.

But the gentleman says that we want this Department of Agriculture as a channel of exchange between one part of the country and another. Well, sir, after an article of seed goes into the ground throughout the country for four years it certainly becomes a matter of importance to the country, but it will not be wanted through the Department of Agriculture, for it can be obtained through the ordinary channels. Of the important seeds that are distributed over the country this Department sends out a very small amount, as the gentleman very well knows.

I do not deem it necessary to detain the House any longer by remarks upon this subject. It is one that seems to have engaged the attention of every Congress, and therefore I move the previous question upon the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RITTER. I will.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the phraseology of this bill, and I would inquire whether it is in the language of the head of the Department of Agriculture or in the language of the Committee on Agriculture? One clause of it reads as follows: "Seeds and flowers that have been generally cultivated or raised in a majority of the United States."

Mr. RITTER. That is a mistake, and it can be corrected.

Mr. MORRILL. There are several other little mistakes, and I hope that the bill will be recommitted, so as to afford the gentleman an opportunity of revising the language. Until it is revised the bill should certainly not be passed.

Mr. RITTER. I understand that, it is clear enough for the gentleman to understand it, and any mistakes in grammar can be corrected hereafter. I insist on the previous question.

Mr. HILL. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The question was put, and there were—ayes 45, noes 33; no quorum voting.

Mr. WENTWORTH called for tellers.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will withdraw the previous question and allow this bill to be recommitted to his committee with authority to report at any time, provided that it shall not interfere with the morning hour.

Mr. ALLISON. I object, for the reason that this committee has the morning hour to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. They have not.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I object. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HILL and RITTER were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 48.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. HILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE communicated to the House of Representatives a message in writing from the President of the United States.

MASSACRE AT FORT PHIL. KEARNEY.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, requested to furnish to this House such information as he may have in his possession in relation to the late massacre of United States troops at Fort Phil. Kearney, and the causes which produced the same; and also as to the causes which, in his judgment, have led to the present alarming condition of our relations with the Indian tribes of the interior.

INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS IN OREGON, ETC.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, the Committee on Indian Affairs were discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 1023, to indemnify the citizens of the Territory of Washington and State of Oregon for property destroyed by Indians in the years 1855 and 1856; and the same was laid on the table.

INDIAN AFFAIRS IN ARIZONA.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, the Committee on Indian Affairs were also discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 29, for the better organization of Indian affairs in Arizona Territory; and the same was laid on the table.

DR. F. P. CULVER.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, the Committee on Indian Affairs were also discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 769, for the relief of Dr. F. P. Culver, late the special agent and commissioner to negotiate a treaty with certain Indian tribes; and the same was laid on the table.

INDIANS IN NORTHERN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. WINDOM also, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back House bill No. 572, in relation to Round valley and other Indian reservations in northern California, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute was read, as follows:

A bill to provide for the care and maintenance of the Indians in northern California.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to adopt such measures as he may deem necessary for the public interest, in order to obtain possession of the whole or so much as he may deem advisable of Round valley, in Mendocino county, California, and render the reservation now established there of suitable proportions to answer the purpose of a home for the protection and maintenance of so many of the Indians in northern California as it may be found compatible with the public interest to locate on said reservation; and to this end he is hereby empowered to fix the limits of the said reservation at such average distance, not to exceed ten miles from the border of the said valley and circumjacent thereto, as he may determine; and to purchase the improvements belonging to settlers, in order to acquire full and complete possession of all the land within the limits so established.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Interior to carry into effect the provisions of this act and of any other existing law authorizing him to establish a reservation in northern California: Provided, That no liabilities shall be incurred under this act in excess of the amount hereby appropriated.

Mr. MORRILL. As this bill provides for an appropriation, should it not be first considered in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is an appropriation bill; and if the gentleman insists upon his point of order, it must go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to withdraw his point of order until the gentleman from California [Mr. BIDWELL] can explain the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I will reserve my point of order for the present.

Mr. BIDWELL. The care and maintenance of the Indians in California have already cost the Government a very considerable sum. But the duty still devolves upon the Government to care for and protect the Indians of that State. The Indians there are very differently situated from what they are in most of the Territories of the United States. They do not consist of tribes as they do in the other Territories; tribes with whom you can enter into treaties and negotiations for the purchase of their lands, and for the assignment to them of reservations where they may live upon their hunting grounds or cultivate the soil for their own proper maintenance.

Before the acquisition of California the Government of Mexico never under any circumstances pretended to purchase the land of the Indians. The Government of the United States, succeeding to the rights of Mexico, have never purchased a single acre of land, to my knowledge, from the Indians of California. On the contrary, the white settlements have been extended throughout the entire State, almost into every valley, however secluded, in the mountains of that State; thereby taking from the Indians their hunting grounds and every possible means they have in their power for their support.

I say, therefore, notwithstanding the immense sums which the Government may have heretofore appropriated for the maintenance of the Indians in California, it is still an obligation upon the Government to properly provide for them. Here is a valley in the mountains of the coast range, distant from the settlements, and large enough to support a considerable portion, if not all of them, of the Indians in northern California. That valley at this time is partially occupied by a reservation on which a large number of Indians are located; it is also partially in the occupation of settlers.

The object of the bill now before the House is this: to enable the Government to acquire possession of the entire valley. Now, the reason for that is evident; you cannot take care of the Indians, you cannot have that complete control over them if they are located in the vicinity of white settlements which you could if they were distant from them.

I may state here that in California one of the great obstacles to the management of the Indians there is the existence of a class of loose people, men of bad morals, who congregate around the Indian reservations, furnish the Indians with liquor, teach them every vice, and induce them to run away from the reservations. Now to prevent these troubles it is necessary to get a location for them distant from the settlements. This Round valley, spoken of in the bill, seems to be peculiarly fitted for a reservation for Indian purposes. It possesses a fertile soil, a salubrious climate, and it is ample in its extent. Being in the mountains, which are incapable of settlement, it will be so isolated that no white settlers can come near its borders.

There is another view to be taken of this matter: the settlements in this valley have been threatened for a number of years with being dispossessed by the Government on the ground that it was the intention of the Government to take possession of the entire valley, and dedicate it to the purposes of an Indian reservation. But they have gone there as they have on all other public unsurveyed lands and established their preemption claims; and now over a hundred settlers, I believe, occupy that valley in connection with the Indian reservation. It is the duty of this Government to come to a decision and say whether it intends to make that entire valley a reservation. It is inconsistent with the interests of the Indian Department, the proper management and control of the Indians, that white settlements should be in juxtaposition with the reservation; and I say that the Government ought either to take possession of the whole valley and make it a suitable reservation or abandon it altogether. There is some fear in the State of California, which I have learned from the public prints, that the Indians might possibly be disturbed upon the other reservations. In order to do away with any such apprehension, I am willing to offer a substitute for this bill, to which I think there can be no objection, and which I think, too, will harmonize with the views of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I ask to have the substitute read.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to the consideration of this bill unless it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made, the bill, as it contains an appropriation, must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BIDWELL. When will the bill come up for action?

The SPEAKER. Probably not during this session, except under a suspension of the rules by a two-thirds vote, when that motion is in order.

Mr. BIDWELL. Can the rules be suspended on any Monday to take it up?

The SPEAKER. At this period of the session it is impossible for the Chair to state when any Monday will be open for a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BIDWELL. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SPALDING. I must decline to do so.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

INSPECTION OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back, with amendment, the bill (S. No. 204) to provide for an annual inspection of Indian affairs, and for other purposes.

The bill, which was read, provides in the first section that there shall be established five inspection districts of Indian affairs, as follows: one to embrace the States of California and Nevada and the Territory of Arizona; one to embrace the State of Oregon and the Territories of Washington and Idaho; one to embrace the Territories of Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico; one to embrace the State of Kansas, the Indian Territory, Nebraska, and southern Dakota; and one to embrace the State of Minnesota and that part of the Territory of Dakota north of Nebraska, and the Territory of Montana. The Secretary of the Interior, under the direction of the President, is authorized from time to time to change the boundaries of these inspection districts.

The second section provides for the creation of five boards of inspection of Indian affairs, each to consist of three members, one chief inspector, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall hold his office for the term of four years; one inspector, to be an officer of the regular Army, who shall be annually detailed by the Secretary of War for that purpose; and one, to be annually appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among such persons as may be recommended by the annual meetings or conventions of the religious societies or denominations of the United States as suitable persons to act upon said boards; or in case of their failure to make such recommendation, from such persons as he shall deem proper. Each of the inspectors appointed by the President is to receive a salary of $4,000 per annum, in full for services, mileage, and all other expenses, and the officer detailed to act as inspector is to serve without additional pay or allowance as such inspector, but is to be entitled to the same pay, mileage, and allowances as when employed in the military service.

The third section provides that it shall be the duty of said boards of inspection to visit all the Indian tribes within their respective districts at least once in each year; to examine into their condition, and into the condition of their farms and schools; to hear their complaints; to ascertain whether all the stipulations of treaties are kept; and whether all moneys, goods, and supplies are faithfully and justly applied, purchased, and distributed; to examine into the books, accounts, and manner of doing business of the superintendents and agents within their respective districts; to make diligent inquiry into the conduct of the officers and employes of the Indian department, and into the conduct of the military forces toward the Indians, with power to summon witnesses, and by the aid of the military, who are directed to aid them, to compel their attendance; each member of the board being authorized to administer oaths. The board is authorized to suspend for cause any officer or employe of the Indian department in their respective districts, subject to the approval of the President. The board is to report annually, or as often as may be required, to the Secretary of the Interior, and in all cases of suspension from office by the board of any officer or employe of the Indian department the board is to make immediate report thereon in writing, stating the cause thereof, for the action of the President.

The fourth section provides that all superintendents of Indian affairs, all Indian agents, and the chief inspectors to be appointed under this act, in addition to the powers now conferred by law, shall also possess all the powers and perform all the duties now conferred by law upon circuit court commissioners or court commissioners in all cases or matters wherein any Indian tribe, or any member of any Indian tribe, shall be concerned or be a party. And that in all matters or proceedings wherein any Indian tribe, or member of an Indian tribe, shall be concerned or be a party, the testimony of Indian witnesses shall be received in all courts and before all officers of the United States.

The fifth section provides that the salaries of all Indian agents, who reside in the Indian country upon reservations or among the Indians of their agency, shall hereafter be fixed at the sum of $1,800 per annum.

The sixth section provides that no member of the board of inspectors, during his continuance in office, shall, in any manner whatever, become engaged in any business connected with trade or intercourse with Indian tribes, or with any member of any Indian tribe, or become in any manner interested therein. And upon entering upon the discharge of their official duties the inspectors are to take the oath of office now prescribed by law.

The seventh section provides that any loyal citizen of the United States of good moral character shall be permitted to trade with any Indian tribe, provided he shall execute the bond required by law and complies with the regulations prescribed for carrying on intercourse with the Indian tribes.

Mr. WINDOM. I am instructed by the committee to move to strike out "complies" and insert "comply."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I am also instructed to move to add the following to section seven:

And with such other regulations and conditions as may be prescribed by the board of inspection hereby created.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota to yield, to have this bill printed. It involves a large annual expenditure, and I am sure a bill as important as this should be fully understood.

Mr. WINDOM. I should be glad to yield to have it printed if it will not prevent its being acted upon at this session of Congress. I will yield to have it printed if I shall have leave to call it up at any time.

Mr. MORRILL. Will it not involve the country in an annual expenditure of $100,000?

Mr. WINDOM. It will do no such thing.

Mr. Speaker, I will say in answer to the gentleman that the bill does involve an expenditure of $40,000, but will save half as many millions, as I believe can be shown by an investigation.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be pending at the expiration of the morning hour and will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to make one remark. This is, sir, as the gentleman from Vermont has said, an important bill, containing a great deal of detail in relation to the organization of the Indian Bureau, and involving a new system of operations in some degree. I dare say, though read at the Clerk's desk as it is, it will be impossible to follow it understandingly; I dare say it is framed with a view to inaugurating a reform in that bureau. It is a long bill, which we ought to act on with at all comprehension of its scope and effect, and for that reason, if for no other, it ought not to be carried through under the previous question.

In addition to that I wish to remark there is a bill pending now in this House transferring all that relates to the charge of the Indians to the War Department. The matter has been fully under consideration by the Military Committee, and I am directed to report in favor of that bill with some few amendments. Here, then, will come into conflict a question to be presented to this House, whether it is not time to take the responsibility from one and transfer it to another Department of the Government. I shall be glad on that account if this bill should not be acted on without being printed, so the two propositions may be considered together. We make a radical reform by transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department, where it was at first, from its present place, where it cannot be denied it has become a den of thieves.

Mr. SPALDING. Has not this bill already passed the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM. It has.

Mr. KASSON. I have examined the Senate file in vain for it.

Mr. WINDOM. It was printed at the last session. I have no objection to the printing of the bill. I move that the bill and amendments be printed.

The motion to print was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over.

FRAZER, TRENHOLM AND COMPANY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 7th instant in relation to the attempted compromise of certain suits instituted in the English courts in behalf of the United States against Frazer, Trenholm & Co., alleged agents of the so-called confederate government, I transmit a report from the Secretary of State and the documents by which it was accompanied.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 28, 1867.

On motion of Mr. DEMING, the message and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN PROTESTANT CHAPEL AT ROME.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 24th instant.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1867.

To the President:

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives, passed on the 24th of January 1867, requesting the President, if not inconsistent with the public interest, to communicate to the House of Representatives any information which may have been received by the Government in relation to a removal of the Protestant church or religious assembly meeting at the American embassy from the city of Rome by an order of that Government, has the honor to report that the Department of State has received no information concerning the subject inquired of in the said resolution.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1867.

The message and accompanying document were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

NEW ORLEANS RIOT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 12th ultimo and its request of the 28th instant for all correspondence, reports, and information in my possession in relation to the riot which occurred in the city of New Orleans on the 30th day of July last, I transmit herewith copies of telegraphic dispatches upon the subject, and reports from the Secretary of War, with the papers accompanying the same.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1867.

On motion of Mr. ELIOT, the message and accompanying papers were referred to the select Committee on the New Orleans Riot, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. PERHAM, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill providing for the payment of pensions, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from their first amendment to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

Strike out the word "October" and insert "July." Strike out all after the word "act" in line eleven of the House amendment to the end of said amendment.

That the Senate recede from their second amendment to the amendment of the House, and in lieu thereof agree to insert the words "and the commissions of all other pension agents now in office shall continue for four years from the passage of this act, unless such agents are sooner removed."

SIDNEY PERHAM,

J. P. BENJAMIN,

NELSON TAYLOR,

Managers on the part of the House.

H. S. LANE,

L. TRUMBULL,

C. R. BUCKALEW,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. PERHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFENSE OF NORTHEASTERN FRONTIER.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House three thousand extra copies of the majority and minority reports of the Committee on Foreign Affairs on the bill providing for the defense of the northeastern frontier.

MINERAL RESOURCES.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the same committee, reported the following resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Treasury Department one thousand copies of the report of J. Ross Browne upon the mineral resources of the States and Territories west of the Rocky mountains.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. LAFLIN, from the same committee, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFLIN] is entitled to the floor upon his resolution.

Mr. LAFLIN. I am nearly convinced that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania understood the amount of work that is before the Committee on Printing he would not interpose an objection of this character at this time. If the Committee on Printing had availed itself of the privilege which was conceded to many committees of this House it would have had a clerk during the last session; and it is because that committee has been endeavoring to prosecute its work without a clerk, and because it is now so overwhelmed with business that it is perfectly impossible for it to transact that business without some outside assistance that it asks the House to allow it this clerk.

In this connection I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that the House has passed a resolution requiring the Committee on Printing to inquire into all contracts connected with the furnishing of paper to the Government, and although I do not desire to claim for the committee any special credit, I may say in their behalf that the examinations they have made for themselves, without the assistance of any clerk, required a long and tedious investigation, and have resulted in a conclusion which will save the Government at least $40,000, by providing for a reduction of the weight of the paper upon which the public documents are to be printed.

There are subjects which require much care and attention, and I do not deem it very immodest when a committee so burdened ask, even at this late hour of the session, for the services of a clerk.

Again, gentlemen of the House will remember that they have referred to us numerous resolutions touching the publication of the Congressional Globe. No committee can report to the House on such a subject without carefully deciding what they propose to do. If it cannot be demonstrated to the House that it will be for the interest of the Government of the United States to discontinue their reports we do not propose so to report. But if it shall be found by the committee that such a course will be for the interest of the Government, we want the facts upon which we base our opinion to be recorded so that the House may act intelligently thereon.

Again, it has already been proposed to reorganize the whole printing department, involving a thorough and radical change in the administration of that department; and I submit to any gentleman connected with any committee if it would be in the power of any committee to give such careful and considerate examination to such subjects without aid?

Again, yesterday the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary had referred to the Committee on Printing a bill which will require them to make an examination into the manner in which the laws, treaties, and proclamations made and issued since the year 1861 are to be published in the States lately in rebellion, a subject which will require much investigation. I might go on and mention instance after instance, but I believe I have already said enough to convince the House that the Committee on Printing is entitled to a clerk.

Mr. CONKLING. How long do you want your clerk?

Mr. LAFLIN. For this session; and I may say further, lest some gentleman may suppose that this resolution is introduced in the interest of some member of the committee, that we have no person in view for the position, and that if the resolution pass, we shall have to seek a man to fill it. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LAFLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAFLIN also moved to reconsider the votes by which the various resolutions reported by him from the Committee on Printing were agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERTISING IN THE NATIONAL REPUBLICAN.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be requested to inquire, and report under what law the advertisement for proposals for paper for the public printing is published in the National Republican of this city.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING THE ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. ANCONA, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which went to the Committee on Printing under the law, namely:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House two thousand copies each of the Army Register for the years 1866 and 1867.

INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS IN OREGON—AGAIN.

On motion of Mr. WINDOM, by unanimous consent, House bill No. 1023, to indemnify the citizens of the Territory of Washington and State of Oregon for property destroyed by Indians in the years 1855 and 1856, which was reported upon adversely this morning by the Committee on Indian Affairs, was taken from the table, and recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.)

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business in order is the House bill No. 903, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1868.

On motion of Mr. STEVENS, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with by unanimous consent.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill for amendments.

The bill appropriates for the payment of pensions for the year ending the 30th of June, 1868, as follows:

For invalid pensions under various acts, $10,000,000.

For pensions of widows, children, mothers and sisters of soldiers, under various acts, and for compensation to pension agents and expenses of agencies, $23,000,000.

For Navy pensions to widows, children, mothers and sisters, as provided by various acts, and to be paid from the Navy pension fund, $280,000.

No amendment being offered, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

CONSULAR, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The next bill in order is House bill No. 904 making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of this bill be dispensed with.

Mr. SLOAN. I object.

The bill was then read at length.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by clauses for amendment.

The following clause was read:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary, ministers, and commissioners of the United States at Great Britain, France, Russia, Prussia, Spain, Austria, Brazil, Republic of Mexico, China, Italy, Chili, Peru, Switzerland, Rome, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Turkey, New Grenada, Bolivia, Ecuador, Venezuela, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Sandwich Islands, Costa Rica, Honduras, Argentine Confederation, Paraguay, and Salvador, $301,000.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to amend this clause by inserting the word "Portugal" after the word "Brazil;" and also by increasing the gross amount appropriated by this clause by the addition of $7,500.

Mr. Chairman, I understand, from an examination of all the records to which I have had access, and by inquiry at the State Department, that we still have a minister resident near the Government of Portugal. And on further inquiry I understand that the salary of that minister is $7,500 a year. It seems that from some cause (I do not profess to be familiar with all the reasons) at the last session of Congress the appropriation for the payment of the salary of that minister was omitted. I learn that the minister now residing near the Government of Portugal was appointed on the 28th day of March, 1861, by Mr. Lincoln; his nomination was confirmed by the Senate, and he is still in commission as the present minister of this Government to that country.

I take it, therefore, that the reasons for withholding the appropriation to pay his salary as minister must be very urgent indeed, or the Congress of the United States will not longer be induced to pursue that course. I certainly have heard of no good reasons for thus refusing to pay this man his salary. I confess that I regarded the withholding of his salary at the last session as very extraordinary legislation on the part of Congress. I do not say that it was unjustifiable legislation, because I do not pretend, as I before remarked, to know all the reasons which induced it. But it is a precedent which I think we should be very reluctant to set in matters of this kind. Matters pertaining to the diplomatic affairs of the country are committed to the Executive. Many of the duties pertaining to this branch of the public service are kept from the public view—are what are commonly known as state secrets. Many things occur in that branch of the public service which are not deemed fit matters for publication. When we call for information from the Department of State we usually make the call through the President, with the reservation that he shall communicate the information asked only in case he shall consider it not incompatible with the public interest to do so. Very great discretion, therefore, is intrusted to the President in the management of the foreign affairs of this country. And I think we should not attempt to abridge that discretion, except for weighty and sufficient reasons, well known to ourselves and to the country.

It is with a view, therefore, of ascertaining why the salary is withheld from our minister to Portugal that I have moved this amendment. I am quite sure the House ought to adopt the amendment, unless some good reasons can be urged to the contrary.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, for any explanation he may desire to make.

Mr. STEVENS. I shall very willingly give the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] the reasons why the appropriation to which he refers has been left out of this bill. It was left out of the appropriation bill of last year and an express enactment was made that no further payment of salary should be made to that minister. I am sorry to hear the gentleman say that that minister still continues there in defiance of Congress. The reason the appropriation was omitted last year was that there had appeared in the New York papers a very long letter from Mr. Harvey to the Secretary of State, in which, among other things, after a fulsome eulogy of the President, to which I did not object because I thought it very becoming, he indulged in a most foul and vulgar abuse of Congress.

I am sorry that the letter is not here now to be read. It was published in the Globe of the last session. In that letter Mr. Harvey denounced Congress as corrupt, and said everything else which it was possible for him to say to please gentlemen at the other end of the avenue. This letter was sent to the President, and he deemed it so good a thing that he sent it to a New York paper to be published. The House called upon the Secretary of State for a copy of that letter to ascertain its authenticity. Its authenticity was certified to by the Secretary of State, who sent us a full copy of the whole letter. The letter, when read to the House, will I think be found to bear the character which I have given it, as a most abusive, vulgar, vile attack upon Congress, which it denounces as fit for anything else than its duties.

This is the same Mr. Harvey who was believed to have communicated information to the enemy upon the eve of the bombardment of Fort Sumter; and in consequence of this fact being discovered the Union Senators, a short time after his confirmation, waited in a body upon the President and asked that his appointment should be revoked. But the President, in the goodness of his heart, could not think of doing such a thing; and Harvey was suffered to retain the position. He remained there until he wrote this attack upon Congress. If he is there now he is there in defiance of the will of Congress; and I trust he will be allowed to pay his own expenses. His name was stricken from the appropriation bill of last year, and this further provision was added:

And no money shall be paid to the present minister resident at Portugal out of any fund whatever on account of further services in his office.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have that act before me, and I desire to ask the gentleman whether he supposes that the effect of that provision was to repeal the general consular and diplomatic act regulating our foreign relations, passed, I believe, in 1856, which act provides for a minister resident at Portugal, and fixes his salary. If the provision in the act of last year does not have the effect to repeal the act of 1856, then I desire to inquire whether simply leaving the name of this minister out of the appropriation bill will do anything more than throw over the payment of this officer, to be provided for as an item in a deficiency bill.

I will remark further, if the gentleman will allow me, that I have no doubt that either the executive or the legislative department of the Government may with propriety object in the most emphatic manner to continuing in an official position abroad one who would slander or abuse or in any way misrepresent that particular department of the Government. I can conceive why the Executive should refuse to accredit any officer who would so misrepresent that department. It seems to me that we may with equal propriety refuse to appropriate money to pay a man who abuses and misrepresents the legislative department of the Government. But I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether in his opinion the act of last session repeals the act of 1856, to which I have referred, and if it does not, whether the omission of the appropriation from this bill does not simply throw over the item to be provided for in a deficiency bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose that the act to which I have just referred is a legitimate enactment. This Congress declares that so long as this man retains the position he shall have no pay; and if this is not a sufficient hint for him and for the Government I do not know what would be. There is a general continuing provision of law that this man shall receive no money; and I propose that we shall do now as we did last year—omit from the appropriation bill any provision for his payment as minister abroad. If he chooses to stay there till doomsday let him do so. I think that out of the country is the best place for him to be.

Mr. MAYNARD. I submit to the gentleman whether the object he has in view will be accomplished in that way. Suppose that we should refuse to make provision for the payment of this officer, either in the regular appropriation bill or in a deficiency bill; if he should apply to the Court of Claims will not that court, in executing the law, be compelled to render judgment in his favor, which will be a charge upon the Treasury?

Mr. STEVENS. I do not see how the Court of Claims could render judgment in opposition to a direct act of Congress declaring that a man occupying a particular place shall be paid nothing.

Suppose under the act to which the gentleman refers it had been provided the minister at Portugal should be paid $800, and Congress afterward passed a law he should not be paid anything, does not that repeal the substantial part of the first law?

Mr. MAYNARD. I fail to make myself understood by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The question I proposed goes behind that. Does the act of the last session have any other effect than to suspend the payment of the salary for that year, leaving the law afterward to be revived in full force?

Mr. STEVENS. The act to which I refer is a general act. So far as this salary is concerned the committee of conference of the two Houses at the last session thought it best to put it in this shape.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say one word in regard to this proposition, especially as I was instrumental to a certain extent in procuring the publication of the letter on account of which the present minister at Portugal is deprived of his salary. I have no very distinct recollection of the precise language of that letter, but I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that it does not deserve the characterization just given to it by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] It was a letter which did express differences of opinion from Congress; but I fail to recollect any language or any sentiment in it which ascribes to Congress corrupt motives, or which can be properly styled "a foul and vulgar abuse of Congress." I do not think, sir, those terms are warranted by the language of the letter. That, however, can speedily be decided, if any one is interested in fastening that character upon it, by referring to the Globe, in which it is published.

Now, sir, it must be borne in mind this was strictly a private letter, written by Mr. Harvey as an American citizen, residing abroad, to the Secretary of State, his personal friend. It was not an official letter; it was not intended to be made public at all; and but for the act of the Secretary of State and my own agency in the matter it would not have seen the light. If any one is to be punished for the publication of that letter it certainly is not the gentleman who wrote it.

Mr. Chairman, it is confessed, it is avowed here the only object of this provision is to punish Mr. Harvey for writing that letter, to punish him as a citizen for expressing different opinions from those held by Congress. It is said this is the only way in which we can get rid of a man who expresses opinions adverse to Congress. Well, sir, if that is so, and if Congress chooses to enter upon a general scheme to get rid of all office-holders who speak disrespectfully of its conduct and its opinions, let us make our action general; let us apply the rule to all. That I can understand; but I see no special reasons for now singling out this particular office-holder for this species of punishment.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, I know, does not suppose for one moment Mr. Harvey is the only man in possession of office who has expressed differences of opinion from Congress. If, then, he wishes to make this a general rule, let him bring in a bill to that effect. Let him remove all office-holders or deprive them of their salaries when they are guilty of the presumption of expressing opinions different from those entertained and acted upon by Congress. Mr. Harvey was appointed to this office, it must be remembered, by Mr. Lincoln, and confirmed by the Senate after the act to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has alluded, and after the charges to which he now refers were investigated and inquired into.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Harvey was appointed before it was known, and when it was known the Republican Senators went in a body and asked the President to remove him.

Mr. RAYMOND. The whole of them—all the Republican Senators?

Mr. STEVENS. I think so—the large majority of them.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask a question. I understand one of the charges made against Mr. Harvey is that he communicated information to the enemy at the breaking out of the war. I understand it is said by the chairman of the committee those facts were brought to the attention of Mr. Lincoln by a body of Republican members of Congress, who urged his removal on that ground, and on those facts he declined to remove him from office. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations whether he charges President Lincoln with complicity either after or before in the treasonable conduct of Mr. Harvey.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not say that the appropriation was stricken out on that account; I said it was on account of the letter. Then I went on to describe who Harvey was, and stated that Mr. Lincoln did not know of his having written this letter when he appointed him, and being a good-natured man he never wanted to remove anybody after he had appointed him. I do not think Mr. Lincoln approved of him at all, but he had not the heart to turn out a man whom he had put there.

And while I am up allow me to say that the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] rather perverts the grounds upon which I put it. I did not put it on the ground of expressing opinions—God knows we should remove a good many if we did—but on the ground of vulgar abuse of Congress; not because he supported the policy of the President and opposed that of Congress, but because he acted like a black-guard. I have sent for the letter in order that the House may understand it, and after it is read I will move to pass this over.

Mr. HALE. Will my colleague allow me a single question, following out what he has already said?

Mr. RAYMOND. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. My question is this: whether when this subject was presented to Mr. Lincoln the gentleman is not satisfied that Mr. Lincoln was convinced that the charges against Mr. Harvey were unfounded, otherwise he would have been removed?

Mr. RAYMOND. In regard to the original appointment of Mr. Harvey by Mr. Lincoln, which was confirmed by the Senate, the gentleman from Pennsylvania now says that Mr. Lincoln was requested, as he believes, by a majority of the Senate to remove Mr. Harvey for certain reasons which they assigned. The President did not see fit to remove him. The gentleman thinks it was because he had not nerve—because he was too kind-hearted. Sir, I never knew an instance during my acquaintance with President Lincoln when he had not the nerve to do justice to his country by the removal of any public officer whose case called for such interposition, especially any one who had been guilty of treasonable practices such as are charged upon Mr. Harvey. I know that at that time many things which he did were complained of by members of Congress and others, but I think the judgment of the country then sustained him rather than those who made complaint, and that it has reaffirmed that judgment since. I believe if Mr. Lincoln had known Mr. Harvey to have been guilty of the acts charged upon him and with the motives now ascribed to him he would have been promptly removed.

But that is not, as the gentleman says, the reason for striking out his salary. He now assigns as the reason, not that Mr. Harvey expressed opinions different from those held by Congress, but because he did it in a coarse and abusive style—that he was guilty of vulgar abuse of Congress and "acted like a black-guard." Now, sir, that is to a certain extent a matter of taste. The gentleman's tastes are more refined and more fastidious in that respect probably than my own or those of other members of the House; but I submit that he ought to be careful in applying so stringent a rule on points of taste to persons holding official positions in the Government. It is barely possible that a large number of the office-holders throughout the land might not come up to his high requirements in matters of taste in the use of language. I submit that he should make the matter of taste of more general application and not restrict it to Mr. Harvey or to any single man.

Why, sir, I can produce a hundred, yes a thousand other men holding office who have expressed their opinions of Congress in a great deal stronger and more flagrant terms than any used by Mr. Harvey in the letter now in question. Why not apply the same rule to them? Why not, if all men are to be brought to this rigid rule and made to conform to the fastidious taste of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the use of language, why not introduce a section in the appropriation bill that such a postmaster at such a place, that such a naval officer in such a city, that such a revenue collector in such a port, having been detected in expressing their opinions of Congress in terms which strike the gentleman from Pennsylvania as vulgar and indecent, shall receive no salaries during the remainder of their official terms. I submit that this is no ground upon which we can act with due regard to our self-respect. If we want these men out of office let us make a law to get them out. Let us make representation in the proper quarter, and get them out by the proper means. Let us do it, if we do it at all, in a straightforward manner—one which we can persuade ourselves at least is consistent with our sense of justice and fair dealing if we cannot vindicate it before the people.

I do not believe the people of this country desire that any man should be thrust out of office by simply starving him out, by depriving him of the salary which the law awards him as long as he holds his place and does its duties. I have no special interest in this case. It is a matter of not the slightest consequence to me whether Mr. Harvey receives his salary or not. But it is of some consequence to us all to pursue a course in this matter which will meet the approbation of our sober judgment when the excitement of party and personal resentment has passed away.

Mr. MAYNARD. Before the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] resumes his seat, I desire to make an inquiry of him. I have heard it stated, but I do not know how true it is, and I call the attention of the gentleman to it, believing that he may perhaps be able to verify or refute the statement, that a dispatch was found in the telegraph office of this city, in the handwriting of Mr. Harvey, and addressed to the Governor of South Carolina, which dispatch was prepared and sent with the privacy of the Administration of Mr. Lincoln, and perhaps of the Department; that the object was not clandestinely or secretly to prevent Fort Sumter from being reinforced, but to let the rebels have full knowledge of the intentions of the Government so that if a collision occurred they would be put clearly and manifestly in the wrong before the country in making war upon the garrison which we were endeavoring to succor. I have heard that explanation given of the conduct of Mr. Harvey, and also that Mr. Harvey was selected for the purpose by reason of his being a South Carolinian. The question I desire to ask of the gentleman from New York is, whether the information in his possession tends to confirm or to refute those statements.

Mr. RAYMOND. I am unable to say anything about that, because I have no personal knowledge of the facts of the case. I understood at the time that Mr. Harvey was not the originator of the dispatch referred to by the gentleman, but that it was sent through him because he was known at the time to be the Washington correspondent of a Charleston paper and acquainted with prominent persons in South Carolina, as well as the gentleman to whom the dispatch was addressed; of that, however, I am not sure.

Mr. BANKS. I think a very simple explanation can be given of the dispatch communicated to the papers in South Carolina in 1861. There was a doubt on the part of the southern people whether the North would fight them if they entered into an armed rebellion. It was the interest of the Administration to satisfy the southern people that if they did proceed against the authority and laws of the United States they would meet resistance from the Government with all its power. And I imagine that the dispatch of Mr. Harvey was sent to Charleston in order to satisfy the leaders of the rebellion that if they did move against the authority of the United States they would have to encounter the whole power of the Government. In that view it was not a criminal act on the part of Mr. Harvey. If he had communicated information for himself which he had obtained from the Government, the knowledge of which information would have operated against us and in their favor, that certainly would have been a treasonable act. But I do not understand that dispatch to have been of that character. Nor do I understand that the provision inserted in the appropriation bill of last year was inserted in consequence of that affair at all. I understand the facts for striking the appropriation for the salary of Mr. Harvey from the appropriation bill to have been these: Mr. Harvey disagreed with Congress in regard to the course of the Government and was in favor of the policy of the President. But he was not content with simply expressing his difference of opinion. The letter which he wrote and which was made public was interpreted to mean that the President would be justified in using force against Congress; that was the understanding. I do not know whether that letter will bear out that construction or not; but that was the interpretation generally given to the letter.

Now it would be very proper, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] suggests, that if we do not like Mr. Harvey we should remove him or abolish the law under which he was appointed. But there is another matter involved in the matter. We have now amicable and friendly relations with the Government of Portugal. To pass an act discontinuing diplomatic relations with that Government would be in the nature of an offensive act against the Government of Portugal which the Government of the United States should not take without some cause growing out of the diplomatic relations between the two Governments. Yet no person should ask that we should retain as an officer of this Government a man who has published to the people of the United States a recommendation to one department of the Government to proceed against another department with force. No person would expect us to continue in office in such relations to the Government a man who had expressed such opinions, and therefore Congress did the only thing that was left for it to do, it declared in the most solemn manner by a vote of the two Houses, followed by a vote of a conference of the two Houses, that the salary of this officer ought not to be paid and they instructed the executive department under no circumstances to continue the payment of the salary, and I think that if this officer remains at his office in defiance of the legislation of last year some course should be pursued by Congress to remedy the evil unless some explanation is made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not propose to add anything to what has been said or to anticipate anything that may be said in regard to the merits of Mr. Harvey as a representative of the whole American people abroad. I do not propose to go back into Mr. Harvey's antecedents. I will make only the general remark that the representative of our country abroad ought to be the representative of the whole country, and that he was traveling out of his proper sphere when, being abroad and representing the public sentiment of the whole country, he indulged in anything which by direction or indirection he laid before the President to be read abroad and criticised reflecting upon the Government. We recollect very well the history of the case of Mr. Van Buren, and how he was rejected by the Senate for dragging into observation at the court to which he was accredited questions which belonged to us at home only.

The objection to Mr. Harvey I understand to be that he wrote home to the Secretary of State a letter which seems to have been designed for the public, and which was published, in which he takes occasion to commend himself to one branch of the Government by an attack upon another branch of the Government. Such men are not fit to represent any branch of the Government abroad.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] says we should repeal the law authorizing his appointment. Why, sir, we have no law authorizing the appointment of representatives abroad. The Constitution provides for that. It is the prerogative of the Executive to appoint ambassadors and other ministers and consuls to foreign Governments. He does it without law. No law needs to be repealed and no law needs to be passed. And no law ever has been passed declaring what shall be the representation of this country in this, that, or the other country. Now, further than this, Congress fixes what shall be the grade of its ministers abroad. When the Executive says that he wants a minister to Portugal Congress has to make provision for his pay, and that is the only check we have upon the Executive. While the Constitution gives him the power to appoint representatives of the Government to any foreign Government on earth, it is our place to withhold our sanction to such appointments by denying the supplies for the payment of his appointees. In other words, the only way in which we can get Mr. Harvey is to "starve him out." And there is a peculiar propriety in our taking this course when it effects one of this "bread and butter brigade." If the President chooses to keep Mr. Harvey or any one else as our representative at a foreign Court it is for Congress to say, "If you choose to keep such men as our ministers at these Courts, we will not pay them;" and in that way, although the President may not recall them, I apprehend that these "bread and butter" gentlemen will soon be found wending their way homewards. [Laughter.]

But, sir, it does not lie in the mouth of the Executive to complain, for this matter was before the House at its last session, and the House struck out this appropriation. The Senate reinserted it, and the matter went finally to a committee of conference. The bill, as it finally passed, not only withheld the appropriation, but prohibited the payment of any such salary; and that bill, with that clause in it, the President signed and approved.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to insinuate that this gentleman, Mr. Harvey, belongs to the "bread and butter brigade." I understand that he was one of the appointees of Mr. Lincoln, and I was not aware that the "bread and butter brigade" was organized at that time. I would like to hear from the gentleman at that point.

Mr. SCHENCK. The political army is like other armies. There are deserters from it as from other armies. This "bread and butter brigade" to which I have referred only for the purpose of characterizing Mr. Harvey as one of those composing it, has been made up of recruits from not only the Republican party and the Democratic party, but even from among the very men appointed to civil or even military stations by the Administration that preceded this and by the party to which these men have proved renegade. There is no necessity for bandying words about this matter.

Many a "bread and butter" man has gone from the Republican party and may have enjoyed its honors. The only thing that can be said of such is that they are more detestable than any others, because they have fallen from a higher estate. [Laughter.] It did not need perhaps that a Democrat should go down very much lower than he was in order to take a position in this "bread and butter brigade." But let a man in a higher position fall, and it is very much like the fall of woman—the best of all God's gifts—or as a gentleman suggests, very much like the fall of Lucifer himself, the depth of whose plunge into hell was just in proportion to the height of those battlements of heaven from which he was precipitated.

But this is aside from the question of which I was speaking. I say the only way in which we can effectually reach any man sent abroad by the Executive, in the exercise of his prerogative as Chief Magistrate, to represent the country, is to deny the supplies for paying any such man; and the committee have very properly taken the only course that was open to them in this case.

Mr. STEVENS. I have sent to the Clerk the original letter of Mr. Harvey, and I ask that the part which relates to Congress be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"While any collision between the majority in Congress and the President is to be regretted, the recent explosion will operate like electricity in clearing the atmosphere. The common strong sense of the country will vindicate itself again, as it has often done before, by an instruction likely to be remembered by those who would 'rule or ruin.' The people are weary of agitation merely for the sake of agitation, and they demand that peace, order, and law shall be reestablished throughout the length and breadth of the Union. Faction can no more arrest the march of those events than the march of the waves, which will not go so far and no further at their bidding, though they may command with the tongue of a thousand Canutes.

"Let the Administration go straight forward and without shrinking, and all will be well, how as partisanship may at its heels. Look at the record of your own individual experiences since 1861, if instruction and encouragement be needed. Who so persecuted, outraged, and traduced, and by many who should hang their heads down in very shame, and who so triumphantly honored and sustained, even to the dangerous point of being praised by the compelled homage of revilers?

"If it were possible to destroy the Union and with it all hopes of the future, the men engaged in and exciting the crusade would be exactly the appropriate instruments. All their endeavors, their enthusiasm, and their desires have been directed to that end, if not with intention, at least with a mischievous policy, that if successful could produce no other result. They seem to have taken their lessons of wisdom from the Duke of Alva, whose advice, unreason, and obstinate conduct cost Philip II one of the fairest parts of his dominions. Minus the form of the Inquisition—of which the modern Alvas would preserve all the punishment—there is a striking parallel between the champions of harsh and headstrong zeal three hundred years ago and that which lashes itself into fury now, and merely because it cannot have 'its own way.'

"We are fighting a new battle for the Union, and against foes the more dangerous for being insidious and within the lines of our camp. But I have not a particle of doubt about the result, any more than I had about the issue of the other war, when our proper strength could be collected and judiciously applied.

"The crisis demands positive remedies and direct treatment. Quackery will kill in this extremity. Therefore the sooner it is understood that the line must be drawn broadly and clearly the sooner will the Administration be relieved from some of the dangers which incidentally menace it.

"Whoever has studied the events of the war must be convinced that the black man cared very little for his own status or was willing to make much effort to change it. No such opportunity was ever offered to an enslaved race to strike for itself, and certainly encouragement enough was given to it to do so in some directions. Every proper and humane man feels that, emancipated as that race now is, it should have every just aid and protection until able to help itself. But let me tell you, from some little observation on the subject and some knowledge of the people, that human ingenuity could not devise a more effective method for fastening another form of bondage upon them than this ballot, which is proposed as their sovereign panacea. Give them that right and I would pledge my life on the result, if the test could be fairly made, that almost ninety per cent. of the whole black population would vote on the side of their old masters; or, in other words, become the instruments of fastening new chains upon themselves. And if ever the day comes (which I hope never to see for fear of the consequences) when these people may vote without condition, you may expect to see the South compacted by negro suffrage and uniting with the northern so-called 'Democracy' to regain possession of the Government and overthrow everything thus far accomplished. And such a result would be quite in keeping with the sagacity and the moderation of those who are ready to sacrifice everything sacred to the one idea of their foolish fanaticism."

Mr. STEVENS. I will not ask the Clerk to read any further.

Mr. BANKS, Mr. NIBLACK, and others. Let the whole letter be read.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. POMEROY.) The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who has the floor, has the right to say how much of the document shall be read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I see, on looking at the Blue Book, that Minister Harvey is set down to the credit of Pennsylvania. I have been informed that he is a citizen of South Carolina, and never did hail from the State which I have the honor in part to represent.

Mr. STEVENS. The fact is, he roamed about, wrote letters, and insinuated himself among the men of the lobby here. Why he should have been appointed minister to Portugal, with a salary of $7,500 a year, I do not know.

Mr. RAYMOND. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make one or two remarks by way of comment on the discussion which has just taken place. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] says that the Executive had no right to complain of this act inasmuch as he had approved and signed the bill which cut off Mr. Harvey's salary last year. I trust nothing so far as I have had connection with this discussion has left the impression that the Executive has complained. I have never certainly heard that he did in any way, shape, or manner make any complaint. I spoke simply and exclusively on behalf of the self-respect of Congress, and I desire we shall act here so as to meet our own approval in this matter.

Another point the gentleman from Ohio made was to draw a parallel between the action of Mr. Harvey in sending a letter home referring to divisions of party here and Mr. Van Buren's action while minister to England; but I call his attention to the fact that Mr. Van Buren's offense consisted in making party divisions here the basis of official action. Having failed to obtain from England certain concessions while one party was in power Mr. Van Buren attempted to raise the same question again, reminding them another party had come into power here and assuring them they might expect different action at the hands of the Government. It was for that, sir, if I remember aright, he was rejected. There is no parallel to that in this case, and the gentleman from Ohio will not pretend there is.

The letter has been read on account of which Mr. Harvey is to be deprived of his salary as minister to Portugal. I am willing to submit to the House the question I did submit before, whether there is anything in that letter which deserves the epithets which the member from Pennsylvania applied to it.

It is strong in its expressions of opinion, I admit, but there is nothing in it I think, unless my taste is lamentably defective, (and on that point I defer to both the gentlemen who addressed the House on the subject, the member from Pennsylvania and the member from Ohio,) unless my taste is lamentably below the congressional standard, I submit it does not justify such epithets.

Mr. STEVENS. He charges that we are conspiring to rule or ruin the country; that we are worse than the infamous Duke of Alva. I ask whether those charges do not justify my epithets?

Mr. RAYMOND. The question is pertinent, but I think it betrays a sensitiveness on the part of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I did not expect he would display. Mr. Harvey in these passages makes no allusion to Congress. He alludes to partisans and partisans only. He says nothing about Congress. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania applies the term to himself, it is only the "galled jade" that is likely to wince.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman is mistaken. Mr. Harvey commences his letter by an attack upon Congress.

Mr. RAYMOND. If I understand it, in the beginning of the letter Mr. Harvey expresses regret a collision has arisen between the President and Congress; and then he goes on to speak of the divergence of opinion, not between those two merely, but of that which prevails in the country. He speaks of the country at large and the divisions in the country, and uses phrases not stronger than I have heard upon this floor many times without exception.

Mr. STEVENS. If I understand the gentleman then, because he slanders the whole country it is not personal in regard to Congress?

Mr. RAYMOND. If I had understood that it is because he speaks disrespectfully of the whole country that his salary is to be stopped I should consider the remark more pertinent. He may have spoken disrespectfully of the country, and he may have committed the enormity to which Sydney Smith alludes, in speaking disrespectfully of the equator; but I submit his salary should not be stopped on that account.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from New York with his usual astuteness cannot comprehend the point which I make. I did allude to the case of Mr. Van Buren, but I alluded to it with the general remark under no circumstances ought the representative of our country abroad, who should represent this country as a unit, be permitted to call attention to differences at home or to the existence of struggles between coordinate branches of the Government.

Now, the gentleman draws a distinction in this; Mr. Van Buren's communication was made to that foreign Power, and Mr. Harvey's was a letter to the Secretary of State at home, and that it must have gone to the Secretary of State, to whom it was addressed, before it could get into the newspapers.

I make, then, this general remark on that view of the subject; that if the Secretary of State, representing the Foreign Department of our Government, keeps a minister abroad who indulges in writing political and partisan essays attacking those who differ from the President or the Administration, and then the Secretary of State permits himself to be the conduit through which such tirades reach the public by being printed in the newspapers, it is time to let Mr. Seward know that he had better keep such partisan defenders in the petty political offices at home. I do not care to know whether it was with Harvey's original consent, or whether it was a specimen of the judgment of Mr. Seward or of the President that this paper was made public; wherever it was published its effect must necessarily have been to react abroad and to leave the people to infer, "Here is a minister from the United States who entertains and expresses views of this kind in regard to the squabbles at home; he could not be sent here to represent that great Government unless he was pretty well informed upon these subjects, and capable of making them comprehensible to those who surround him here and in the country from which he is sent."

I care not therefore how it got into the public papers; I say there is a minister of the United States who writes a partisan tirade abusing those who differ from his master, the man who has become his master, and toward whom he seeks thus to be obsequious, and by this means seeks to commend himself to that master; that letter goes to the Secretary of State, and by the connivance of that Secretary of State, or perhaps of the President, by one or both of them, who thought it was a good political essay and would answer some partisan purpose, it is thrust into the public prints and then goes back again to affect the position of Harvey as minister to that Government.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me here to say that we have received a communication from the State Department expressly stating that the President directed it to be made public.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, sir, the President ordered it to be published; then by my vote the President shall not keep a man at Lisbon or anywhere else to write these partisan tirades to go back to the people of Portugal in order to have them understand what the representative of our Government thinks about our squabbles at home.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to make this suggestion to the gentleman; that as it is understood that this was a private letter written to the Secretary of State, not intended to be published, but was made public by the Secretary of State and published by order of the President, we may make a mistake in cutting off the salary of this minister; that we ought rather to stop the pay of the President or of the Secretary of State or of the gentleman from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, sir, it will not be a bad thing perhaps in some way to stop the President's pay in due time. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. How about that of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SCHENCK. That is not the question before us.

Mr. RAYMOND. I would suggest whether my connection with the publication is not part of the inducement by which Congress voted me $2,000 extra pay last year. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot say whether it was or not.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand it was given to the gentleman from New York as an outfit for the convention at Philadelphia. [Great laughter.]

Mr. RAYMOND. I accept the explanation, and I am free to admit that the service I performed was worth all the pay I received for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish this matter, so far as I am concerned, to be mixed up with anything that is aside from the question. I put it distinctly upon the broad ground that the representative of our country, whatever may be the difficulties at home or the differences about our domestic affairs, ought to represent it as a unit, and that when he, either directly or through the agency of those who send him, is used as a medium to bring such tirades before the world, it is time to say to those who placed him there, "We will pay no such man, we will make no provision for his support there, and you had better reconsider the matter so far as the mission to Portugal is concerned, and send somebody else who will deport himself in a more becoming manner."

Mr. HILL. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know if we are not acting under the operation of the five-minutes rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The five-minutes rule has not been adopted.

Mr. NIBLACK. I will yield now for a moment to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Hise.]

Mr. KASSON. I wish to say, in behalf of the committee and by the wish of its chairman, that it will very soon be necessary to rise and close this debate unless the five-minutes rule shall be adopted by unanimous consent.

Mr. NIBLACK. I will not prolong the discussion much. I will yield only to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HISE. I have but a few words to say. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to assume as the basis of his remarks that there is no law existing that precludes the right of Congress to withhold an appropriation for the payment of a minister abroad whose political opinions are opposed to those of this House. Now, sir, I have a pretty distinct recollection that during the first year of Mr. Pierce's administration there was a law passed by Congress by which the pay of all the ministers to Europe, and also, I think, to Central and South America, was established. The Constitution gives the President the right to appoint ministers to foreign Governments, and this law fixed the salary or compensation to be paid to the ministers at those foreign Courts.

Mr. SCHENCK. Let me say to the gentleman that the only way in which the law of Congress makes a recognition of and establishes those missions is by making an appropriation.

Mr. HISE. No, sir. That law legalized all these missions and fixed a salary for the minister at the Court of Great Britain, of France, and of Spain, and of all the other ministers. It was not a mere temporary act of appropriation, but a permanent law, fixing the salaries which these gentlemen were to receive. Now, would it be acting in good faith—would it not be perfidious on the part of Congress—after legalizing these offices and fixing the compensation which is attached to them, to refuse to make the appropriation for one of the incumbents? Would it be lawful? Would it be honest? This man is in office under the law, and is, for aught I know, in the faithful discharge of the duties of his position. Shall we, on account of a political difference in opinion with him, turn round and refuse to make the appropriation necessary to pay his salary as provided by law? Shall it be said that we have a minister rendering services at this Court of Portugal, appointed under the law at a fixed compensation, who receives no pay because he happens to differ from the majority here in his political opinions? Are gentlemen here prepared to establish the principle, or to advocate it, that now and forever hereafter they will by this means control the executive patronage of the Government; that they will resort to this practice of striking out the appropriation for an officer, either civil or diplomatic, because he belongs to a different party from their own? What is this letter which has been read? It is but an expression of political opinion in a letter addressed to the Secretary of State.

Mr. NIBLACK. I must now resume the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate. We have been "running empties" for the last hour.

Mr. HISE. A word more. Mr. Van Buren's letter was addressed to a foreign minister; and it was, perhaps, upon that ground that the Senate refused to confirm him, and that he was recalled.

Now, I want the country to know, because there is an important principle involved, whether or not the party in power have reached that degree of partisan fierceness that they are prepared, in order to control the executive patronage, to withhold appropriations, and refuse to provide for the payment of officers of the Government whose salaries are fixed by law in order to get rid of them?

Mr. NIBLACK. I shall detain the committee but a few moments and then I will yield the floor to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. STEVENS] and let him move such disposition of this subject as he may see fit.

I am now in possession of the information which I sought to obtain by the amendment which I moved. I had seen going the rounds of the public press statements of a similar import to those which have been made here in regard to this matter; but I did not consider the information thus obtained of such a character as would justify me in speaking of the reasons which controlled Congress at the last session in relation to this matter. It seems, however, that for certain differences of political opinion expressed in a private letter which became public by some accident, or perhaps by some design, certainly by some means for which the one who wrote the letter is not to blame, his salary is sought to be withheld.

It is charged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] that that letter was an attack upon the majority in Congress. I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] has pretty well disposed of that. But if that letter contained an attack upon Congress, as it is called, if it was a criticism upon Congress—because it is nothing more than the ordinary newspaper criticism upon the acts of public men and of parties in the country—if that criticism was intended to apply to the majority in Congress, I hold that it constitutes no sufficient reason for withholding his salary as the accredited minister to the Government of the country in which he is now resident.

The President of the United States is every day charged here with corruptly removing men from office for speaking disrespectfully of him. When a man is removed from office, as we are informed, simply for differing with the President and speaking disrespectfully of him, it is said that it is a corrupt use of the power vested in him by the Constitution in relation to removals and appointments. But it seems a different rule is to be applied by Congress. Speaking disrespectfully of Congress is to be regarded as sufficient to authorize the withholding of the salary of a public officer.

Now, if I am correctly informed, there is a gentleman connected with one branch of the Congress of the United States holding an elective office in that body who is the editor of two papers, "both daily" papers. I believe he makes it his daily occupation to assail the executive department of this Government in every possible manner. Yet I never heard anybody urge that that was a sufficient reason for the Senate of the United States ejecting him from the office he holds, or for withholding his salary. He is but exercising the right guaranteed by the institutions of the country to its citizens—the right of free speech and of a free press.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] intimates that Mr. Harvey never was a proper person to have been appointed to this office, and that the failure of the President to remove him was an omission of a duty. Now, if he never was a proper person to hold this office, then I submit that this way of cutting off his salary and starving him out ought to have been adopted by Congress immediately after his appointment. But his salary was paid regularly up to the last session of Congress; and now for reasons purely political, out of which some personal irritation has resulted, it is sought to starve him out of office.

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] in referring to this matter, speaks of the "bread-and-butter brigade." Now, I am not here to defend the rather small body of men to which he refers. Nor am I here to defend the executive department of this Government, for, properly speaking, it is not properly within the line of this debate. I am not here to defend our minister to Portugal, for I have no personal acquaintance with him. I have only to say that when members of Congress talk about the "bread-and-butter brigade," about the spoils of office controlling the political opinions of men, about the "loaves and fishes," figuratively speaking, I am sometimes under the impression that such remarks, considering what has occurred in this House, come from us with rather a bad grace. One of the prominent and leading ideas that seems to have pervaded the action of this Congress is to see to it that the offices are not taken away from the friends of the majority here. The bill regulating the tenure of office, the movement for the impeachment of the President, and many of the leading measures of this Congress, as I understand them, have been for the purpose of securing to the friends of the majority in Congress the possession of the Federal offices, or the "bread and butter" of the Government, to use the expression of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] That seems to me to be the principal object in view of certain gentlemen, judging from the ideas some of them have expressed. All remarks, therefore, which apply to this "bread-and-butter brigade" the peculiar friends of the Administration might, I think, well apply with redoubled force to the majority here in Congress. I think that a disinterested person, with the newspapers of the country as his only means of information, would come to the conclusion that how to save the possession of the offices was the great question with Congress at this time, the settlement of which has held us in the disorganized, condition in which we have been for the last year and a half, and to which everything else was subordinate.

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NIBLACK. Yes, sir.

Mr. LYNCH. I wish to know whether the fact that this man at the beginning of the war sent a telegram to persons in South Carolina, notifying them of a secret expedition fitted out by the Government for the relief of Fort Sumter, is not, in the opinion of the gentleman, a sufficient reason why we should refuse to continue him in office, or if we cannot procure his removal, refuse to appropriate money to pay him.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] has not, I think, heard this debate or he would not ask that question. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] has already stated—

Mr. LYNCH. With the gentleman's permission, I wish to say a single word in regard to the explanation made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, which was that this telegram was probably sent by Mr. Harvey by the advice or with the connivance of the Administration for the purpose of letting the southern rebels know that we were going to fight. Now, it will be recollected that there was a secret expedition sent out by the Government, and that in consequence of the receipt of this telegram the rebels opened their bombardment. I ask, is it probable that the Administration, having sent a secret expedition right into the jaws of the rebel batteries, would have taken means to send by an agent here a notification which would induce the rebels to open fire upon our vessels? To my mind the explanation of the gentleman from Massachusetts is the most improbable that could be given.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Chairman, if the objection which the gentleman from Maine urges against Minister Harvey is a valid one, then his pay ought to have been withheld six years ago. But, sir, whether or not the objection be a good one, the party represented by the majority in this House are estopped from making that objection now, because so long as that party had possession of all the departments of the Government it continued him in office. The occurrence to which the gentleman alludes happened soon after Mr. Harvey's appointment, but before he left the country. With a full knowledge of all the facts Mr. Lincoln's Administration declined to recall him, and sent him abroad on his mission. The suggestions of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] are unfortunate for a friend of the late Administration.

Mr. HISE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether the present Secretary of State did not some time ago, in writing to our minister at Paris, and instructing him to make explanations to the French Government in regard to the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine, request our minister to inform Napoleon that the action of this House furnished an indication of its sentiment, but was not to be regarded at all as having any control or influence over the executive department of the Government of this country. And if the salary of this minister to Portugal is to be withheld on account of the letter which has been read, is not that dispatch of Mr. Seward an equally strong reason why Congress should make no appropriation for the salary of the Secretary of State?

Mr. NIBLACK. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion; but I cannot allow myself to digress for the purpose of discussing that view of the question now. The object which I had in view in offering this amendment was to have it understood why we are asked to depart from what has been heretofore the uniform practice of Congress, so far as I know, in making appropriations of this kind. As has been well said by some gentlemen who preceded me, if we desire to get rid of this minister unconditionally we have but to abolish the office; and I think this, in all fairness, is the proper way to meet the question. So long as this minister is permitted to reside abroad, representing this country, I do think we owe it to ourselves to see that he is paid, and to look somewhere else for a remedy if we are dissatisfied with the minister. Nothing that has been said here is sufficient to induce me to vote to withhold the salary of this gentleman or any other gentleman under like circumstances. I do not think it is legitimate political warfare, and will establish a precedent that will demoralize our institutions and degrade us as a people.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope, by unanimous consent, the rest of this bill will be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow a vote to be taken on this question in the House?

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection at all. Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then we make no objection to the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. Then by common consent the amendment will be considered adopted, so that a vote may be taken on it in the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it in order to move to strike out "Rome"?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I make that motion, and I desire only to say I know no sufficient reason why our Government should have diplomatic relations with a foreign hierarchy. The last information we have had, although it does not come in an official form, is of the removal of the American Protestant church outside of the city of Rome. I do not know whether the Papal Government, comprising now no more than the city of Rome, is anything more than an ecclesiastical jurisdiction. There is no resident here from the Papal States, and I should like the chairman of the committee to give the reason why we should be represented by a minister resident at the Papal court.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman had waited I should myself have moved an amendment striking out the word "Rome" and inserting what I will send to the Chair.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out Rome at the end of line fifteen, and insert as follows:

Whereas it is beneath the dignity and contrary to justice that this nation should be represented at any Court or Government which prohibits free worship by American citizens within its jurisdiction of the Christian religion; and whereas the Roman Government has lately ordered the American churches to be removed outside of the city and prohibited the free exercise by them of the Christian religion therein: Therefore no money hereby appropriated shall be paid for the support of the United States legation at Rome or for the future expenses of such legation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I accept that amendment as a modification of my own.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask whether the same line of argument does not apply to the Court of Constantinople and the Court of Spain, and whether the tyrannical exercise of power by the Mussulmans toward the Christians is not as just a basis for legislation toward that Court as that which we are now considering. And I will ask the gentleman whether the rule which he is now seeking to break down at Rome has not been in existence for centuries, and did not exist at the time our mission to that Court was established. I wish gentlemen to draw a line just here, and to take into consideration that at Rome exclusion by reason of faith is the established rule of the Government. Let us not act in the very face of existing institutions established at Rome and recognized by us before any minister was sent there.

Mr. STEVENS. I will answer the gentleman's question, as I suppose he wants an answer. In Constantinople the exercise of the Christian religion is perfectly protected, and I am not aware it is prohibited in Spain. And it is only lately that our churches have been excluded from Rome—I think within six months. I saw recently by the London papers that our churches had been removed outside of the walls of Rome.

Mr. CHANLER. We all know that the Christians of the Empire of Turkey are subjected to the most tyrannical oppression. The existing revolution in Crete is the result of the oppression by Turkey of the Christians of that island.

Mr. STEVENS. I have not risen to defend Turkey, but only to say that in the city of Constantinople the exercise of the Christian religion is allowed. I think we have several churches there.

Mr. BANKS. If there were any official information in the possession of the House that would justify changing our relations with the city of Rome I would not object to it, but at present we have nothing but the reports of newspapers. We have sent for information, but it has not yet been given to us. This can be passed over now and taken up and acted on hereafter. I hope the House will not agree to any amendment until we have official information on the subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the amendment.

Mr. CHANLER. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment. Mr. Chairman, in opposing the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania I make no objection to a proper, dignified expression of opinion on the part of this Government; but I do object to a special case of this character brought up now without any broader or deeper reason than that presented in the preamble to the amendment. The gentleman should extend his amendment to the Government of Turkey for its treatment of Christians. There are Governments throughout the world with which we have intimate diplomatic relations which limit the rights of sepulture and of religion and sometimes banish men for differing with the governing power; and I believe that the secret motive of every Government in maintaining the peculiar opinions of its own people should be respected here, for toleration is the basis of our own institutions. Ours practically has become a Protestant Government, at least made to appear such by such sectarian acts as this. If the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania means anything, it is a direct expression of Protestant resentment against the Papal Government of Rome. It is a renewal in a form most objectionable in my mind of a system long worn out and which for wise reasons the Government of the United States has always passed over and left to sleep in the oblivion of ages, beneath the ruin of empires that have fought out these questions of prejudice, of religious sects in the Christian church.

Sir, the Christian who goes to Rome for purposes of faith goes there as the Mussulman goes to Mecca, and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] were to attempt a pilgrimage to Mecca to-day his valuable life would be sacrificed and lost to his excellent constituency; he would be immolated upon the altar of Mohammedan prejudice. The reason, good or bad, for which the Catholic hierarchy of Rome excludes the Protestant church from its walls is not a matter of debate here. It is an established principle of the Roman hierarchy that the ritual of its establishment must be exclusive, and though myself a Protestant, I cannot as a member of this Government, representing a Catholic constituency, under the tolerant principles of our Constitution, consent to this bold attack, upon an established religion, equally Christian with our own. They have as much right to exclude the Protestant church from the walls of Rome as the gentlemen on this floor and elsewhere who, under the organization of Know-Nothingism, would have branded every man who differed with it on the question of religion. We have had this issue fought out at the ballot-box in this country, and it has been fought on more bloody fields than can be numbered here in the five minutes allowed for debate. I protest against inaugurating this petty cause of discord between the head of the papal church and the Government of the United States. The system of that hierarchy organized throughout this country is one of the greatest instruments of civilization that we possess. It has done as much to advance civilization here as any other sect of the Christian church. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BROOMALL. I suggest to my colleague to strike out from his amendment the word "worship," where it occurs and insert instead of it the word "exercise."

Mr. STEVENS. No objection.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment of the chairman of the committee by striking out the preamble down to and including the word "therefore" and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "provided that." I do it for the purpose of asking the gentleman whether we have any authentic information which can be depended upon, that there has been any such action by the Government at Rome as is recited in that preamble. I suppose it is merely a matter of newspaper rumor.

Mr. STEVENS. I can only say, while there is no official authority for it, all the newspapers that I have seen contain it; and I saw it in an English paper.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to state that there came to-day from the State Department a communication on this subject which has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BANKS. I beg leave to state that in that communication, in answer to a resolution of the House, the Secretary of State says the Department has no information of any fact of the kind, and I will add that the newspaper reports inform us that the Protestant church has been removed from the city with the consent of the American minister.

Mr. HALE. I trust that my amendment will prevail, and that this recital of supposed facts, which may not be facts, will be stricken out. And more than that, I suggest for the consideration of the gentlemen whether, if it were true that acts of the Papal Government which are considered unjustifiable have deprived the Protestant residents of Rome of the privilege of worshipping in their own way, that is not a controlling reason why our diplomatic relations ought to be continued, unless we are prepared to follow out this proposition with a measure that shall make, perhaps, casus belli.

If we propose to preserve any peaceful relations whatever with the Government there, it seems to me that we certainly ought to have a minister there, for the very reason that we have Protestant residents at Rome entitled to the protection of their Government, and that they may enjoy their own form of worship at the chapel of the embassy, if not elsewhere. I have seen nothing developed in this debate so far that would justify the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I oppose it in the first place because he is trying to induce the House to legislate upon a subject upon which he has no official information. He does not know, nor does the House know anything with certainty in reference to this matter. We have no intelligence officially communicated to the Government that the order stated by the public press has been made by the Papal Government, or that the Protestants of the city of Rome have been compelled to remove their churches outside of the limits of that city. We do not know it as a fact that any such order has been made, neither do we know (if such an order has been made) under what circumstances or for what reasons it was made.

Now, I submit that before the House takes any action on this question it ought at least be put in possession of all the facts and of the reasons which operated upon the minds of the authorities at Rome in making the order, if in fact it was really made.

For the gentleman from Pennsylvania to press this question in the absence of all official information seems to be a mere thrust at the Catholic population of this country and at the authorities at Rome. The gentleman before he asks such action as this ought to be sure of all the facts upon which he bases it. Five minutes, Mr. Chairman, is no time in which to explain or discuss such a matter as this; but when the question is properly before the House I shall desire to be heard upon it. For the present I can only say that I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not prevail.

The question being upon Mr. HALE's amendment to the amendment, it was put; and there were—ayes 67, noes 30.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise as it is about time to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill of the House No. 903, making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1868, and had instructed him to report the same to the House without amendment.

Also, that the committee had had under consideration the bill of the House No. 904, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move the previous question on the pension appropriation bill just reported from the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF BILLS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to give notice that at the proper time I shall offer as a substitute what I send to the Clerk's desk for the bill pending this morning reported from the Indian Committee. I move that the substitute be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. CONKLING, (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. BUNDY: The petition of William Wilson, for compensation for service in the Army, &c.

By Mr. BURLEIGH: A memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Dakota Territory, praying for an appropriation by Congress to erect a capitol building at the seat of government in said Territory.

By Mr. COBB: The petition of citizens of Glen Haven, of Grant county, Wisconsin, against any reduction of the volume of the currency.

By Mr. CONKLING: The petition of citizens of Aiden, Erie county, New York, praying the impeachment of the President.

By Mr. DARLING: The memorial of 1,500 soldiers of the late war who have lost their discharges or are from other accidental causes debarred from the benefits of the special bounty law, praying that they may be put on the same footing as their more favored comrades.

By Mr. NICHOLSON: The petition of Olivia W. Cannon, widow of Joseph S. Cannon, for a pension.

By Mr. PAINE: The memorial of the Historical Society of Wisconsin, in favor of the purchase by Congress of the library of Peter Force.

By Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts: The petition of E. B. Stackpole, and 41 others, citizens of Kenduskeag, Maine, for increase of duty on imported wool.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of tanners, saddlers, harness-makers, and leather dealers of the third congressional district of Ohio, praying for a reduction of the tax on the commodities manufactured by them to two per cent.

Also, the petition of manufacturers of and dealers in cigars and of growers of leaf tobacco, praying for a change in the tax on cigars.

Also, the petition of officers of the United States Army, praying that the commutation price of the ration may be restored to fifty cents.

By Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee: The petition of L. M. Jarvis, F. M. Turner, and others, of Hancock county, Tennessee, against further curtailment of currency and suggesting a modification of whisky tax.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 30, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. J. W. PARKER, D. D., of Boston, Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal of yesterday will be read.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

Mr. GRIMES. I think this practice of dispensing with the reading of the Journal is becoming altogether too frequent, and we may ascertain hereafter that it may probably contain something unpleasant for us to read.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Nobody hears it.

Mr. GRIMES. I hear it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Nobody else does.

Mr. GRIMES. The questions upon which we are acting are too important for me not to know how my name is recorded upon them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will endeavor to preserve order so that the reading of the Journal shall be heard.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection? It requires unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

Mr. GRIMES. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the Journal will be read, and the Senate will be in order.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday, but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. SHERMAN. I move to dispense with the further reading of the Journal.

Mr. GRIMES. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the reading must be proceeded with.

The reading of the Journal was then resumed and concluded.

CREDENTIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the secretary of State of Alabama, certifying that John Anthony Winston was elected on the 22d of December, 1866, by the Legislature of Alabama a Senator in Congress from that State for six years from the 4th of March, 1867; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NESMITH presented the credentials of Hon. Henry W. Corbett, elected by the Legislature of the State of Oregon a Senator from that State for the term of six years from the 4th of March, 1867; which were ordered to be filed.

ADMISSION OF NEBRASKA—VETO.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the veto message of the President of the United States on the bill for the admission of Nebraska into the Union.

Mr. WADE. I move that that message be laid on the table and printed. I do not know that anybody wants it to be read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is very short.

Mr. WADE. If anybody insists on the reading or wants it read of course I have no objection. It takes up time, and nobody listens to it.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I ask for the reading of the message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the message is asked for. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I return for reconsideration a bill entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union," which originated in the Senate, and has received the assent of both Houses of Congress. A bill having in view the same object was presented for my approval a few hours prior to the adjournment of the last session, but, submitted at a time when there was no opportunity for a proper consideration of the subject, I withheld my signature, and the measure failed to become a law.

It appears by the preamble of this bill that—"The people of Nebraska, availing themselves of the authority conferred upon them by the act passed on the 19th of April, 1854, have adopted a constitution which, upon due examination, is found to conform to the provisions and comply with the conditions of said act, and to be republican in its form of government, and that they now ask for admission into the Union."

This proposed law would therefore seem to be based upon the declaration contained in the enabling act, that upon compliance with its terms the people of Nebraska should be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States.

Reference to the bill, however, shows that while, by the first section, Congress distinctly accepts, ratifies, and confirms the constitution and State government which the people of the Territory have formed for themselves, declares Nebraska to be one of the United States of America, and admits her into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever, the third section provides that this measure—

"Shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition, that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition, that the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act, upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State; and thereupon, and without further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete."

This condition is not mentioned in the original enabling act, was not contemplated at the time of its passage, was not sought by the people themselves, has not heretofore been applied to the inhabitants of any State asking admission, and is in direct conflict with the constitution adopted by the people and declared in the preamble "to be republican in its form of government;" for in that instrument the exercise of the elective franchise and the right to hold office are expressly limited to white citizens of the United States. Congress thus undertakes to authorize and compel the Legislature to change the constitution, which it is declared in the preamble has received the sanction of the people, and which by this bill is "accepted, ratified, and confirmed" by the Congress of the nation.

The first and third sections of the bill exhibit yet further incongruity. By the one Nebraska is "admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatsoever;" while by the other, Congress demands, as condition precedent to her admission, requirements which in our history have never been asked of any people when presenting a constitution and State government for the acceptance of the law-making power. It is expressly declared by the third section that the bill—

"Shall not take effect except upon the fundamental condition that within the State of Nebraska there shall be no denial of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed."

Neither more nor less than the assertion of the right of Congress to regulate the elective franchise of any State hereafter to be admitted. This condition is in clear violation of the Federal Constitution, under the provisions of which, from the very foundation of the Government, each State has been left free to determine for itself the qualifications necessary for the exercise of suffrage within its limits. Without precedent in our legislation, it is in marked contrast with those limitations which, imposed upon States that from time to time have become members of the Union, had for their object the single purpose of preventing any infringement of the Constitution of the country. If Congress is satisfied that Nebraska at the present time possesses sufficient population to entitle her to full representation in the councils of the nation, and that her people desire an exchange of a territorial for a State government, good faith would seem to demand that she should be admitted without further requirements than those expressed in the enabling act, with all of which it is asserted in the preamble her inhabitants have complied. Congress may, under the Constitution, admit new States or reject them; but the people of a State can alone make or change their organic law and prescribe the qualifications requisite for electors. Congress, however, in passing the bill in the shape in which it has been submitted for my approval, does not merely reject the application of the people of Nebraska for present admission as a State into the Union on the ground that the constitution which they have submitted restricts the exercise of the elective franchise to the white population, but imposes conditions which, if accepted by the Legislature, may, without the consent of the people, so change the organic law as to make electors of all persons within the State, without distinction of race or color.

In view of this fact, I suggest for the consideration of Congress, whether it would not be just, expedient, and in accordance with the principles of our Government, to allow the people, by popular vote or through a convention chosen by themselves for that purpose, to declare whether or not they will accept the terms upon which it is now proposed to admit them into the Union. This course would not occasion much greater delay than that which the bill contemplates when it requires that the Legislature shall be convened within thirty days after this measure shall have become a law for the purpose of considering and deciding the conditions which it imposes, and gains additional force when we consider that the proceedings attending the formation of the State constitution were not in conformity with the provisions of the enabling act; that in an aggregate vote of 7,776 the majority in favor of the constitution did not exceed one hundred, and that it is alleged that in consequence of frauds even this result cannot be received as a fair expression of the wishes of the people. As upon them must fall the burdens of a State organization it is but just that they should be permitted to determine for themselves a question which so materially affects their interests. Possessing a soil and a climate admirably adapted to those industrial pursuits which bring prosperity and greatness to a people, with the advantage of a central position on the great highway that will soon connect the Atlantic and Pacific States, Nebraska is rapidly gaining in numbers and wealth, and may within a very brief period claim admission on grounds which will challenge and secure universal assent. She can therefore wisely and patiently afford to wait. Her population is said to be steadily and even rapidly increasing, being now generally conceded as high as forty thousand, and estimated by some whose judgment is entitled to respect at a still greater number. At her present rate of growth she will in a very short time have the requisite population for a Representative in Congress; and, what is far more important to her own citizens, will have realized such an advance in material wealth as will enable the expenses of a State government to be borne without oppression to the tax-payer. Of new communities it may be said with especial force—and it is true of old ones—that the inducement to immigrants, other things being equal, is in almost the precise ratio of the rate of taxation. The great States of the Northwest owe their marvelous prosperity largely to the fact that they were continued as Territories until they had grown to be wealthy and populous communities.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, January 29, 1867.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill to which this message refers is now reconsidered, and the question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. WADE. I move that the message be printed, and laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 7th instant, information upon the subject of an alleged recent emigration of citizens of the United States to the dominion of the Sublime Porte for the purpose of settling and acquiring landed property there. The message and accompanying documents, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, were ordered to lie upon the table and be printed.

PRINTING OF A DOCUMENT.

Mr. CRESWELL. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of December 4, 1866, in relation to the amount of money paid or ordered to be paid for advertising notices and proposals for each of the Executive Departments, has not yet been ordered to be printed. I submit a motion that the usual number of copies of that document be printed for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented a petition of cultivators of the vine in the vicinity of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for a reduction of the tax on the distillation of brandies; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Washington city, District of Columbia, praying for an appropriation in aid of the Guardian Society of that city, and that the act granting certain privileges to that Society may be amended; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILLEY presented the petition of R. Smith, cashier of the Northwestern Bank of Virginia, of Parkersburg, West Virginia, praying for the payment of a balance due on certain quartermaster's vouchers issued for the purchase of horses for the Army under the command of General Hunter; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KIRKWOOD presented a petition of citizens of Iowa, praying for a specific tax on all domestic cigars, and that the stamp be made a revenue stamp sold by the collector only to the licensed manufacturers in his district with proper guards and checks to prevent frauds and counterfeits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I present the petition of James Walsh; and as it is in regard to a matter which concerns a large number of people I will read it:

"The petitioner James Walsh, late private of company L, third United States artillery, who was discharged at Fort Adams, Rhode Island, on surgeon's certificate of disability in consequence of a wound received in action at Molino del Rey, in Mexico, and who is now receiving a pension of eight dollars per month, respectfully petitions your honorable Congress for an increase of said pension, so that he may receive the same as now allowed by law for those disabled in the last war—his present pension being inadequate to support him among his friends, and his injuries being of such a nature as to disqualify him from earning a livelihood by manual labor."

I desire to say that I cannot see why soldiers who received wounds in wars in defense of their country prior to the recent war should not be put upon the same footing with soldiers wounded during the late war. I therefore beg leave to suggest to the Committee on Pensions the propriety of taking this matter into their serious consideration. I move that the petition be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of James M. Ellison, praying for payment for property taken and destroyed by United States troops in Virginia in 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CRESWELL presented the memorial of James L. McPhail, Voltaire Randall, and Eton G. Horner, praying for compensation for services rendered in the arrest of Samuel Arnold and Michael O'Laughlin, two of the conspirators in the assassination of President Lincoln, and for valuable information furnished to the officers of the United States in the development of the facts of the general conspiracy and in the trial of other of the assassins.

sins; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition of citizens of New York, against the introduction of any State into the Union with a constitution excluding any class of citizens from the right to vote by reason of color or race; and they add that they mean not only new States, but now reconstructed States. I move the reference of this petition to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also present the petition of the chairman and vestry of St. Michael's church, in Charleston, South Carolina, and other citizens of that place, in which they represent that "the chime of bells, originally cast in England before the colonial revolution, having been recently shipped in a mutilated condition to the same foundry to be there recast; and their arrival being now daily expected, and having been for a long time without public bells, and finding it difficult to defray the cost of recasting as aforesaid in addition to the heavy import duty of thirty-five per cent. under the existing tariff law accruing thereon, they pray," in behalf of themselves and the city of Charleston at large, that "Congress will relieve them from the duty, and if the circumstances of the case warrant compliance with their request, authorize the collector of the port of Charleston to grant free entry to their bells upon their arrival as aforesaid." This petition is signed by the officers of the church, and it is further signed by all the Federal officers, as I understand, at Charleston, the United States marshal, the United States judge, &c. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND presented the petition of Orlando Runnamaker and others, employes at the Fortress Monroe arsenal, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented two petitions of farmers and growers of flaxseed in the West, praying that the duty on flaxseed be fixed at not less than thirty cents per bushel; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

He also presented the memorial of Sergeant D. M. Embry, praying that compensation be made for horses taken from him for the use of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia and brewers of white beer, praying for the repeal of the section of the revenue law concerning the carrying away of malt liquors from the brewery for the purpose of bottling, so far as white beer is concerned; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of seamen, firemen, coal-passers, and marines, who served in defense of the Union during the late rebellion, praying for a bounty of $100 a year, or eight and one third dollars per month for each month of service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. PATTERSON presented the memorial of A. W. Walker, praying for compensation for services rendered as a captain in the eighth Tennessee infantry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of residents of the towns of Wayne and Urbana, Steuben county, New York, praying for an increased duty on wool; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

He also presented a letter from Moses H. Grinnell, inclosing resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, in favor of the passage of the joint resolution repealing so much of the China mail act as requires the steamship line thereby authorized to touch at the Sandwich Islands; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented two petitions from citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, now pending in the Senate; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. HENDERSON presented a petition of citizens of Missouri, praying for an increased duty on flaxseed; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

He also presented the memorial of Logan Hutton, of Missouri, praying for compensation for services rendered in the prosecution of Narcisso Lopez and others, for a violation of the neutrality laws of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 276) to establish a department of education, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 457) for the relief of Hiram Paulding, rear admiral in the United States Navy, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1051) for the relief of Henry P. Blanchard, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1030) to regulate the sale of gold by the Secretary of the Treasury, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 918) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment:

A bill (H. R. No. 1044) for the relief of John Gray, a revolutionary soldier;

A bill (H. R. No. 1045) for the relief of Daniel Frederick Bakeman, a revolutionary soldier;

A bill (H. R. No. 1050) for the relief of Lemuel Worster;

A bill (H. R. No. 1054) for the relief of Hiram Hedrick; and

A bill (H. R. No. 1052) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Clements.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. No. 1055) for the relief of John Moreau, of Machias, New York, and the bill (S. No. 1053) granting an increased pension to John J. Sohan, reported them with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred resolutions of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Union of Washington city, in favor of the payment of pensions to those pensioners from whom they were withheld agreeably to the provisions of the law withholding pensions from persons holding office under the Government, which law has been since repealed, reported that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of pensioners of the United States, praying for an amendment to the act entitled "An act supplementary to the several acts relating to pensions," approved March 3, 1865, so as to restore to them pensions from the 3d of March, 1865, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of the Cincinnati Relief Union, praying for an increase of the clerical force in the Pension Office that greater dispatch may be used in the preparation of papers for pensions, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of J. Nolestine and others, mail route agents on the western division of the Ohio and Mississippi railroad, praying for an increase of compensation, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, the subject having been disposed of by legislation at the present session of Congress.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. No. 137) authorizing special juries in the District of Columbia, have had the same under consideration, and recommend that it be indefinitely postponed. A bill has been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia embodying somewhat the same provisions, and the committee therefore recommend that this resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 442) to prevent courts being used as instruments of persecution against loyal persons, have had the same under consideration, and recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed. An act that was passed at the last session seems to cover substantially the grounds that this bill does.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of Henry Addison and Henry D. Cooke, praying for such an amendment to the act authorizing the construction of a jail in the District of Columbia that the cities of Washington and Georgetown be required to contribute only their equitable proportion of the expense, reported a bill (S. No. 550) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a jail in and for the District of Columbia," approved June 25, 1866. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

REMOVAL OF LIQUOR CASES.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate directing the committee to inquire concerning the removal of cases from the State courts to the Supreme Court of the United States on indictment for the sale of spirituous liquors, have instructed me to report it back to the Senate with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed. I will state that the Supreme Court has recently made a decision which I think accomplishes the object that was sought to be inquired into by this resolution. It was insisted in some of the States that where parties had paid the excise duty or license to the Government of the United States to pursue a certain calling they had authority to follow it in defiance of the State laws; as for instance, to sell liquors where the laws of the State prohibited the selling of liquors, or to vend lottery tickets where the laws of the State forbade the selling of lottery tickets; but the Supreme Court, I understand, have decided that the imposition of this excise duty or the collection of this tax by the Government of the United States does not override the State law or make valid that which is made invalid by the laws of the State, and therefore there is no necessity for action on this subject. The committee recommend that the resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The report was agreed to.

JAMES C. PICKETT.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the memorial of James C. Pickett, formerly chargé d'affaires of the United States at Peru, praying for the passage of a resolution authorizing the readjustment of his accounts, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back to the Senate with a recommendation that it be indefinitely postponed. This petition has already once been under the consideration of the committee at the last session. They then reported it with a request to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and giving leave to withdraw the petition. Now it reappears. The petition is founded on services as chargé d'affaires more than twenty years ago, and it asks that his accounts during that period should be reopened in order that he may obtain from the Government, according to a recent precedent, the loss of exchange at that time. The committee have thought that whatever might be the merits of such claims when comparatively recent it was not expedient to open one so far back in our history as this. They therefore instruct me to ask that the petition be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Before the vote is taken on the report of the committee I desire to say that I presented that petition from Colonel Pickett upon the assurance of the fact that just such claims had been allowed by the Committee on Foreign Relations and had been passed by Congress—not quite so old, but in the case of Mr. Clay, perhaps Cassius M. Clay.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; J. Randolph Clay.

Mr. HENDRICKS. J. Randolph Clay; and in one other case, perhaps, the allowance had been made. I will oppose its indefinite postponement for the present. I do not care about discussing it now in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is reported from the committee to-day, and is not before the Senate, unless by unanimous consent, for consideration, and goes over under the rule, objection being made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 551) for the construction of a Government telegraph from Washington to New York city; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RAMSEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 552) to incorporate the Colored Mutual Building Association of the city of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 553) to provide for the care and maintenance of the Indians in northern California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a joint resolution without previous notice, that it may be printed and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. I am requested to introduce this joint resolution. I do not know anything about its merits. It does not concern the people that I represent. I do it to accommodate a friend.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 162) to fix the construction of the act granting lands in Nebraska Territory to the Burlington and Missouri River Railroad Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

COMPENSATION OF CIVIL EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask leave to present an amendment which I propose to offer to-morrow to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 224) giving additional compensation to certain employés in the civil service of the Government at Washington, which I desire to have printed so that it can be laid upon the desks of Senators.

The amendment was ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 900) to fix the compensation of the officers of the revenue-cutter service, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 903) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1868; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 251) to extend the time for codifying the laws relating to customs authorized by the joint resolution approved July 26, 1866.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

COUNTERFEITING, ETC., PUBLIC SECURITIES.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I now move to take up the motion, which I submitted two days ago, to reconsider the vote on the passage of House bill No. 719. The Committee on the Judiciary have since considered that bill informally, and have agreed on such amendments as ought to be made to the bill before it passes. The chairman will present those amendments, if it is the pleasure of the Senate to reconsider the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate reconsider its vote passing the bill (H. R. No. 719) to punish certain crimes in relation to the public securities and currency, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is now moved that the vote of the Senate ordering the bill to a third reading be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is now before the Senate, and open to amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is a bill "to punish certain crimes in relation to the public securities and currency, and for other purposes." It was reported by Mr. Clark, of New Hampshire, who is not now a member of the Senate, at the last session, and was called up a day or two ago at my instance, in consequence of information I received from the Treasury Department, that they desired the bill passed. It is a House bill. I had not particularly looked at the bill since the last session, and had forgotten all about the punishment prescribed after the bill had passed, and my attention was called to it, and also that of the Senator from Indiana; we thought the punishments prescribed were unusually severe, and probably would defeat the object of the bill itself, as convictions perhaps never would be had if such punishments were prescribed. It was with the view in correcting the bill in those respects that the motion to reconsider was made. As has already been stated by the Senator from Indiana, the Judiciary Committee reconsidered the subject this morning, and we have agreed to propose certain amendments. I now move to amend the first section of the bill, in line eighteen, by striking out the word "fifteen" and inserting "ten;" and in the same line by striking out the words "more than ten" and inserting "exceeding five;" so that it will read:

And on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned not more than ten years, or fined not exceeding $5,000, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In section second, line thirteen, I move to strike out the words "on conviction be fined $1,000," and to insert in lieu thereof "be subject to a penalty of $1,000;" so that it will read:

Any person or persons offending against the provisions of this section shall be subject to a penalty of $1,000, to be recovered by an action of debt, one half to the use of the informer.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In section three, line nine, I move to strike out the word "three" and insert the word "one;" so as to read:

A penalty of one hundred dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In section four, line seventeen, I move to strike out the word "fifteen" and insert "ten;" and in line eighteen to strike out the words "nor less than five years," and also the words "less than," in the same line, and to insert the word "exceeding;" so that it will read:

And on conviction be punished by imprisonment not more than ten years, or by fine not exceeding $5,000, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In section five, line two, after the word "shall," I move to insert the words "with intent to defraud;" so as to read:

Who shall, with intent to defraud, have in his possession, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move further to amend the same section in line seven by inserting after "shall" the words "with intent to defraud."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In section five, line eleven, I move to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten," and also to strike out the words "nor less than five years," in line twelve, and strike out the words "less than" and to insert "exceeding;" and also to strike out the words "at the discretion of the court;" so as to read:

Not more than ten years, or by fine not exceeding $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In section six, line thirty-one, I move to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten;" and in the same line to strike out the words "nor less than five years," and also "less than," and the word "not," and to insert the word "exceeding;" so that it will read:

Be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years, or by fine not exceeding $5,000, or both, at the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. These alterations will be made in this section, to make the section conform to the other sections of the bill, if there be no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In section seven, line twenty-three, I move to strike out "fifteen" and to insert "ten;" and also to strike out the words "more than ten" and to insert "exceeding five;" so that it will read:

And on conviction be imprisoned not more than ten years, or fined not exceeding $5,000, at the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will also be made to make the section conform to the other sections of the bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Those are all the amendments that I desire to propose.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read a third time, and passed.

MINISTER AT VIENNA.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a resolution, on which I ask the present action of the Senate:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of the letter on which the Secretary of State founded his recent inquiries, addressed to Mr. Motley, minister of the United States at Vienna, with regard to his reported conversation and opinions, and to furnish the name of the writer of such letter.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President—

Mr. CONNESS. Let it be adopted.

Mr. SUMNER. So I say; let it be adopted. I have the honor to be a friend of Mr. Motley, and therefore it is that I have introduced the resolution. I am also a Senator of the United States, and I deem it important to the public interest that we should know on what authority the Secretary of State has undertaken to address one of our foreign ministers as he has. I received a letter identical in language, so far as I can judge, with that which seems to be set forth by the Secretary of State in his letter, and it was addressed to me from Europe, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations; but it was from a person so entirely obscure that I regarded the letter as nothing but anonymous, and I threw it into the fire. The Secretary of State has made it the basis of inquiries addressed to Mr. Motley, which I will not here characterize. I wish to see the letter.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I certainly have no objection to the production of the letter—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. SUMNER. Let this resolution pass.

Mr. CONNESS. I object, because the resolution might have been passed a few minutes ago if the Senator had not made a speech; and by making a speech he has deprived some of us of the opportunity of offering resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Chair is bound to call up the special order.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to that coming up.

TARIFF BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes.

Mr. DIXON. I desire to correct an error of my own in regard to the amendment adopted by the Senate yesterday relating to stereoscopes. In drafting the amendment which was adopted by the Senate I made a mistake, which by general consent I desire to have corrected; and I have the assent of the chairman of the Finance Committee. The amendment as adopted should have been in this form: after line thirty-three of section eleven, page 80, insert these words:

On lenses for stereoscopes, with or without frames, forty per cent. ad valorem, and, in addition thereto, for such lenses ground and polished on both sides, one dollar per dozen pairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The correction will be made if there be no objection. None being made, the amendment will be made as stated.

Mr. CONNESS. On page 47, line one hundred and forty-six, I move—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that there is an amendment pending on which a vote was taken last evening, and the Senate dissolved for want of a quorum. The pending amendment will be read.

Mr. CONNESS. I have been led into error by the Chair receiving an amendment from another Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was stated to be a correction of a mistake in regard to an amendment adopted yesterday; and it was done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONNESS. I did not understand it to be the correction of a mistake.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was so stated. The Chair knows nothing of it but from the statement. The Chair understood the Senator from Connecticut to say there was a mistake in the amendment adopted yesterday which it was desired to correct. The Chair asked if there was any objection to the correction of the mistake; none was made, and the correction was therefore ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. Let the amendment before the Senate be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] moves to amend the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole by inserting after line sixteen of section thirteen, on page 84, the words which will be read.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

On all bituminous coal mined and imported from any place not more than thirty degrees of longitude east of Washington, fifty cents per ton of twenty-eight bushels, eighty pounds to the bushel.

Mr. JOHNSON. I stated yesterday and the previous day, when this subject was before us, that it was really a controversy between the American owners of American mines and the British owners of mines in Nova Scotia or Americans who have become the owners of those mines. And I stated also, independent of that, the grounds upon which I supposed it was just to ourselves and proper to protect our own mines as against the competing mines referred to. I was not so well advised then of the facts as I am to-day. I find upon my desk—I do not know whether other members have seen it—the paper of the morning, in which is an article written by a gentleman who is perfectly familiar with the coal trade, and is in the habit of writing strongly upon the subjects to which he addresses himself, stating that it really is a contest of that description; that the question which this amendment involves is whether the American owner of the mines within our own limits is to be sacrificed either to the foreign owner of the foreign mines or to the American refugee, who, leaving his own country and unwilling to engage in mining in his own country because it promised to be more profitable elsewhere, has purchased foreign mines. Now, it is not for me to use such a term as that as applicable to any American citizen. Every citizen of the United States has a right to go anywhere that he thinks proper, and buy coal mines or any other property under the expectation or for the purpose of making it profitable by introducing the product of these mines into the United States.

I would not, therefore, apply to any gentleman who may think proper to invest their funds in that way the term "refugee;" but I call the attention of my friend from Massachusetts to the fact that he is now supporting, or seeming to support, the interest of American refugees, as contra-distinguished from American loyal men who are looking to the true interest of their country; and that he is doing something more than that: he is seeking to protect, and to promote by protecting, in our own legislation the interest of the foreigner as against the interest of the American citizen. It seems to me a little singular that when he is protecting as against all other American citizens, or at least against a vast majority of American citizens, the interests of his own section, and particularly of his own State, from the effect of competition by importation from abroad, he should be found urging so strenuously the protection of the interest of foreigners where they are alone concerned as against his own fellow-citizens, and especially that he should be found protecting American citizens who, in the language of the paper to which I have adverted, are designated as refugees. I have no objection to the article, except that the language in which it is couched would, I think, be hardly parliamentary to use here, and certainly, with my notions of what decorum requires in debate, I should not apply it to the constituents of any member of this body upon any such evidence as that to which the editor refers.

But there is a further intimation—and I call the attention of my friend from Massachusetts to that fact—there is not only an intimation, but there is a further charge in the article that we are being influenced (not I in this particular instance, but I suppose my friend from Massachusetts and those who may be found to concur with him in this matter) by the persons who are hanging around our Chamber, foreigners in point of fact, or the agents of foreigners, who are seeking in every way to which they can resort to strike down American industry, for the purpose of protecting foreign industry. I hope the fact is not so; and certainly if the fact is not so, the paper to which I advert is the last paper in which such a charge should be found.

Mr. WILSON. I have always made it a habit to read newspapers, to let them criticize me just as much as they please, and never to take any notice of their remarks on the floor of the Senate. I do not propose to do so at this time. I will simply say, without any reference to this article in this paper or any other paper, that the manufacturers, the farmers, wool-growers, business men of every kind and degree, are coming here, writing here, using their influence as far as they properly can, to see that in adjusting this tariff their interests are taken care of; and they have a right to do it. The importers, the free-traders, all classes and conditions of men who do not wish the tariff changed, or rather who would wish to see it reduced; are coming here, writing here, and using their influence to affect our legislation.

I do not suppose any member of the Senate closes his ears to whatever is written him or whatever he hears; but it is proper that he should listen to all persons in the country in regard to this matter, and act conscientiously and according to the dictates of his own judgment. That persons will go to the presses of the country and there express their views on both sides of these matters, so as sometimes to do injustice, is to be expected; and for one I do not think it worth while for us here on the floor of the Senate to take any notice of such things or feel at all troubled about them, but to do our duty, and the people of the country will judge of us by our daily lives, by our general course of action, rather than by any particular vote we give here on the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. So far as I am personally concerned I find no inducement to make any reply to the article which the Senator from Maryland has brought into this body; but when that article undertakes to speak of a gentleman in the service of the Government as it does, I find a motive for adding one word, which I certainly do not find in any references which it makes to myself. That article, as I say, which the Senator from Maryland has introduced into this body, uses the following language—

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator will permit me to say that I introduced it because I understand it is on the desk of every Senator, put here for the purpose of enlightening us.

Mr. SUMNER. I make no complaint of course of the Senator's introducing it; I simply referred to the fact. It is stated: "The importations of provincial coal for the year 1863 are erroneously and deceptively stated by Mr. Wells to have been only two hundred and ninety-one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine tons." There is certainly a grave charge against Mr. Wells, whose report is on our tables and whose faithful attention to this question all Senators must have already recognized. You observe the language in which he is characterized. It is absolutely unjust. Refer to his report, and you will find it is not in any respect sustained. In that report he sets out in the form of a table the tons introduced each year, beginning with 1855 and ending with 1866, under two different heads, the tons under the reciprocity treaty and the tons paying duty. The tons paying duty in 1866 were two hundred and ninety-one thousand eight hundred and thirty-nine; and this article says that this is erroneously and deceptively stated by Mr. Wells. I think, sir, a cause that requires such language from those who represent it ought to be suspected. I do suspect the cause. I do suspect that peculiar interest which is now trying to intrude into the legislation of the country to such an extent as to be positively oppressive in that part of the country from which I came. It not only asks much for itself, but in the support of its cause it misrepresents and vilifies responsible gentlemen who stand in the way.

However, I have said enough on this calumny; and now, as I have the report of the Commissioner of Public Revenue, to which reference has been made, in my hands, I will go further with the indulgence of the Senate and ask your attention to a few sentences. I think if you will listen to them you will find an answer to all that my eloquent friend from Maryland on my right [Mr. CRESWELL] said yesterday, and to all that my ingenious and able friend from Maryland on the other side [Mr. JOHNSON] said. Mr. Wells thus reports:

"Is there any reason why a furnace in Maine or Georgia should have the cost of its iron increased by a duty on the coal which it consumes, or by the cost of transportation from Pennsylvania, while the Pennsylvania manufacturer has his coal at his own door, cheaper, at least, by the cost of its transportation? Is it wise to adopt a policy which inevitably tends to concentrate so important a manufacture as this in a single section of the country?"

"That the American coal proprietor obtains a sufficient price for his coal is evident from the prices which prevail in the markets where there is no competition. He supplies the Ohio and the Mississippi and their tributary streams, and through all the territory which they water, with coal at a less expense than on the sea-board. He received no more for his coal at the mine in 1866, with a duty on foreign coal of $1.25 in gold, than he did in 1865, when provincial coal was free. It has been no boon to him that New York and the New England States have had the cost of their bituminous coals increased more than half a million dollars in currency value paid in the form of duties.

"If the miner has not received the benefit from this protection, it must have inured to the benefit of the transportation arrangements. If, however, neither the miner nor the transportation company has derived any benefit from it, the duty has been of no avail as protection.

"The object of a duty is either revenue or protection. A smaller duty would increase the revenue by increasing importations. The present duty does not seem to have afforded protection.

"It is, perhaps, unnecessary to recapitulate here the well-known arguments for making coal free of all duty. The manufacturing industry of any country, to be permanently successful, must be based on cheap raw materials; and if there be any article then that should be exempted from taxation, both internal and customs, and afforded at the cheapest possible rate to all consumers, it is coal. Every person in this country has a direct interest that his house shall be warmed and lighted at the lowest cost, and that his food shall be cheaply cooked; while cheap steam and cheap iron are essential if the country is to maintain its position with other and competing commercial and manufacturing nations.

"The commissioner, therefore, having in view the general welfare rather than any special interest, recommends that the duty on coal be either entirely removed or placed at the lowest point consistent with the requirements of the Treasury for revenue."

Now, I am ready to adopt every word which is so well said by the commissioner. I agree with him that you ought not to impose the duty you now propose, because you in that way will interfere with the general welfare. I plead for that general welfare which is one of the objects of our Constitution; but I plead still further that you should not impose any tax which in its nature is peculiarly oppressive on a particular part of the country, especially when there is no corresponding advantage derived from it. On that principle I am ready to stand and to accept its application to all the interests on which I have to act. I say therefore, sir, in one word the proposed tax on coal is contrary to the general welfare of our country, and it is a positive oppression on an important part of the country.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not rise, sir, to take part in the discussion of this coal question, but to express the hope that while the Senator from Massachusetts adopts the views of the special commissioner of revenue, Mr. Wells, on the subject of coal, he will extend his co-operation and give his influence to the support of the other recommendation, contained in the commissioner's report. I must also express my surprise that the Senator should deem it at all strange that the commissioner's statement should be called in question, or that he should be maligned and slandered for the statements he has made. Why, sir, I think I told the Senate that any man who opposed the passage of this bill must expect to be slandered, and I think that the prophecy is being fulfilled throughout the country.

As another illustration to be added to that furnished by the Senator from Massachusetts of the truth of this, I wish to state that in the report of the special commissioner made to the Secretary of the Treasury, when discussing the subject of wool, a subject which I have had occasion to investigate somewhat, he gave a statement of the amount of production and consumption in this country and the amount of importation into it; and as the basis of his statement he adopted the report of the Wool-Growers' Association themselves, accepting even their precise figures. Now, within the last few days we have an article in the newspapers, and telegraphed all over the country, stating that a Mr. Dodge—who he is I do not know, but said to be connected somehow as a clerk in one of the Departments of the Government—has furnished an altogether different statement. The wool-growers were mistaken about their own production it seems, and Mr. Wells is mistaken, and Mr. Dodge, by some species of information which he says he has been able to gather, is able to present an altogether different state of facts in regard to wool, woolen manufactures, and woolen fabrics, and consumption.

Mr. BROWN. A new "dodge."

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; as my friend from Missouri says, it is simply a "new dodge" to secure the adoption of this bill.

Mr. President, I have my own views in regard to this question of coal now before us, and I wish it to be distinctly understood that any vote I may give upon this amendment is not predicated upon any principle involved in the general subject or in the bill as an entirety, upon which I profess to stand.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Iowa has appealed to me to carry out my principles with reference to this bill. Now I appeal to that Senator to carry out his principles with reference to coal. He must be in favor of cheap coal: I know that he must be; and I ask for his vote.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President I am in favor of cheap coal myself and I like to have everything cheap when I have to buy it. I am not so particular about it being cheap when I have it to sell.

On this question of coal I shall feel compelled to vote against the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I should give my vote silently but for the fact that the Senator has pressed upon us the idea that this tax of one hundred and twenty five cents—

Mr. SUMNER. One hundred and fifty.

Mr. HOWE. One hundred and twenty-five I believe it stands now—a dollar and a quarter.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the present law.

Mr. HOWE. Either a tax of $1.25 or $1.50 would, he says, be oppressive and unjust upon an important section of the country. If I believed it were oppressive, peculiarly oppressive, or at all unjust to any section of the country, whether important or unimportant, I should vote with the Senator from Massachusetts; and if there were not a coal mine in Pennsylvania or Maryland or in the United States to be protected, if the idea of protection were altogether, as it is almost, abandoned by this bill, if we had no regard to anything in the world but revenue, I would still think that this was the mildest revenue duty to be found in the bill. This coal, for the importation of which Senators seem to be struggling at a low rate of duty is used I understand for two purposes, mainly to make gas and oil of—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not oil: to make gas and iron.

Mr. HOWE. I understand you get your oil coal from the same neighborhood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes.

Mr. HOWE. And it comes in under the same duty. It is used for these two purposes mainly. It is said to make about from sixty to one hundred gallons of oil to the ton, and it will make about ten thousand feet of gas. Is that an oppressive tax upon the consumers of either the oil or the gas? It will be about twelve and a half cents on a thousand feet of gas. That gas I suppose sells for three or four dollars a thousand feet in the different cities where it is made. This duty increases the cost of that gas about twelve and a half cents. You will not let a citizen of the United States use a pound of chicory root, which I do not suppose you mean to protect at all, unless he pays for the privilege of consuming in his family that pound of chicory root five cents, the same as on coffee. You charge him five cents for consuming a pound of coffee; and that as a pure revenue measure. Well, if you charge as high for the privilege of consuming a pound of chicory root as five cents, I think you are bound to charge as high as twelve and a half cents for consuming a thousand feet of gas. This is much the lowest rate of tax, and I do not feel that I am oppressing New England or unjust to any portion of New England by the vote I give. I do not mean to be.

Sir, I regret I indulged in any reflection upon the general character of this bill. I regret it for two reasons. I am not entirely sure that I was not unjust to the bill, and I am not entirely certain, in view of what I saw here last night, that I was not a little imprudent myself. I believe it is rather the fashion not to express any very decided opinions about this bill one way or the other; it is considered a little safer to find fault with it than to approve it; but there was a degree of fluttering exhibited here last night that I had not witnessed before, and could not account for on the occasion.

I am going to vote for this bill, and I am going to vote for it with a steady nerve, I think, unless it is hurt between this time and the time of its final passage more than I anticipate it will be hurt. I know, Mr. President, that there is a difference of opinion in the country about these measures, and has been for a great many years. We have been debating them very fiercely for some forty or fifty years, and we have been experimenting upon them. There is a class of people in the United States who think it is for our interest to buy everything we want to buy where we can buy it for the least money, and that no impediments ought to be put in the way of our doing so; and therefore they are opposed to all systems of duty laid for the purpose of effecting purchases in our own country. There is another class of gentlemen who think that whatever can be made here, whatever labor can produce here as readily as it can be produced elsewhere, ought to be produced here. These two classes of opinions seem to be about as far apart as they ever were in their real beliefs, but they come very much nearer together in their forms of expression than they used to do years ago. Those who hold to the latter opinion used to be called protectionists; those who hold to the former opinion used to be called the apostles or disciples of free trade. Just now I believe we do not find any very loud advocates of free trade, and certainly none of protection. We find some gentlemen who are in favor of tariffs for revenue with incidental protection, but not for protection; and some gentlemen, like the Senator from Iowa, for instance, who are not for free trade, but for judicious tariffs or systems of duty—

Mr. GRIMES. For revenue purposes.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I shall not take up the time of the Senate by expounding my own views upon this matter at any length; but I have an impression that if we had as much labor here as they have elsewhere in the world trade ought to be as free as possible; that you ought not to impose a heavier tax upon the consumer of a foreign article than an article of home production for the mere purpose of revenue; that there is no reason why you should charge us any more for using a pound of tea than for using a pair of boots in proportion to the value of the two articles. The only object for which I want to see industry protected here at home, or rather to see the articles that we can produce here as readily as they can be produced elsewhere produced here, is for the purpose of evening the amount of labor in this country and in other countries. We are now purchasing and paying for a large proportion of the products of foreign labor. I think it is much cheaper and much better to import that labor than to import those products; and it is for that reason I want to see the United States confine themselves more and more to the consumption of their own productions. I have reference to those productions for which we have the same facilities that they have elsewhere, with the exception of the mere article of labor.

But, sir, I did not mean to be betrayed into the discussion of the general features of this bill, and I should not have said a word upon them if I had not accidentally dropped a remark in the outset which looked like finding fault with it. I only say in conclusion that when we get, if we ever get, to the final vote on the bill I shall vote for it. I do not expect the whole country will be satisfied with this bill. I am not satisfied with it myself, as I said before. I do not expect the whole country will be satisfied with my vote. The question which is the best system for the United States remains to be settled. It has got to be settled. It is not my habit to take a stand astride both sides of any great controversy. I am very apt to be found on one side or the other of it. I belong on one side of this controversy. I have indicated on which side of the controversy I do belong. At some time I shall find an opportunity of stating at some length and with some particularity why I am on that side.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Before the vote is taken I desire to say in reference to my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] that he was yesterday and is to-day confined to his house by indisposition.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Harris, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sprague, Sumner, Williams, and Wilson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Frelinghuysen, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nesmith, Patterson, Ramsey, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Yates—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cattell, Davis, Edmunds, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Howard, Lane, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Sherman, and Trumbull—16.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNESS. On page 47, in line one hundred and forty-six of section nine, I move to strike out "seven" and insert "ten," so as to make the clause read: "On borax, refined, ten cents per pound," instead of seven cents, as the duty is now fixed in the bill. In this connection I desire to call attention to the fact that the present tariff law imposes on this article a duty of ten cents; that the estimate of the commissioner puts it at ten cents; and that in California we have a considerable deposit and manufactory for producing this article, the capital for the manufacture of which has been invested under the present tariff as it now stands; and I am well advised that it will simply lead to the material injury, if not ruin, of the establishment unless the rate be kept up to what it is in the present tariff. I have in my hand a dispatch from one of the gentlemen interested in this manufacture, but at the same time I will say one whose character stands so high with those who know him that his statement will not be questioned. I allude to Frederick Billings, of California. I hope that this change will be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not feel like making any disturbance about this matter. It is true, as the Senator states, that the present tariff law fixes the duty at ten cents a pound, and that rate was recommended by Mr. Wells; but we had before us some statements on the subject from persons appearing on the other side which induced us to change the duty on borax and put it as it is in the bill. If on the whole the Senate think it proper to let it stand as it is in the present tariff, I shall not make any strenuous objection. I merely state the reason why we changed it. We were induced to suppose that the interest did not require so much protection.

Mr. CONNESS. I knew that. The difficulty in the case was that the parties interested on the other side had not an opportunity to appear before the committee, and but one side was heard. It is not the fault of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. Some other amendments must necessarily follow to make the various items consistent. On the same page, in line one hundred and forty-five, I move to strike out "three" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

On borax, crude or lineal, and on crude borates not otherwise herein provided for, five cents per pound.

Five cents is the present rate, as well as the rate recommended by the commissioner.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. I now move in line one hundred and forty-seven, on the same page, to strike out "three" and to insert "five;" so as to read:

On boracic acid, crude, five cents per pound.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. In line one hundred and forty-eight, I move to strike out "eight" and insert "fifteen;" so as to read:

On boracic acid, refined, hydrated, fifteen cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope that amendment will not be made.

Mr. CONNESS. That is the rate fixed in the House bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that, but I think that the House bill put it too high.

Mr. CONNESS. The recommendation of the commissioner is twelve cents. I desire to say in this connection that Professor Torrey, who is good authority on the subject, says that fifteen cents on the hydrated, and twenty-seven cents on the anhydrous is equivalent to the other rates in the present tariff.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know who Professor Torrey is. He may be a very good chemist, but I am not aware that he knows everything that may be advisable with regard to a tariff bill. I remember now distinctly the ground on which we put these duties. It was stated to us that there is one firm in New York that has contracts for the California borax and its products for a considerable length of time, which gives them the entire control of it in the New York market. On the other side we had a letter from that firm, in which it was admitted that they had the monopoly of it. It is an entire monopoly, and the duties are so high as to keep everybody else out. I think now that, on reflection, the commissioner is satisfied with the changes we made, and acceded to them, believing the duties as we have placed them to be high enough. I shall not, however, make any objections to the changes made by the Senator from California as far as they have gone if he will be satisfied with putting the hydrated at twelve cents and the anhydrous at twenty-five, instead of fifteen and twenty-seven, as he proposes.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not like to make any contest on these points against the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee. I am satisfied, whatever the parties in New York referred to may do, that the California manufacturers have never made a dollar from their investments up to this hour; and I am also entirely satisfied that the rates proposed by me, fifteen and twenty-seven cents, judging from the statements made to me upon competent authority, are the equivalent of ten cents upon the refined. Boracic acid, hydrated and anhydrous, are the articles out of which the refined borax is made; and unless a comparative rate of duty is put upon these articles the result is simply to let into the country at a lower rate of duty the articles out of which the refined borax is made, thus competing severely with our products and with our manufacture. I think that the motion I have made is entirely right.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope it will not be adopted.

The question being taken; there were, on a division—yeas 10, nays 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think there is a quorum present, as will be seen if the Chair will put the question again. It is a pity if we have to take the yeas and nays on every question.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not insist on the call.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to submit an observation in reply to what was said by the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Business cannot proceed until the presence of a quorum is ascertained. The vote just taken disclosing the want of a quorum, no business can be done until it is ascertained that a quorum is present.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Chair can do that, I suppose, by counting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. (after counting the Senators present.) The Chair ascertains by counting that there is a quorum of the Senate present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it in order to proceed with the debate upon this question now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ascertained the fact by counting, and announces that a quorum is present. The Senator from Vermont is now in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only wish to say respecting this subject of boracic acid, that it is one of the substances out of which the borax which is used in trade is made; and of late years, as is stated in a very respectable book on the subject of arts which I hold in my hand, borax has been obtained by combining native boracic acid with soda. That is the way now that borax is made. Therefore, if we wish to protect the manufacture of borax, it is necessary, in order to adjust this rate to the other rates that have been agreed upon, to make the advance which is suggested by the Senator from California.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again put the question. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The question being put, there were on a division—yeas 18, nays 7.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting, but a quorum is present, as the Chair has ascertained by actual count.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why cannot gentlemen give themselves the trouble to stand up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are thirty members present, and but twenty-five voting.

Mr. GRIMES. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will let the amendment go unless somebody objects. I "give it up."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That cannot now be done. The last vote disclosed the want of a quorum. The fact of there being a quorum must be ascertained.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Can we not have a recount?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays being called for, the question will be put upon seconding that call.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Poland, Ramsey, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Yates—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Henderson, Kirkwood, Morgan, Patterson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Sumner, and Wilson—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Davis, Fogg, Guthrie, Howard, Lane, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Sherman, and Trumbull—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move on page 86 to strike out lines fifty-seven, fifty-eight, fifty-nine, sixty, and sixty-one of section thirteen, and in lieu thereof to insert:

On soapstone, freestone, sandstone, granite, and all building or monumental stones, except marble, four dollars per ton of thirteen cubic feet.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That amendment leaves out paving stones and lets them come in free.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. An amendment can be made on that point afterward. This amendment relates principally to freestone, which is found, as we know, in large quantities in Connecticut, New Jersey, and Ohio, and in which business there is a large amount of capital now invested, and there are several thousand laborers employed, to whom a large amount of money is annually paid by way of wages. The freestone which is spoken of in this amendment cannot be delivered in the market for less than $1 35 a cubic foot, with a reasonable profit, which is about seventeen dollars and fifty cents a ton. That I am well certified of. This Nova Scotia stone, I am credibly informed, is invoiced at less than three dollars a ton, and sells in the market at as high a price as the freestone, $17 50 a ton. The whole of this $1 35 a cubic foot is labor, with the exception of ten cents for rent. The highest rent these quarries ever command is ten cents per cubic foot. This amendment, then, is clearly protecting American labor against the labor of Nova Scotia. I am very clear in my mind that we are under no obligation to these British Provinces to legislate for their benefit, but that we are bound to protect the hardy men who are employed in our quarries and to protect our own capital.

It has been said that this increase of duty will make building material higher. I do not think it will affect the price of building materials at all. There is so wide a margin between the cost of the Nova Scotia stone and the price at which it sells in market that even with the four dollars a ton duty it will still be largely imported into our market, and compete with the freestone of our States.

The object of this amendment is twofold. It will give us a large revenue, for the business will be still carried on at a good profit by those engaged in quarrying in Nova Scotia even after taking off the four dollars. The quarrymen of the States are interested in having this amendment adopted, because, unless the profits of that business are thus pruned, large amounts of capital will be invested in it, and the market will be flooded with stone from the Nova Scotia quarries. I think the amendment must commend itself to the judgment of the Senate. It will give us a revenue, and it will not increase the price, but will prevent the stone from these quarries commanding the market.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the rate of duty proposed by the amendment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Four dollars a ton.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask what is the object of striking out all these lines? Why not simply say "on freestone" distinctly so much? Why strike out "paving stones, slabs, and flags not dressed?"

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I took the amendment as it was offered to the Senate before, simply striking out "grindstones."

Mr. FESSENDEN. But the Senator strikes out several lines that he cannot really want to interfere with. Why not leave the fifty-seventh, fifty-eighth, and fifty-ninth lines, and then insert a portion of his provision as a distinct amendment? Why not make a distinction between the uncut and undressed stone and that which is cut and dressed?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. A distinction between the dressed and undressed Nova Scotia stone would not reach the purpose. The other suggestion of the honorable Senator as to paving stones, slabs, and flags, I have no objection to adopting; but if the distinction referred to should be made this stone would come in partially dressed so as to evade the duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That would depend altogether on the officers of the custom-house. They ought to be able to tell whether the stone was dressed or undressed. The result of this proposition is to exclude the Nova Scotia stone altogether. That is simply the object of this amendment on the Senator's own showing.

I really did not suspect that my honorable friend from New Jersey would repeat what we have so often heard on similar propositions, because I thought he was a little above that sort of thing; but he brings in the old story about foreign labor, &c. That may do very well for an article in the Chronicle, and it may do very well for cases where there is no argument that can be used; but it is hardly fitted for anything beyond that. Now let us take the Senator's own statement. He says the Nova Scotia stone comes in here and sells in our market for the same price that is charged for our own stone. If it sells at the same price and does not undersell our stone, where is the injury to our own production? Unless he wants to exclude the Nova Scotia stone altogether the argument is not applicable, and I apprehend the amendment is so drawn as to produce that result, to exclude the Nova Scotia stone altogether. If it could undersell our own stone that would be one thing. If the importers were able to sell the Nova Scotia stone at a rate for which the owners of the quarries in our own country could not sell their stone it would seem to be an argument for protection; but the Senator says both sell at the same price.

I have heard these broad statements about the price of labor in Nova Scotia, but I have not yet heard any authority given for them. It is taken for granted that labor there is at the very low figures which have been stated here. Now, I am informed on the contrary that in the Nova Scotia quarries laborers receive $1 50 a day in gold. I think Senators would be a little wiser if they did not pay too much attention to these broad statements that are made by interested parties with regard to things of which no proof whatever is furnished.

The only view the Committee on Finance had in reference to this matter was one which gentlemen in debate do not seem to recognize. The committee thought that with regard to articles of use for building purposes, which were rough materials, it was not worth while to lay on so heavy a duty as to oppress the consumer. Gentlemen forget that there are three parties to these compacts. There is, in the first place, the grower of the raw material; there is in the next place the man who manufactures out of the raw material. Senators seem to think that if these two parties agree the matter is settled—it is all right; but I beg leave to remind them that there is a still larger class interested, and that is the people who use the material after it is brought to a State where it can be used. I think it is worth while to remember their interests as well as those of the other two classes, while, as I have said more than once, I am in favor of and have endeavored to so act in arranging this tariff all through, as to afford, with the duties which we must necessarily place upon imported articles, adequate protection, all that is needed to our own various manufacturing interests, I am not in favor of going beyond that merely for the sake of carrying out a principle of protecting American labor. I want to protect it just as far it needs protection, and I think the tariff affords ample opportunity to do that as it has been arranged; but I do not want to go further than that in laying burdens upon the consumer.

I differ entirely with my honorable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. Howe] in the remark he dropped, that this was not a tariff for a protection. And while I am up I want to state one other thing, and then of course gentlemen will do as they please; the matter does not interest me particularly more than any one else. The tariff bill as it came from the other House was a higher tariff than this in almost every article. We have adhered to that bill in only one particular, and that is in regard to the duty on wools and woolens. In regard to all other items, I will not say all, but as a general rule on pretty much all the other items this is a protective tariff, but not so high as the tariff of duties imposed by the House bill as it came to us. And yet a member of the House which passed that bill, and one of those who voted for it, came to me this morning and complained that we in the Senate had put on such an enormous tariff of duties. I asked him what he sent the bill here for, and he could not answer that question.

Here let me state, once for all—because I do not want to make any general speech on this subject; I am obliged to make too many small speeches to indulge myself or to afflict the Senate by making an extended one—that we endeavored faithfully, as well as we were able, on an examination of testimony and on a study of the subject, carried through days and weeks, to arrange the duties in such a way as would afford all the protection that we judged to be needed. If we have made mistakes it is the business of the Senate to correct them; and the Senate has seemed disposed very much to correct them, because I have observed that whenever a gentleman here, at the suggestion of somebody at his elbow outside who is interested in a particular thing and wants a higher rate of duty on it, makes such a proposition, it seems to be taken for granted that he must necessarily know more and have acquired more information upon the subject than could ever have been acquired by the commissioner or by the Committee on Finance. Of course I cannot complain of this. Every gentleman is entitled to vote as he deems proper, but that seems to be the result.

Now, sir, with regard to those building-stones, I do not believe any such consequences will follow from leaving the bill as it stands, as are predicted by the Senator from New Jersey. I have been informed, on authority that is certainly entirely satisfactory to me, and would be, I think, to the Senate if the name of my informant was stated—a gentleman who is not at all interested in this business in any shape whatever—that our own quarries are flourishing and have been from the beginning, and flourished even under the reciprocity treaty. I should like to know how they got along under that treaty. They established their quarries and they went on laboring, and did not particularly complain at that time. Their business flourished under the reciprocity treaty, which allowed building-stones to come in free from Nova Scotia. The reciprocity treaty expired and a duty came upon the article, and they have been suffering ever since, according to their story; suffering a great deal more than they did when it came free, for then they did not complain. The thing does not look to me probable.

Sir, I have stated the view which the committee took. The Senate will arrange the matter in its own way according to its own judgment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In reference to the counsel of the honorable Senator, not to put too much confidence in the statements that are made to me, I admit that that is certainly very proper; but the fact is that the House committee had a full investigation of this subject, had the parties before them, and they, knowing the facts, fixed the duty at five dollars, when we now only ask four dollars; so that it seems a thorough investigation of the facts led them to think that that duty was necessary, and I believe (perhaps I am wrongly informed) that the committee of the Senate had no investigation in regard to it; that the parties were not before them. Probably this was the fault of the parties themselves.

The argument of the distinguished Senator, that this stone coming into our market does not injure American stone, because Nova Scotia stone is offered at the same price, is not a sound argument, for the reason that the Nova Scotia stone is more readily worked than the stone of Connecticut, New Jersey, and Ohio, and consequently has that advantage at the same price.

I cannot agree that it is an unworthy argument or consideration for us to bear in mind the difference between the cost of labor here and in Nova Scotia. It is American labor that this bill is intended to protect—just that. I do not believe that this bill, whether it is passed or not, makes a great deal of difference to the capitalist. If a man has got a factory he can close it and let it stand still; the doors shut for six months, and he can bring the laborers and the artisans of the United States to his terms, make them take what wages he gives, even if it is as low—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me say that my friend's statement is exactly in the teeth of all the statements made to us by the manufacturers. They told us their laborers would not work for low prices, and that they were compelled, on account of the workmen demanding high prices for their labor, to ask additional protection.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is exactly my idea. The capitalist can close his factory and keep it closed for six months, but the laborers and artisans must work or starve. It is to the credit of the employers that they will not force them to that predicament, but that they come here and ask for a tariff which will protect American labor and enable them to pay such wages as the mechanics are entitled to receive. But even, on the statement of the distinguished Senator, there is a vast difference between the price of labor in Nova Scotia and in the United States. If labor is in Nova Scotia $1 50 a day, it is here $2 25; but I am informed that the price of labor there is much lower than the sum stated, and that not more than a dollar a day is paid in Nova Scotia.

The Senator is also in error, I think, as to the prosperity of our quarries, for I have been informed that for a course of years where they are conducted by companies they have passed dividends and returned no profit to those who had their capital invested in them.

Mr. DIXON. The fact just stated by the Senator from New Jersey is true to my knowledge. During the continuance of the reciprocity treaty these quarry companies did pass their dividends entirely. The Senator from Maine has stated that they were prosperous under that treaty while they had no protection. That is not the case; he has been misinformed; and I will state now, without going further into this subject, that it is, as the Senator from New Jersey has said, wholly a question of the protection of American labor. The difficulty is that the prices of labor are so greatly increased by—I may almost say the action of the Government—the consequences of the war, the inflation of the currency, and the great internal taxes; all these causes which have raised the expenses of living have increased the price of labor so that they are paying now $2 50 a day for laborers of the same class who are employed in the Nova Scotia quarries at seventy-five cents a day. It is perfectly evident that the company cannot compete with the quarries of Nova Scotia with that distinction in the prices of labor, and all they ask is such a rate of duty as shall make in some degree an equilibrium with regard to labor. They ask for this amendment four dollars per ton, or four dollars per thirteen cubic feet of stone.

I notice by this bill that another article, which is very similar to this in many respects as a building material, is taxed, the very lowest and cheapest kind—I allude to marble—eight dollars a ton. This is as much a luxury as marble; it is used mainly for the facings of buildings; a thin veneering of it is placed on a building precisely as marble is used. I cannot see why there should be so heavy a protective duty upon marble and no protective duty upon this article.

The Senator from Maine said the other day it paid no internal revenue tax. There again the Senator is misinformed. Every building which is erected of this stone or faced with this stone is treated as a manufactured article and pays a duty of five per cent., and the contractor is obliged to consider that in his estimates, and he does; so that the Government receives upon every one of these stone buildings or brown-stone fronts a duty of five per cent. on the value of this article.

Only a word more with regard to one single point—for I do not feel able to say much at this time—with regard to this being a building material which ought not to be heavily taxed because we do not desire to discourage building. There is a misunderstanding with regard to that. A large portion of this stone is sold at a very cheap rate; a very large portion of it is actually given away; all the loose rubble-stone is allowed to be taken from the quarries for absolutely nothing. Then again, the large blocks of stone which every Senator has seen laid as the foundation of large buildings pay at the quarry only one dollar a ton. It is sold at that low rate. Why is it that the worked stone is so much more expensive? For the very reason the Senator from New Jersey has stated: because of the labor upon it. After having obtained it from the quarry you then place upon it the labor of hewing and it rises in value, and is sold at the quarry for one dollar a ton, thirteen cubic feet, and in New York at $1 35.

Now, with regard to the allegation that Nova Scotia stone is a better article, I will say as the Senator from New Jersey has stated, that it is a little easier wrought; and it is used somewhat for ornamental purposes; but I do not think people will obtain any advantage by increasing the importations of Nova Scotia stone and destroying our own quarries. The result of that would be to compel consumers to pay the same rate that the Nova Scotia stone would cost if our own brown-stone was excluded from the market. When that happens the owners of the Nova Scotia quarries will raise their prices to probably just about the same that the owners of the brown-stone quarries now ask.

If there is in this bill anywhere a question of protection it is raised upon his very point. The stone is valueless as it lies in the quarry, and it only becomes valuable by a very large amount of labor being bestowed upon it; and for that reason we ask what I think is a reasonable amount of protection, four dollars per ton of thirteen cubic feet.

Mr. CATTELL. I desire, Mr. President, to indorse all that was said by the chairman of the Committee on Finance as to the care which was bestowed by that committee on this bill, and further to indorse the remark which he has made, that the duties in this bill have been very largely reduced from what they were in the bill that came to us from the House; and while I have in almost all cases voted with the committee, I nevertheless think that there were a few errors committed by the committee, that there were some mistakes in the bill to be rectified, and among them, in my judgment, is this one in reference to stone. I so represented to the committee my views. I believe that the protection which is asked by the gentleman connected with this interest is not more than that accorded to other departments of industry in the country, and no more than is absolutely essential to the protection of the interest; and as I am bound in this case, in accordance with my own judgment, to vote against the report of the committee, I felt a desire to explain the reason.

While I am on my feet I wish to make another remark, and that is with regard to the assertions which have been so frequently made during the course of this discussion that this is an extravagantly high tariff. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. Brown] does not call it a tariff for protection; he calls it a tariff for prohibition. Now, I have only to say that from a careful observation of this tariff bill as reported by the Finance Committee, in my judgment it is not an advance of ten per cent. upon the duties of the existing tariff, taking the whole tariff through. The rates imposed by this tariff bill do not add as much as the manufacturing interests of this country directly and indirectly are taxed by the internal revenue laws in addition to what they were taxed when the last tariff bill was passed.

Gentlemen in the adjustment forget of this tariff that there are an enormous number of indirect taxations to which our people are subjected. Gentlemen forget that the laborer here cannot perform service upon the same terms with the laborer in other countries, when every article which he uses, everything which he wears, everything that enters into his consumption, except that which comes directly from God Himself without charge, like water, is taxed; and taxed for what? Taxed by the very necessities of your Government; taxed for the purpose of paying the expenses of sustaining the Government, and of having a Government that exists and that is worth having; and it is because these interests are necessarily burdened and taxed that we are obliged to place impost duties on articles imported, so that they shall be incidentally protected.

It has been stated by gentlemen on this floor, in their desire that this bill shall be recommitted to the Committee on Finance, that there are errors and defects which should be corrected. I respectfully submit to the Senate that the Committee on Finance sat here during the whole Christmas recess, five or six hours per day, while other gentlemen were at home enjoying themselves during the holidays, and that the Senate and the country are indebted to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance for the fidelity with which the work has been done with regard to this bill. I am not here to quarrel with gentlemen who dispute the principles upon which the bill is based, who deny, as the Senator from Iowa does, the whole principle of protection to American industry. It is an honest conviction of his, and he has a right to enjoy that opinion, and express it in the Senate. I honor him for the boldness with which he does express it. I have just the same right to express my own; and I claim that the tariff bill before the Senate has been subjected to unjust charges, as being an exceedingly high protective tariff.

The Finance Committee of this body in almost every case, as has been stated by the chairman, with the exception of wools and woollens, reduced the rates which were agreed upon by the House; and be it remembered that at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means there is a gentleman celebrated all over the country for his knowledge of these subjects, and that the bill was worked up with a great deal of care and consideration. In my judgment some of the duties in that bill were too high, and I concurred with the Committee on Finance in their reduction. I believe this bill as it comes to the Senate from the Finance Committee is a better bill. Of course there are some faults, some errors, some omissions; and after the Senate shall have done with it it will not be a perfect bill. But I assert that as it came from the committee it was a good bill; it was one which the country would have approved in its general features; I would have been content with it. Nevertheless, there are some points in which I differed from the committee; some in which they differed from me, and in regard to which I surrendered my judgment; and there are a few others where I could not do so, and this stone question is one of them.

Mr. President, as I had the floor for the purpose of giving the reasons why, after a careful examination of this subject, I was induced to believe that this interest requires the protection of four dollars a ton, I thought I would take the opportunity to express these views upon the bill itself.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not desire to interrupt the Senator from New Jersey in the remarks he made, or else I should have stated what I have stated on several occasions: that he is entirely misinformed as to my views on the subject of tariffs. I have never declared that I was a free trader or that I was opposed to the protection of American industry; on the contrary, I have always avowed that I was in favor of a revenue tariff, with incidental protection to such branches of American industry as needed the fostering care of the Government; and the question is between the Senator from New Jersey and myself as to what these branches of industry are, and how these duties can be properly laid. I think they are not properly laid in this bill; and the fact that it required the Committee on Finance the whole time during the recess to adjust what they thought was a proper schedule of rates of duties to be imposed by the bill is no evidence that we should take it without thorough investigation and discussion, or that we ought to take it at all; certainly not if our judgments are convinced that they have not hit upon the right scheme.

I do not know but that this constant iteration and reiteration of the charge of free-trader against me will finally lead me to believe myself that I am actually one, but I did not come here with that conviction on my own mind, and up to this time I have never avowed myself to be such.

Mr. CRAGIN. Some three or four years ago, when I was acting as an agent of the Treasury Department, I had occasion to visit the quarries in Connecticut, at Portland, for the purpose of making investigations there as to the charge of fraud against the importers of Nova Scotia stone, and while there I became fully satisfied and convinced that the quarry there could not prosper under the reciprocity treaty which then existed. The works were languishing and almost absolutely doing nothing.

All the questions that have been presented here in connection with this subject were there discussed and investigated. Very few members of the Senate, perhaps, understand the magnitude of these works. Some $1,700,000 are invested there, and from twelve to fifteen hundred men, in prosperous times, are employed upon these quarries, and the owners of the quarries own some hundred vessels that reach these quarries on the Connecticut river to transport their products. It appeared in that investigation that the stone in Nova Scotia was easier wrought and gotten out of the quarries much cheaper than this in Connecticut; and the labor there being cheaper they were of course unable to undersell in our markets the producers of this stone in Connecticut. So far as other quarries are concerned, I am not personally acquainted with them. I rose merely to correct the impression that these quarries were prosperous under the reciprocity treaty. They certainly were not at the time that I visited them.

The question being put; there were, on a division—ayes 12, noes 10; no quorum voting.

Mr. HENDRICKS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Dixon, Edmunds, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Kirkwood, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Fessenden, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Patterson, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, and Williams—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cowan, Creswell, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Guthrie, Howard, Johnson, Lane, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ross, Saulsbury, and Stewart—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to strike out lines seven and eight of section seven, on page 25, and in lieu of them to insert:

On old metal scrap iron, four dollars per ton.
On old wrought scrap iron, eight dollars per ton.

I am satisfied that there is a misapprehension on the part of the Committee on Finance and its chairman in regard to this subject. The Senator from Maine, in his remarks the other day, said:

"Then the other iron manufacturers said this is not to be considered at all with reference to the price of pig iron; in reality the pig iron that is imported does not come in competition with any of our iron that we manufacture. The pig imported is the soft Scotch pig metal that is not to be found in this country, is not made in this country, it does not come into competition; but so far as we are concerned we would just as lief you should put the pig metal down to three dollars if you choose, but that was put up for the purpose of revenue and was kept up for that particular reason.

"Under these circumstances, with that object, it was thought best to put old scrap iron at what they said was enough, and that is three dollars per ton on both descriptions. They said another thing, that there are a great many rolling-mills established on the Atlantic border, in New York and Massachusetts and some in Maine—I believe one or perhaps two. They have to bring their iron to the mills and pay freight on it, whereas the manufacturers of iron in Pennsylvania and other places have their iron and their coal at their door. They came to the conclusion, and they said that was the foundation of the resolution of the Iron and Steel Association sent to us, that it was no more than fair that it should come in at the same rate, that it is sufficiently guarded by the proviso we put in. That old iron has to be remanufactured."

I think the chairman of the Committee on Finance would never have made that argument if he had really understood the workings of the proposition. I hold in my hand a letter addressed to the Senator from New Jersey by a gentleman largely interested in the manufacture of iron, which I will read:

OFFICE HUNTINGDON AND BROAD TOP MOUNTAIN RAILROAD COMPANY, PHILADELPHIA, January 28, 1867.

DEAR SIR: Excuse me for calling your attention to the low duty in the tariff bill now before the Senate on scrap iron, three dollars per ton on cast and wrought scrap. This will be disastrous to the manufacture of pig iron, in which this State and New Jersey have such a large interest. Cast scrap should not pay a less duty than six dollars per ton and wrought scrap from nine to twelve dollars. The rail mills are the great buyers of pig iron now, but under this bill they would import English scrap nearly entirely for their mills.

Hoping that you will see the necessity of protecting the great Pennsylvania interests, iron and coal, I remain
Yours truly,

L. T. WATSON, President.

Hon. A. G. CATTELL.

It is not true as was stated by the Senator from Maine, he is mistaken as to the fact, that the iron and coal are together even in Pennsylvania. The State of Pennsylvania takes about three hundred thousand tons of Lake Superior ore to mix with her inferior ore, and transports it by water some seven or eight hundred miles and afterward by land carriage, a very expensive carriage, from fifty to three hundred miles. This ore is mixed with the Pennsylvania ores and transported there a long distance at a very great expense. To-day the great demand for pig iron is for rolling. It costs the manufacturers a ton of scrap iron to take the ore and the coal from the mine: calling the material nothing it costs to-day sixty dollars a ton—every cent of which is labor—to make a ton of scrap iron. To make a ton of pig costs just about half as much. Pig iron has gone through one process; it has been put into the blast-furnace and gone through one process; but before it is fit for rolling it has to be puddled and go through another process yet more expensive than manufacturing it into pig. After this second process, which actually costs on an average throughout the United States to-day sixty dollars per ton in labor, counting the material nothing, you propose to give a protection of three dollars or five per cent.—five per cent. on scrap.

There is another way of manufacturing this iron, and that is by what is called blooming it. That has to be done with charcoal, which is a very expensive fuel; and while it makes the best iron, it goes through but one single process and comes out in the form of blooms, and then is ready for the rollers; and that costs even more than this other double measure which costs sixty dollars. The wrought iron, the Senator says, has to go through a process of manufacture, and that he thinks is a sufficient protection. Now, what is that process of manufacture through which wrought scrap iron has to go? They take little boxes holding what is called a bloom, heat an oven to the requisite degree, shove these boxes of bloom into that oven until they have reached not a white heat but a welding heat; they are then brought out and put under the trip-hammer, and are ready for the rolling-mill. In other words, I can take wrought scrap, and in one half hour, and without scarcely any expense, prepare it for the rollers, for they are not obliged even to use fuel in this preparation where the blast-furnace is in operation, for they use the heated gas from the blast-furnace to heat the oven, and the labor is scarcely anything. In other words, this wrought iron is just prepared for the rolling-mills with no expense save the heating of the iron to the requisite extent to enable it to pass through the rollers. It, in point of fact, is worth twenty-eight dollars a ton for rolling-mill purposes more than pig metal, for you have to put the pig metal through the puddling process, which costs twenty-eight dollars a ton to put it in the same shape and form which the wrought scrap is in when it is landed upon your shores.

I do not think it possible that the Committee on Finance could have understood the operation of their amendment on this point, or they never would have offered it. The Senator from Maine says that this is a very small item, that only 14,000 tons were imported last year. The reason why only 14,000 tons were imported last year was because we had a duty that kept it out. It was profitable to import 14,000 tons last year at a duty of eight dollars a ton; but if you reduce it to three dollars the result will be to make this country the grand receptacle of all the scrap iron in the world. Now, sir, look at the figures and see whether this is an insignificant matter.

There are in the world to-day 100,000 miles of railroad, of which 36,000 miles are in the United States and 64,000 miles in the rest of the world. These railroads are laid, on an average, with rails weighing fifty-six pounds to the yard, and use 49,000 tons net to the mile. The 64,000 miles of railroad abroad have consumed 3,136,000 tons or 6,272,000,000 pounds of iron. This has to be rerolled on an average once in ten years; consequently there is one tenth of that amount of scrap iron let loose upon some country every year. That would give the amount of railroad scrap alone at 313,600 tons per annum or 6,272,000 pounds, which you propose to admit at a duty of three dollars a ton, and which costs to-day to put it in the form of scrap iron sixty dollars a ton in the United States.

Sir, this is free trade in the broadest sense; and it is worse than that. I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that if you admit this vast amount of scrap iron at a low duty you will receive no duties on iron except what you receive on the scrap; nothing but scrap will be imported. This is gotten up by the rolling-mills for their special benefit, and the Committee on Finance have been fooled—I beg leave to be respectful; I will not use so strong a word; I will say deceived by these rolling-mill men. It is the most judicious and ingenious thing I have ever seen in my life for the interests of the rolling-mills. I have been told that there was a combination formed of some six or eight, or perhaps more, rolling-mills on the Atlantic coast to have free trade so far as their interests were concerned; and the Senators from Massachusetts during the last week have been pressing you to carry out the views of this combination in regard to coal. They propose to bring coal into Massachusetts from the British Provinces at a nominal duty. That has been voted down, and I hope this scrap part of the committee's bill will be too, for it is part of the same scheme. Both propositions together bring in foreign coal and foreign iron almost free; and for the benefit of whom? Of the rolling-mills, and to the sacrifice of your revenue and to the sacrifice of every other iron interest in the United States.

Look for a moment at this bill, for the Senator from Maine admits that the committee changed it at the request of the rolling-mills. They had agreed on eight dollars a ton, just what I propose to place it at, which is not enough; but at the request of these highly patriotic rolling-mill men they made the change. Now let us see what the effect of that change is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I beg leave to say to the Senator with entire respect that if he will keep within the limits of what I did say I shall be obliged to him. I did not say anything about its being changed at the request of the rolling-mill men.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Iron and Steel Association?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, I said that.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not wish to misrepresent the Senator. They are the rolling-mill men. Now, sir, see the disinterested patriotism of this Iron and Steel Manufacturer's Association. They propose to let in at three dollars three hundred thousand tons of scrap iron from railroads alone annually, which it would cost sixty dollars a ton in labor alone to manufacture here. You are to let in iron for the rolling-mills at three dollars a ton, ready to go through the roller with one heat. But what do these patriotic individuals propose? I read from the bill:

On iron in pigs, nine dollars per ton.

They are going certainly to protect the manufacturers of pig. Why? Because scrap is worth twice as much as pig to them; and is ready for use. Oh, yes, they will protect pig, most assuredly; but they let in scrap at three dollars per ton, and it costs them twenty-eight dollars a ton to turn pig into scrap. Will you not get a large amount of duties from pig under that? Oh, they were very patriotic; they were really anxious that the manufacturers of pig iron should be protected!

On all iron in slabs, blooms, loops, or other forms less finished than bars, and more advanced than pig iron, except castings, one and one fourth cents per pound.

Mark you, their material comes in at three dollars a ton ready for this operation, and they fix this duty at the exact cost of putting it through their rolling-mills. They are going to have free trade so far as they are concerned, and yet they are going to have just exactly duty enough to pay them for rolling. That is what they have done. They have charged a duty which exactly covers the cost of rolling, and they get their material free. Where are your duties to come from? They have gone through this whole list in the same way. They put twenty-five dollars per ton upon this rough material, which costs them about twenty dollars per ton to run through their mills. Then—

On iron bars for railroads and inclined planes made to pattern, ready to lay down, seventy cents per hundred pounds.

Or fourteen dollars per ton. That you see gives them a protection of just eleven dollars per ton over any foreign iron-roller. You bring in the material ready for the heat at three dollars, and then you give them a protection of eleven dollars per ton, which more than pays the difference in the cost of labor between Great Britain and the United States. Again:

On iron bars rolled or hammered, comprising flat bars not less than one and a half nor more than four inches wide, nor less than half an inch nor more than two inches thick, one and one fourth cent per pound.

Or twenty-five dollars a ton. There again you give them the exact expense of rolling precisely. That is just what it cost. Is not this very patriotic? Bring the material at a nominal duty, and break down every forge in the United States while you build up your rolling-mills! Certainly that will be the result, and you will stop our mines in Michigan, that yield richer than any other in the world. We cannot send a pound of ore to Ohio if this bill passes, because they will use old scrap. You stop the forges throughout the State of Pennsylvania, because you admit the highest grade of iron at three dollars per ton duty, ready for the rollers. But again:

On all sizes of flats, rolled or hammered, less than three eighths of an inch in thickness, and not thinner than No. 8 wire gauge, one and three fourths cent per pound.

Or thirty-five dollars a ton. Here they have carried out the same rule. They have gauged this bill from end to end, and given the rolling-mills protection to the amount of the whole cost of this, as the Senator from Maine calls it, remanufacture. I need not go through all the items to show that this is carried out throughout, but here is another:

On all sizes of oval, half oval, and half round iron, two and one fourth cents per pound.

Or forty-five dollars a ton. They apply here the same rule as they do in regard to articles more cheaply rolled. This whole list, from end to end, is simply for the benefit of the rollers, and to exclude all foreign rolled iron.

Now, Mr. President I have been trying for the last two days to ascertain the amount of duties received from iron imported into the United States during the past year, but I cannot ascertain it precisely. I then desired to approximate the amount, and I asked the commissioner if ten million dollars would be about it. He said that he thought not; that would be within bounds. I think the sum actually received would reach fifteen million dollars: but assume for the sake of the argument that we receive ten million dollars as duty upon iron and the manufactures of iron last year: how much will you receive under this tariff? Six months from this day you will not receive one fourth what you receive now. You are cutting off for this present year, 1867, at least five million dollars from your receipts. You will receive all the railroad scrap iron of the world. This will be the great entrepôt for scrap; we shall be a nation scrapped to death! If we get three hundred thousand tons of scrap it will give us a duty of nine hundred thousand dollars, and you sacrifice the ten millions you now receive, and in whose interest? Will you get iron cheaper then? Not at all; but this is entirely in the interests of the rolling-mills.

Mr. President, if free trade is the rule, if that is what you are after, say so; but do not permit this great iron interest, scattered all over the United States, to be sacrificed for the benefit of some ten or twelve rolling-mills. Perhaps I am mistaken in the number of rolling-mills, but they are certainly very few in comparison with the great number of forges and manufactories of iron all over the United States.

Again, after they have got through with these rolling-mills, they do not stop, but they carry it out in regard to the finer manufactures of iron. For instance:

On railway frogs, frog points, side bars, and finger bars of iron, three cents per pound.

Or sixty dollars a ton, while they admit the material from which these are manufactured at three dollars per ton. These very articles are manufactured from the scrap, admitted at three dollars per ton, and yet the bill gives a protection of sixty dollars a ton to the manufacturer. Then on screws the duty is eight cents a pound, or $160 a ton.

Mr. GRIMES. That has been raised.

Mr. CHANDLER. How much?

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know, but I know that it has been raised.

Mr. CHANDLER. Again:

On horse-shoe nails, five cents per pound.

So you see that the effect of this bill will be to utterly destroy the manufacture of iron from the ore. It will benefit the Iron and Steel Association who are engaged in rolling-mills. The rolling-mill interest will be benefited, and all other interests connected with iron in the United States will be sacrificed.

I cannot believe that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance understood the working of this thing. I do not believe he would have brought in such a proposition if he had understood it. This whole section of the bill is gotten up in the interest, and solely in the interest, of the rolling-mills of the United States. It is gotten up to destroy your revenue from all the products of iron. I know the Senator from Maine did not introduce it for any such purpose; but that will be the immediate effect of it.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to fix the duty on cast scrap iron at four dollars a ton, and on wrought scrap at eight dollars. The duties ought to be eight and twelve dollars, as I proposed the other day; but fearing that I may not be able to get that adequate protection for this great interest of the country I have proposed the smallest amount that will be any protection at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not pretend, sir, to compete with the honorable Senator from Michigan in the knowledge of this or any other subject, however much I may have considered it; and certainly, so far as I am individually concerned, I have no knowledge on this particular subject except what I derive from the statements of other people on whom I have relied. If this duty is wrong, if it will have the effect the honorable Senator supposes, if he is right, I hope the Senate will adopt his amendment, because I have no other motive or wish than to place the matter on a right foundation.

I will merely repeat briefly what I said before on this subject and then leave it, because I cannot undertake to quarrel with gentlemen's statements continually. The Senate must judge of them. The bill came from the House with a duty of five dollars a ton on scrap iron. In that body, as is perfectly well known, there are several gentlemen interested in the manufacture of iron, and one of the principal ones is upon the Committee of Ways and Means; I allude to the honorable member from Pittsburg, who is perfectly acquainted with the whole subject, and has been engaged in the business for many years. The bill came to us, as I have said, with a duty of five dollars a ton on both descriptions of scrap iron. When we were considering that subject we had before us quite a numerous delegation from the city of Pittsburg. They were men who wanted an increase of duties, and they stated that upon old metal three dollars was ample; that there was no competition in that matter which would hurt anybody; and they were perfectly satisfied with three dollars instead of five; but they thought the wrought iron ought to be put up higher. We took into consideration their arguments and agreed to oblige them in two particulars. They demanded, in the first place, that we should raise the duty upon bar, hammered, and rolled iron; and in order to raise that duty they demanded a different classification, making five divisions instead of three; and that new classification, when examined, as we are assured—and I take it there is no dispute about the fact—carries up the duties nearly half a cent a pound from the rates proposed by the commissioner.

They demanded, also, this increase upon wrought scrap iron. We came to the conclusion to accommodate them in the main thing, and that was the additional protection which they demanded upon their own manufacture, and we gave them precisely what they asked, and put it in their own words—all the protection they needed. We came to the conclusion also, on their statement, not going quite so high as they asked, but putting the duty at what it stands in the present tariff, to put eight dollars a ton on wrought scrap iron, leaving three dollars, which they said was all they asked, on the old metal cast iron. The Senator now says it is necessary to have four dollars on that. Therein he differs from the manufacturers, who say that three dollars is enough.

Mr. CHANDLER. What duty does this old cast metal pay now? Does it not pay eight dollars a ton?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not remember whether it does or not. The Senator can see for himself by turning to the book. What it pays now is not the question. The question is what it ought to pay. The manufacturers said there ought to be a distinction between the two, and that the old metal was sufficiently protected at three dollars a ton, but they demanded considerably more on the wrought iron scrap.

I think we were very liberal to the manufacturers of iron. We increased the duties largely by changing the classification, and we increased them as they demanded, though not quite to the extent they demanded, in putting wrought scrap iron at eight dollars a ton. We found out afterward, however, when we came to examine the matter, that they had coupled with it a proviso which, from its description of the article, as I said the other day, would absolutely exclude the wrought iron from the country, and thus destroy not only all the advantage which might be got from its remanufacture, but all the advantage derived by its being picked up in South America and elsewhere and brought here in our vessels. That we learned before we made the report, and consequently we corrected it. I believe some of them laughed in their sleeves at the idea that they had imposed on the committee in that way. It stood, therefore, as we arranged it, at three dollars a ton on old metal, as they asked, and at eight dollars a ton on old wrought iron, as the Senator now asks. Subsequently we received a communication from the Iron and Steel Association, and we supposed that that association included a considerable number of men engaged in all branches of the iron business. By the vote they passed they expressed a desire to have all scrap iron placed at three dollars a ton. It was not known to us whether the men who passed that vote belonged to this or that particular branch of the business; we knew that they were the Iron and Steel Association. In my simplicity I supposed they knew what their own interest demanded; I did not assume to know more than they did on such a subject, nor did the other members of the committee, and accordingly we put it all at three dollars a ton, as they recommended. That is the history of it.

Now, the Senator says that that is in the interest of the rolling-mills. The reason why it was done is stated to me by a gentleman who is present, to whom I have referred before, who knows the facts, and I have never known him to be mistaken in any fact stated as of his own knowledge. He has drawn up a statement of the reasons for this action. Of the correctness of these reasons, how far they should weigh, the Senate will judge; each of the Senators can judge as well as I can, and most of them a great deal better. He says:

"The Iron and Steel Association was attended by a large delegation from Pittsburgh, who are manufacturers of bar iron, by the agent of the Cambria Company at Johnstown, Pennsylvania, the Phoenix Iron Company at Phoenixville, Pennsylvania, the Scranton Iron Company at Scranton, Pennsylvania, the Trenton Iron Company, who are large producers of pig iron, and a large number of flat and bar iron men all through Pennsylvania; and the resolution putting scrap iron at three dollars per ton was a concession to the rail-mills as they get an advance in duty."

There is no advance whatever in the duty on railroad iron, and therefore the rail-makers get no additional benefit from this bill—

"and the other manufacturers of bar and flat iron get an average of $7.50 per ton. In June old rolls were worth in New York forty-three dollars per ton. The price was run up by the bar and flat mills, so that in October old rails were worth fifty-two dollars per ton. The consequence was that the railroads reaching the sea-board were selling their old rails at fifty to fifty-two dollars per ton, and buying English rails, that were only costing them seventy dollars, or a difference of only twenty dollars per ton between new rails and old rails, when these old rails could not be rolled or manufactured into new rails on the sea-board for less than forty dollars a ton, making a saving to the railroads that sold their old rails and imported new English rails of twenty dollars a ton.

"Last year there were imported sixty-four thousand tons of new English rails, and if the importation should continue as it has done the last three months there will be over one hundred thousand tons per year. The increase of duty to the bar and flat mills will enable them to pay so high a price for old rails that the consequence will be that the roads on the sea-board will not get their old iron rolled, but will sell that and import new English rails. It was stated in the convention that this country had not furnaces enough to manufacture pig iron for the rolling mills. Last year there was only imported thirteen thousand tons of scrap iron against between three and four hundred thousand tons of new iron."

There is the difference between the importations. Senators, therefore, can judge of the danger there would be of destroying the business of manufacturing pigs. Now, sir, I feel not a particle of interest in this matter. I have no doubt the statements I have just read are true. What influence they should have on the minds of Senators it is for each Senator to say. But it is manifest how the thing was done by the Iron and Steel Association. They advised us by their vote, and we supposed that in doing what they asked we were doing what was proper and wise.

This is all I have to say on the subject. If the Senate chooses to put the old metal at one dollar a ton higher than all agree was perfectly sufficient to answer the purpose, and to put up the wrought scrap to eight dollars a ton, on the statement of the Senator from Michigan, so be it. I do not feel a vast deal of interest in the question now, for I am fatigued with meeting these things day after day. These broad statements are reiterated so often, and I have to meet them so frequently, that I begin to feel that I may just as well give up the whole concern and let it slide.

Mr. CHANDLER. The letter which the Senator read only corroborates what I said, that this whole thing was gotten up in the interest of the rollers of iron. All the establishments named in the letter are, I believe, without exception, rolling establishments. Now, if manufactured iron is to come into this country against the interests of our mines, our forges, our blast-furnaces, I desire that it shall come in paying the highest rate of duty.

It costs, as I said before, sixty dollars a ton to put ore into the form of scrap. I would just as soon you should bring in a ton of new railroad bars as a ton of old. The expense of rerolling is very small. If the old railroad iron is sold instead of being rerolled, what is it sold for? It is sold to manufacture into scrap and bar iron instead of rails; sold because your duty on railroad bars is less than your duty on bar iron. It is sold because the rollers of bar iron can afford to pay a higher price than the excess of duty on rails. That is all there is to that.

If you are to bring in manufactured iron from abroad, then by all means encourage the introduction of that which pays the highest duty for the benefit of the country. If you are going to introduce three hundred thousand tons of manufactured iron, I would rather have it of that kind which pays fifty-five dollars a ton than that which pays three dollars, for the interest of the Treasury. This wrought scrap iron is perfect, all but one process, to wit, heating and putting through the rolling-mill. Now, sir, do not defraud your Treasury by encouraging the introduction of this class of iron that pays little or no duty, to the detriment of other interests that pay enormous amounts into the Treasury in the shape of internal revenue taxes. The duty is too low. The duty ought to have been, as this gentleman from Pennsylvania, whose letter I read, says, six and twelve dollars. It ought to have been six on pig and twelve on wrought, and that would have been no more than a fair protection. The Senator has been misinformed as to this article of cast scrap. This cast scrap is of exactly the same value as pig. There is no difference whatever in the value. It is simply thrown into the furnace and melted in the same way that pig is, and has to go through the same process. There is no difference. You should have the same duty on scrap that you have on pig. But, sir, I have placed it very low indeed, at what every other than the rolling-mill men will say is too low, to wit, four and eight dollars. I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Frelighuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Lane, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Yates—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Edmunds, Fessenden, Harris, Kirkwood, Morgan, Morrill, Patterson, Poland, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Williams, and Wilson—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Davis, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Guthrie, Johnson, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomerooy, Riddle, Ross, and Trumbull—19.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIXON. On page 86, section seven, after line two hundred and eighty two, I move to insert the following:

On case-hardened fire-irons, known in the trade as polished steel fire-iron sets, in sets of three pieces, composing shovel, tongs, and poker, forty cents per set; tongs imported separately, twenty cents per pair; shovels imported separately, ten cents each; pokers imported separately, ten cents each, and, in addition thereto, forty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Without taking up the time of the Senate I will state that I have papers here showing that without this additional protection this business cannot be carried on. If this amendment shall be adopted, I propose afterward to move in line two hundred and seventy-seven to insert before the words "fire-tongs and shovels," the words "common, unpolished," as this amendment applies to the highly finished article.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I cannot contradict the statement made by the Senator, for I do not know anything about it. It is a new matter which is now brought up. It has not been before the committee at all; but as the Senate seem to be going on and putting on everything that everybody asks for, I do not know but that this may just as well go on as a thousand other things, to suit customers all around.

Mr. DIXON. I have not asked for much, and I should not have asked for this if I did not believe it on examination absolutely necessary to save this branch of manufactures. I have a statement here which shows that at the present rate these articles can be furnished in New York at so large a decrease from the cost of the American articles that the business cannot be carried on in this country without some additional protection. It will be observed that not much is asked. The forty-five per cent. ad valorem is in the bill already. What I propose is, to impose on a fire-set of a highly finished character, costing perhaps to the purchaser ten dollars a set, a duty of forty cents a set. Some of them come as high as ten dollars, some fifteen dollars, and some as high as twenty dollars, and forty cents is all that is asked for. It is not too much.

I will state once more to the Senate that if this amendment shall be adopted, I propose, so that this additional duty shall not apply to the common article in common use, to insert in the two hundred and seventy-seventh line, before the words "fire-tongs and shovels," the words "common, unpolished."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state that the commissioner has examined this proposition, and his opinion is that it is not objectionable. I cannot tell myself. I know nothing about it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Inasmuch as this is a proposition that nobody seems to understand, and this is an interest that it seems necessary should be protected, and nobody understands it except the honorable Senator who proposes it, and inasmuch as other interests of course will have to follow, and as the committee did not have this subject before them, and it is necessary to protect everybody's interests, I apprehend this proposition ought to be adopted. We shall then begin to get something in the bill that nobody understands. Heretofore, in regard to the amendments generally, I believe somebody supposed he understood them. Now we have arrived at that stage in the proceedings when amendments that are not understood must necessarily be adopted. In the course of a day or two we shall have an admirable bill, I apprehend, taking together that which everybody understands, that which a portion of the Senate understands, and that which nobody understands.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected—aye one, noes not counted.

Mr. SUMNER. I now move, Mr. President, to make all books printed prior to the year 1840 free; in other words, to enter them on the free list. This is a motion which at an earlier day I have already made, but I desire to try the sense of the Senate again upon it. If the Senate sees fit to vote it down, it can; but I deem it my duty to present the proposition again. I do not wish to have this bill needlessly odious. I move, therefore, to insert on page 99, section eighteen, these words, to come in between lines thirty and thirty-one: "Books printed prior to the year 1840."

Now a tax on books printed prior to 1840 must have one of two objects, protection or revenue.

Mr. WADE. Or both.

Mr. SUMNER. Or, as the Senator says, both. Very well. As for protection there is nothing of it, for there is no American product of the press which can come into competition with a book printed here to 1840. Therefore, the whole question of protection is eliminated. Then it is for revenue. But the revenue on those books is not large; it is trivial; it is not enough to justify this exercise of your power.

But what is accomplished by the provision? You do exclude books which you ought to welcome. You impose what I shall insist upon calling a tax on knowledge, and you give a bad name to the legislation of your country. I believe there is no other country in the world where imported books are subject to any taxation, unless it be merely nominal. It is for a Republic, founded on knowledge, to set the example of this unprecedented tax on knowledge.

I wish I could communicate to Senators something of my own conviction on this question. I approach it with no other object than the welfare of my country. I do wish to do what I can on this question in order to introduce these books as free of duty as possible. Since the discussion the other day I have received a letter from a gentleman engaged in literary pursuits, from which I will read a brief extract. He says as follows:

"The present tariff is to a great degree prohibitory; especially so as regards books printed before the close of the reign of King Charles I. Such books are extremely scarce, and many of them are enormously dear without the added cruel penalty of twenty-five per cent. for the privilege of bringing them into our country. I have been for the past year busily engaged on a new edition of the works of an Elizabethan writer, and it seems peculiarly hard that my own country should throw in my way a stumbling-block in the shape of a severe fine on the importation of my working materials. I know that I need not remind you, who are so well versed in curious and rare old books, that original editions of the works of the early English writers can be obtained by scholars only by their purchase by themselves or by loan through the courtesy of brother scholars or collectors, the public libraries of our country being lamentably bare of them.

"I have just returned from Europe. There I found that every facility was extended to the scholar. Where duties were levied on books they were of so light a character—being chiefly a small tax per pound—as to amount to scarcely anything. Our country boasts of an enlightened civilization, but at the same time taxes knowledge as if it was a crime that should be suppressed or a luxury that should be indulged in only by the rich. It seems very strange to me that even the most despotic countries in Europe favor the scholar more than does our liberty-loving Republic."

I do not know, sir, that I can add anything to this compact statement of the question. I will therefore content myself by asking a vote.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. The Senate has settled this question once by a vote of two to one.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to amend the twenty-third section of the bill, in one or two particulars. It is the confiscation section, and I suppose there is no interest involved in it. On page 108, section twenty-three, line three, after the word "may," I move to insert, "when undervalued, as herein stated," and in lines seventeen, eighteen, nineteen, I move to strike out the words:

And to ascertain such undervaluation he shall cause full and detailed inventory and valuation to be made, a copy whereof shall be delivered to the said consignee.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

And to ascertain such undervaluation the collector shall, at the request of the consignee, cause a full and detailed inventory and revaluation to be made by such officers or experts as the Secretary of the Treasury may by general rules and regulations prescribe.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to amend the bill on page 22, section six, line twenty-two, by striking out all of the paragraph after the word "specified," and inserting:

When valued at thirty cents per square yard or less four cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over thirty cents per square yard, six cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, forty per cent. ad valorem.

So that the clause will read:

On all brown or bleached linens, ducks, canvas padings, cot bottoms, burlaps, drills, coatings, brown Hollands, blay linens, Spanish linens, diaper, damasks, crash, huckabacks, haddockchiefs, lawns, or other manufactures of flax, hemp, or jute, or of which flax, hemp, or jute, is the component material of chief value, not herein otherwise specified, when valued at thirty cents per square yard or less, four cents per square yard, and in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over thirty cents per square yard, six cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, forty per cent. ad valorem.

This amendment is offered with a view to furnish greater protection to the coarser kind of linen manufactures. Its effect will be to protect not only agricultural productions, the production of flax, but also the manufacture of flax. By the bill as passed by the House of Representatives a specific duty of six cents per square yard on the articles mentioned in this paragraph was imposed. That was reported by the Senate committee at three cents per square yard, and by some means or other, I do not know how—I did not observe the manner in which it was done—this specific duty of three cents per square yard has been stricken out, so as only to leave a duty, I believe, of thirty-five per cent. ad valorem, as it has been altered, upon these articles. It is entirely too low as compared with other manufactures of flax; so low that those who are engaged in this kind of business assure me that if the bill is allowed to pass in the form in which it is now presented they will be obliged, for their own safety and protection, to leave this kind of business and to go into the manufacture of the finer article of linen. The effect will be to injure not only the manufacturing business, but also the agricultural production. If the amendment which I propose shall be adopted, it will have the effect to encourage agriculture, the raising of flax, as well as the manufacture of this coarser article. I am informed that the American flax can only be manufactured into the articles which are included in this amendment. I hope, therefore, that this amendment may be adopted. Instead of the six cents duty passed by the House of Representatives, it proposes four cents upon the cheaper article and six cents upon the more valuable article.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I believe we had this question up the other day and settled it by a very decided vote. I do not know but all the amendments that are offered have to come up several times in different shapes. I do not very clearly see my way through with the bill any time in this generation the way the Senate are going on. I understood from the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] that he proposed to offer an amendment which I thought I should not object to, but it seems that it has gone out of his hands into the hands of the honorable Senator from New York, and is not the same.

The House bill fixed a duty of thirty per cent. on crash. The Senator from New York is mistaken. It fixed a high rate of duty upon everything but crash, but fixed thirty per cent. on crash. Now, I understood the Senator from Rhode Island proposed to offer an amendment fixing upon crash a duty of thirty-five per cent. ad valorem, and on these other articles as suggested by the honorable Senator from New York. I stated the other day the reasons why I thought that upon these coarse articles there should not be this large duty that will operate so injuriously. It places a heavy duty on an article that is used by everybody, the coarse crash towels that are imported from Russia and are in everybody's hands. I thought the duty was fixed at about what it ought to be; that we ought not to put a duty upon it which will effectually exclude it, because that will be the result from its very low cost. The article that is manufactured in this country is not the same article. That is composed of clear linen, and the article manufactured is linen and cotton, a very inferior article which does not last so long, and is more expensive to the purchaser from the mere fact of its composition. I am opposed to the amendment as it stands, and I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. HARRIS. It seems to me, unless I am greatly misinformed in relation to this thing, that this amendment ought to receive favor in the Senate. The manufacture of flax in this country is in its infancy; there is but little of it; and if capitalists are willing to go into the manufacture of this article they ought to be encouraged as much as those who are engaged in the manufacture of cotton and woolen goods. Now, if I understand this question, they are not thus protected in this bill; and unless there can be an increased protection provided in some such manner as I have suggested in the amendment I have proposed this manufacture must go down. Here is a cheap article of linen goods manufactured from American flax, and the only thing that is manufactured from American flax. Now, it is proposed to reduce the duty upon that to a mere ad valorem which will not furnish adequate protection, and these gentlemen, some of them my own personal friends and acquaintances, engaged in this business, gentlemen of capital and intelligence, will be driven from this manufacture into the other kind of manufactures of linen where they are obliged to import their flax. It seems to me wise that this kind of manufacture should be encouraged, and it can only be encouraged by giving this specific duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If our growers will only attend to it, and water-rot it and raise it, they can make as good material out of American flax as any other flax. There is no superiority except in the way in which it is produced; and I do not think any very great harm will come of letting a great many of these very coarse articles be manufactured abroad, used as they are—

Mr. HARRIS. If that is the policy of the Committee on Finance of course you will vote down the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me tell the Senator the policy of the Committee on Finance is not, where a manufacture does not exist here at the present time but is just starting, to impose such duties on the foreign article as will charge everybody in the country, in the beginning and until they can get them established, with this enormous increased burden upon the article; but the policy is to place such a duty as will be sufficient encouragement to begin the manufacture, and take it gradually, if we are obliged to take it at all.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I suppose that there is really no interest that is so little understood as the one now under discussion, and none that has been so misrepresented—unintentionally I have no doubt, but nevertheless it is misrepresented. Here is this article of crash. The duty upon it as proposed by this amendment is four cents per square yard. The price of this article of crash cannot be in gold more than twelve cents per square yard when it is imported. The four cents per square yard would amount to just this, and no more: it takes to make a square yard about two lengths and a half; or, if I can make myself better understood, crash is about fifteen inches in width. It is made in Prussia, it is made in England, in France, in Germany, in Ireland; it is made everywhere. It is the principal product of the flax manufacturers in the United States. The suggestion that it is not made here and is not a perfect product of manufacture is in no wise correct. Then, if upon this four cents per square yard you calculate it, all that you get for the running yard, as proposed by the Senator from New York, is the number of times that two and a half will go into four. I will let any Senator reckon that up. It would be about one and one half cents on a running yard; that is in addition to the thirty-five per cent. ad valorem as suggested in the bill.

Now, the addition which has been made of five per cent. to the thirty per cent. that the Committee on Finance reported has decreased the protection upon this article two cents per yard; because five per cent. upon the gold cost abroad would not be more than one cent. For that one cent that they increase upon these coarse articles they take off three; and that is the exact condition of it as it now stands.

In the article of burlaps, for instance, of which I spoke the other day, under the bill as reported by the committee you get two and eight tenths cents by this thirty-five per cent. on the gold valuation as it would be at the port of shipping. The duty of fifteen dollars a ton takes off that eight tenths, so that it allows but two cents for a square yard. This article does not come in as a square yard; it is about thirty or thirty-two or thirty-three inches; so that really on this article of burlaps the protection is not more than one and one half cent per running yard, or about the same as that on crash. Although the article is not taxed five per cent. on the manufacture, yet by the five per cent. otherwise that this article indirectly pays the Government will take off every cent of the protection that you give; so that as the bill now stands there is not one single cent of protection given to any of the coarser articles now manufactured in this country. I challenge contradiction here or elsewhere. I assert that neither upon crash nor upon burlaps nor upon any of these coarser articles is there one single mill of protection. You offset everything.

Mr. JOHNSON. How much is made?

Mr. SPRAGUE. There is a vast quantity of it. There are $10,000,000 probably invested in the business in this country. The consequence is that there is not to-day, and has not been for the past six months, a single mill that can start one step in this business. As I said the other day, it costs about three times as much as it does to make common cotton cloth. A weaver will attend five of those looms, here he can attend to but one. A cotton spinner will attend to five spindles, where a person can attend to but one in this business. You can bleach a yard of coarse cloth for half a cent a yard, and it costs three cents to bleach this. The result is that there cannot be one yard produced in this country after the passage of this bill in its present shape. The consequence of that will be that the consumption of flax, heretofore entering into this product—and the report of Mr. Wells shows that after this manufacture had gone into operation, it increased the price of your hemp and flax one hundred per cent.—will go back to its original condition. There is not an article in this bill but what has an advantage of twenty-five per cent. over the article now in question.

Sir, I have no particular interest in this thing. I simply desire to establish and perfect this branch of industry. It has a standing now and I am influenced only upon that consideration of the subject. I do not want these men to make money now when the country is suffering and when laborers are turned out of employment; but I do not want to see legislation here that is favorable to the production of these goods on the other side of the water.

The other day two Senators took occasion to speak of me as one interested in the manufacturing interests of this country. Well, sir, that is a fact. I am interested in this linen manufacture. When our ports were opened for the free admission of the machinery employed in the manufacture of this article I availed myself of the occasion to import that machinery. I have not been able, nor shall I be able, to make a single yard of the articles that are embraced in this clause. I did not do it to make money; I did it to start this branch of industry, as my record shows. I am a manufacturer of cottons it is true; and I am a manufacturer of woollens, of steam engines, of locomotives, everything almost embraced in this bill. I did not do it to make money; I let everybody into every interest I am connected with. If they show that there is a new principle to be developed, a saving of labor, something that will cheapen commodities, everybody has always found my interest and my willingness there. I challenge contradiction. I challenge anybody to show to the contrary.

Why, sir, I am an importer. I know the operations of the importing interest. There are but few men in this country who have as large an importing interest as I have. There are but few men in this country that have as large a general distribution of goods, both foreign and domestic. I am connected with the bank interests, too; I have been connected with them for the last fifteen or twenty years. I am connected with the insurance business also. Everything known in this bill, I am more or less directly connected with. I presume that I pay more than any dozen people in this country upon the articles enumerated in this bill coming from abroad which are introduced into the manufacture of our American products. I go abroad, I go into all the cities, and if I find there an improved article I endeavor with all the wits and means I have to bring it back into this country in order to develop it here. If there is something to grow or something to manufacture, or anything of that kind, I am interested simply to have it established here.

If gentlemen say that I am a cotton manufacturer, they may just as well say that I am a woolen manufacturer, a linen manufacturer, and a manufacturer of steam-engines. I can make the best locomotive engine in the world. I challenge anybody to compete with it. I can make the best piece of cotton cloth, and the best and cheapest calico in the world. There is no doubt about it.

But, sir, I do not like to be charged with having my mind run simply in one idea. I do not like, when I advocate an interest here, to have it intimated or thought that it is because it is my interest, because I am interested in it. Sir, the interest of this whole country is my interest. I would rather to-day sink beneath this floor than advocate any interest here because it was mine or that I was to make money out of it. I should feel that I was underserving the position I occupy if I were to do so.

It may seem strange to Senators, but in all my life I have never asked a man to vote for me or for any proposition except in the few cases of Senators that I have called upon in reference to this linen manufacture. Contrary to the general acceptance of the fact, as regards my position politically and otherwise, I never, directly or indirectly, asked the first man from the time I came into political office until the present time, or upon any measure, legislatively or otherwise, for the support of anything until this flax interest came up. I have been abroad and seen what an immense interest this flax interest was. I have seen forty and fifty and sixty yards of this article which would only weigh a pound. I have gone down to the very gradations of that, and I have seen hundreds of thousands of people getting their livelihood from this branch of business. I have seen immigrants coming into this country in vast crowds who have heretofore been employed in that business. Is it not natural that I should feel an inclination to have it established in my own country that they might be employed here?

Now, Mr. President, the facts are that this interest has never had any advocate. They have never felt strong and powerful. They have never combined together except indirectly for the purpose of showing exactly how their interests stood in reference to other commodities. I endeavored to show the other day that it was the least protected. I did not know then but that it was somewhat protected; I did not know but what there was some breakwater against the importation of these articles from foreign products; but there is not one single mill—rather to the contrary—to offset, what? To offset the increased price of labor in this country. I trust this amendment will prevail.

Mr. FOWLER. I only wish to make a single remark on this subject. As a general rule I am opposed to the policy of protection. However, I am very willing to vote at the present time for the imposition of duties on most articles for the purposes of protection. I think there is a necessity for it under present circumstances and in the present condition of the country. But I do not intend to discuss the principle of protection at all. I should like very well to see this bill carried, however. I believe it is proper and necessary. So far as protection is required, I believe the infant manufactures are the ones that should receive the benefit of that protection. I have always understood that the idea was to afford them protection to enable them to stand until they could gain sufficient strength to manufacture without protection. I find that the friends of protection here assert a very different doctrine on the subject.

But, sir, I rose principally to protest against the discussion of the whole system of the protective tariff on every little interest that is proposed to be taxed for the sake of protection.

We do not want any such discussion. I think if Senators will confine themselves strictly to the questions that are before the Senate that we shall get through with this bill much sooner.

Sir, allow me to make one further remark. A stranger here would suppose that almost every Senator was engaged in some species of manufacture, and came here for the purpose of protecting his own self-interest and nothing else. I do not consider it in that light. I do not suppose Senators are governed or controlled by any such motives. If I thought they were, I should vote against every proposition that is offered here, and the whole bill itself.

I wish to protest also against the charges that are made against New England or against the West that they are acting upon selfish motives entirely. I do not see that Senators are acting exactly in that way; nor have I seen that this or that section of the country was influenced entirely by any such motives or any such considerations. I think it is time to put a stop to such allegations. I shall listen with a great deal of patience to gentlemen who are discussing these questions solely on their own merits; but I do hope that this kind of discussion to which I have alluded will cease.

Mr. HARRIS. I only desire to add one word. I offered this amendment, not at the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island, but in consequence of an interview which I had with two gentlemen engaged in the manufacture of the article which is involved in the amendment. These gentlemen I know personally. They are gentlemen of intelligence, honorable men, largely engaged in this business. They were satisfied with the bill as it passed the House, because it gave them the protection of a specific duty of six cents per square yard; and they were satisfied, or at least were willing to submit to the bill as reported by the Committee on Finance to the Senate, because it gave them a specific duty of three cents a square yard. Now, this duty of three cents a square yard, as I understand it, is stricken out, and I proposed only to make it four cents a square yard. It is a different proposition to be sure, and gives a little more protection than the bill of the Committee on Finance did, but not so much, only two thirds what was given by the House. The three cents a square yard is stricken out, and I propose to substitute only four cents per square yard for the cheaper article and six cents per square yard for the more expensive article. I am assured by these gentlemen, and I believe them as I would believe any Senator on this floor, that if they cannot have this protection they must abandon this kind of manufacture and go into a manufacture of a different kind of linen goods where they import their flax. The question is, whether we shall follow the suggestion of the Committee on Finance and import this cheaper article of linen manufacture, or whether we shall encourage our own citizens in entering into this infant manufacture.

Mr. STEWART. I only wish to make a single remark on this subject. I am in favor of this amendment, for this reason: this is a great flax-producing country, and those of us who are not very familiar with the details of manufacturing generally can readily see that there is very little of this flax used by the manufacturing establishments. They have been unable to succeed in their manufacturing, showing that they must have protection if they are to succeed. During the last summer I had occasion to visit Rhode Island, and I found the Senator from that State engaged in what he termed an experiment—not to make money out of it, however. He had got a large establishment for the purpose of making the experiment, to see if this could be manufactured in this country, to bring up the interest. He called my attention to the fact that this was a great flax-growing country, and the flax was not being used in this country at all. The fact that nobody to any great extent has succeeded in this department of manufacture, and that this country is producing a large amount of flax, and is capable of doing so, shows, if we are to act upon the protective principle at all, that this is an interest to be protected. If we did not grow flax in this country, but imported it, and there was no manifest propriety in entering upon this branch of industry, I would take no interest in it. But that it has not been protected is shown by the fact that it has not been profitable to manufacture it here, or it would have been done. It seems to me flax is an article of such general growth throughout the United States that we should make some use of it at home, and I am in favor of this amendment. From the statements I get from all quarters I am satisfied that it will be impossible for the manufacturers to succeed unless they can have protection to the extent proposed by the Senator from New York.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I refer the Senate to the statement made by the commissioner in his report, to which I referred the other day, showing that there is an abundant sale for all the flax that can be raised in this country at largely increased prices. However, I do not feel disposed to argue it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY. I offer the following amendment: on page 79, section eleven, line eighteen, after the word "pressed" insert "other than flint;" so that it will read:

On glass vials, jars, bottles, and other vessels of glass, plain, molded, and pressed, other than flint, not cut, engraved, &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose there is something else to come after that, and I should like to have the whole proposition offered at once.

Mr. WILLEY. I will ask the Clerk to read the next amendment which I shall offer, which has relation to this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) It will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear it, so that we can have the whole question before the Senate.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment, which was on page 80, section eleven, after line twenty-four, to insert:

On flint glassware, plain, molded, and pressed, not cut, engraved, or printed, fifty per cent. ad valorem.

And in line thirty-eight to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

On all articles of glass, cut, engraved, painted, colored, printed, stained, silvered, or gilded, not including plate-glass silvered, or looking-glass plates, fifty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. WILLEY. The first amendment which I offer proposes to take flint-glass out of the clause where it now is, with a view of making a distinct clause having reference to that class of manufactures; so that flint-glass shall not be included in the clause which reads, "(On glass vials, jars, bottles, and other vessels of glass, plain, molded, and pressed;)" but that there shall be a duty fixed in regard to flint-glass in a separate and distinct clause of fifty per cent. ad valorem.

I have felt embarrassed all the way through the discussion of this bill by the want of practical knowledge of these various articles of manufacture. What I have to state now I state from information derived from gentlemen who are engaged in the business, both in my State and in the State of Pennsylvania, who have done me the honor to confer with me on the subject, and upon whose statements I have entire reliance. I believe that they are honest men, and they have made to me statements apparently in perfect candor, statements which I required them to make upon the understanding that they were made candidly and truly. It will be perceived, then, that I desire to take flint-glass out of this clause and to make a distinct clause having reference to that article, namely, as has been read:

On flint glassware, plain, molded, and pressed, not cut, engraved, or plated, fifty per cent. ad valorem.

I am informed that the material out of which flint-glass is made costs perhaps two or three times as much as the materials out of which these other characters of glass are made, and that there is a difference in the amount of labor necessary to manufacture them, and that owing to these two facts, the increased cost of the material and the increased labor required in the manufacture, there ought to be a distinction between flint-glass and these other kinds of glass. The clause as it now stands, which would include flint-glass if not modified in the manner I propose, fixes a duty on glass vials, jars, bottles, &c., of less than eight ounces capacity each, of two and a half cents per pound; of eight and less than twenty ounces capacity each, three cents per pound; of twenty ounces capacity, and over each, four cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What would this ad valorem duty amount to per pound?

Mr. WILLEY. These gentlemen inform me that this duty of fifty per cent. ad valorem would amount to about five cents per pound. I have been so informed, and so believe from my information.

I simply desire to make this statement to the Senate, hoping that the Committee on Finance, and the chairman especially, may be better advised of what are really the facts in the case than I am. I desire to state again that I offer this amendment upon the statements that have been made to me by glass manufacturers, by gentlemen engaged in the business, who have assured me that the business of manufacturing flint-glass must go down unless they receive protection to the amount which I have indicated in the amendment.

While I am up, sir, I will make all the remarks I have to make in regard to the other amendment, in line thirty-eight of the same section, on page 80. I am told that the manufacturers of cut glass will not be able to sustain themselves under the clause in the bill as it now stands. They inform me that really they would be entitled, in order to derive anything like a fair protection upon this class of manufactures, to sixty per cent. ad valorem; but in conferring with them I have induced them to agree that I shall put it at the lowest possible sum which they could stand, and have offered the amendment to strike out forty and insert fifty. I understand that the principal part of the cut glass which comes to this country is made in Germany, where labor is exceedingly low, and that it is impossible to compete with German labor, which is so low, in the manufacture of this article without protection to the extent of at least forty per cent. ad valorem. It is unnecessary to mention that the ingredient entering into the value of cut glass consists in the labor, and that that fact brings American labor directly in competition with foreign labor; and the foreign labor in Germany, where this article is principally manufactured, as I understand, being so much cheaper than it is in this country, it becomes absolutely necessary, if we would sustain our own domestic industry, to have the protection asked by these gentlemen engaged in the manufacture of this article.

I have thus made, as briefly as I could, the statement in regard to this manufacture; and I hope that the protection they ask will meet with the concurrence of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is a matter that is an entire surprise to the Committee on Finance and a surprise to the commissioner. This subject was not brought before us for our consideration at all, and I am unable to say from any evidence that has been adduced to the committee whether the amendment is right or wrong. It strikes me, however, that it varies very largely from the duty on the other glass. The honorable Senator from West Virginia says that fifty per cent. ad valorem is about five cents per pound. On the other glass the duty varies, I think, from two and a half cents per pound up to four cents. It is divided into three classes:

On glass vials, jars, bottles, and other vessels of glass, &c., of less than eight ounces capacity each, two and a half cents per pound; of eight and less than twenty ounces capacity each, three cents per pound; of twenty ounces capacity and over each, four cents per pound.

Now, I understand the Senator to say that this proposition amounts to about five cents per pound on the whole, small as well as large, and he will see it is double the duty on the small articles from what it is on glass of the other descriptions. Therefore, sir, I cannot say, from any data in my possession from which I could form an opinion, whether the matter is right or wrong. I do not know, and I cannot know, for the subject has not been brought before me, and I am entirely unfamiliar with the manufacture of glass. I do not happen to be a practical man to understand that. I suggest to the honorable Senator whether he is not content to place it at forty per cent. ad valorem. I think that certainly is a larger percentage than any except the small, and as much as it is on the largest kind of glass. As the bill must go back to the House, I suppose if we should commit any error about this matter it will be reexamined there and set right. I do not feel disposed to make a strenuous opposition to the amendment when I confess myself so unacquainted with the facts in relation to it. Having had no evidence offered on the subject I cannot say what it is. The question is before the Senate. If they see fit, on the statement of the honorable Senator from West Virginia, to make this change they can do so. If he said he knew anything about it personally, of his own personal knowledge, I should take it for gospel, because he never says anything he does not believe and understand; but inasmuch as he relies upon interested parties he will excuse me if I do not attach quite so much value to it as I should to his own word, which would be entirely satisfactory if he really knew anything about it.

Mr. WILLEY. I stated very candidly to the Senate that I did not personally know anything about it. That is the truth; but I stated also at the same time that in conferring with these gentlemen interested in the manufacture, as I acknowledged, they assured me that this trade would not be able to maintain itself without additional protection to that provided for in the bill as it stood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the Senator that if he will put it at forty per cent. I will make no objection. That would be a large increase on the lower articles of the same description and come up fully to the highest, and probably be more.

Mr. WILLEY. Well, sir, as we shall have another chance in the House I will agree to that modification.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I will make no objection to it. I shall make an objection to the other amendment in the thirty-eighth line on page 80. The duty there I think is sufficient as it is now from all the information in the possession of the commissioner, who examined that subject carefully.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment as modified by the Senator from West Virginia will be read for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is to insert on page 80, section eleven, after line twenty-four, the following:

On flint glassware, plain, molded, and pressed, not cut, engraved, or printed, forty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. WILLEY. There is also an amendment on page 79, line eighteen, to insert after the word "pressed" the words "other than flint."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let those amendments be taken together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on these two amendments proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

The amendments to the amendment were agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the other amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia, on page 80, section eleven, line thirty-eight, to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty."

Mr. WILLEY. I am obliged to the chairman of the Committee on Finance for yielding to me so much as he has. I submitted to the modification as proposed by him to the other amendment, and I hope he will reconsider his opposition to this amendment. The manufacture of cut glass is a matter of very considerable importance to a large part of the capital of this country. It has invested in it a large amount of capital. It has engaged in the manufacture of it a great number of people. It employs a large amount of capital and a large amount of labor; and cut glass is an article which brings directly in competition the cheap labor of Europe with our well-paid labor in this country. As I have already stated, the principal ingredient entering into the value of cut glass is the labor. That glass is largely manufactured in Germany, where labor is perhaps cheaper than in any other even of the European countries. We pay for the same labor engaged in the manufacture of this article in this country three or four times as much as is paid for it in Germany and in other countries; and the question presents itself whether we shall so protect our American labor as that it shall be able to sustain itself against foreign labor or not, besides paying its internal revenue taxes. I understand from these gentlemen, upon whose statements I rely, engaged in this manufacture, who are certified to me by gentlemen whom I know very well as reliable, that unless they have protection to the extent of at least fifty per cent. the capital now engaged in the manufacture of the article must be withdrawn from it and the labor must be withdrawn from it, and the manufacture of the article must go down.

If that be so then the principle of the whole bill applies equally to this as to any other part of it. I understand the principle to be admitted that where we apply protection at all we shall so apply it as to create at least an ability upon the part of the domestic manufacturer to compete fairly with the foreign producer; and upon the representations which I have had I believe that the protection which I ask, the increase of duty which I ask, is necessary to accomplish that very thing. I trust it will not be the pleasure of the Senate to discriminate on that principle in regard to this single article, and give less protection, or rather to withdraw the protection from this article, which the Senate has everywhere given to other articles that demanded that kind of protection. If the principle is just in regard to one article, I think it should be in regard to all other articles. Believing as I do that it is necessary here to enable our home manufacturers to compete with the foreign article, I trust the Senate will increase this per cent. by ten, and make it fifty per cent. instead of forty per cent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the Senate take a recess until seven and a half o'clock.

Mr. WADE. I second that motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before that is done I hope I shall be allowed to offer a resolution calling for some information which I desire to have acted upon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well; I will yield for that purpose.

INDIAN MASSACRE AT FORT PHIL. KEARNEY.

Mr. HENDERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Interior, each, be requested to furnish to the Senate all official reports, papers, and other facts in possession of their respective Departments which may tend to explain the origin, causes, and extent of the late massacre of United States troops by Indians at or near Fort Phil. Kearney, in Dakota Territory.

TREATY WITH HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator from Indiana yield to me for a moment? I desire to offer a resolution which will excite no debate. It calls for a report from one of the Departments, and as it is late in the session I desire to have it considered now. It will not take a moment:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to the Senate whether, in his opinion, American interests would not be subserved by a treaty of commercial reciprocity with the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. GRIMES. I object to the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Howe in the chair.) Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; I object to it.

Mr. CONNESS. Then let it lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It lies over under the rule.

PROPOSED RECESS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I now insist on my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate take a recess until half-past seven o'clock.

Mr. WADE. Say seven o'clock; that will be long enough.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not care myself about the hour; I would as lief say seven o'clock.

Several SENATORS. Say seven.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Well, then; I move that the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that the motion is modified so as to take a recess until seven o'clock. Well, sir, it is rather against my views, but as I have become satisfied that we shall never pass this bill until the Senate gets sleepy, perhaps we may just about as well do that.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope this motion will not prevail. It takes many Senators, I think, by surprise. I know that several Senators have made engagements for to-night. I am one of them. I cannot be here to-night, and I desire to offer two or three amendments. I have not troubled the Senate much during the consideration of this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will have to take his choice between sitting right straight on until this bill is passed or taking a recess.

Mr. HARRIS. We have been threatened a little that way by the Senator from Maine before, and he has not succeeded very well in sitting right straight on and passing the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I gave notice yesterday that I should ask the Senate to dispose of the bill to-day, and I hope the Senator will not take it as a threat. He can do as he has repeatedly done, go off and leave us without a quorum and attend to his engagements; and so can other Senators, and leave a few of us here to work on until there is no quorum. The Senator can do it again to-night and to-morrow night, if he chooses. If the Senator's engagements are so much more important than the public business, which is pressing at this period of the session, he knows best. I only say I hope the Senate will do one thing or the other: either sit on until we get through with it and pass the bill to-night, or take a recess and return at seven o'clock. That is my wish. Whether the Senate do it or not I am indifferent. I only say it is my advice.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that the amendments that ought to be proposed to this bill might be considered to-night; and we might have an understanding that we shall vote on the bill say at three o'clock to-morrow. I do not think that this bill ought to take up all the session, though it seems to be an important bill, for I observe that each Senator, as he introduces a proposition to protect a particular interest, says that that interest is going to languish and die if we do not do it; and that assurance has been given in reference to almost every industrial interest in the country. Judging from this unanimous expression of opinion the country is in a most critical crisis.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the question before the Senate?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I propose that we have an understanding that we have a night session to-night, and that then we shall take the vote on the bill to-morrow.

Mr. SPRAGUE and Mr. HENDERSON. I object to that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If that is objected to, I insist on my motion to take a recess.

The motion was agreed to, there being, on a division—ayes 17, noes 11; and the Senate accordingly, at nine minutes to five o'clock, took a recess until seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 903) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1868, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 900) to fix the compensation of the officers of the revenue-cutter service, and for other purposes, and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 251) to extend the time for codifying the laws relating to customs, authorized by the joint resolution approved July 26, 1866, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CHANGE OF NAME OF VESSEL.

Mr. SHERMAN. While the Senate is gathering together, I move to take up for consideration joint resolution No. 159, which has been reported from the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. R. No. 159) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the owner of the yacht Mayflower to change the name of the same to that of Silvie, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABSENCE OF TERRITORIAL OFFICERS.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 32, which we had under consideration day before yesterday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 32) to prevent the absence of territorial officers from their official duties.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Edmunds in the chair.) When this bill was last under consideration, an amendment was proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] changing the phraseology of the first section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. The original phraseology of the bill is, I think, entirely correct, and comprehends all the cases for which the bill was intended to provide. The adoption of the amendment may defeat, in some respects, the object of the bill.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed after a third reading; and was read a third time, and passed.

JAMES STARKEY.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 660. It is a private bill, which can be readily disposed of—a very small affair.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 660) for the relief of Captain James Starkey, was considered in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to appropriate $100 to pay to James Starkey, late captain of the St. Paul light cavalry, the amount by him paid to Richard Postel, for the loss of a horse killed in a fight with Indians in 1857.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the reading of the report in that case.

The Secretary read the report made by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives, from which it appears that in August, 1857, certain bands of Chippewas committed some depredations upon the frontier settlements of Minnesota, and a serious outbreak was threatened, to quell which and to restore peace and order the Governor of Minnesota Territory, Mr. Medary, ordered out the St. Paul light cavalry, of which James Starkey was captain. This company, under his command, at once marched to the frontier and fought with the Indians. The horse of Richard Postel, a private in the company, was shot and so wounded that it died. Captain Starkey, believing the Government liable to pay for the horse, paid private Postel $100 in full satisfaction of his claim and took his receipt. It was worth a much larger sum. The accounts connected with the expedition and growing out of it were afterward sent to the War Department, and most of them, excepting this one, were paid. Postel has left the country, and his place of residence is unknown. Under the circumstances the committee believe that the Government was liable to pay the value of the horse, and as Captain Starkey has discharged that liability they can see no reason why he should not be substituted in the right of Postel and receive the $100.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SOLDIERS' AND SAILORS' ORPHAN HOME.

Mr. WILSON. I move to take up House bill No. 848, amending the act of incorporation of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 848) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home," approved July 25, 1866, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to repeal sections one, two, three, four, five, six, and seven of the act of July 25, 1866, and to revoke all rights, powers, and privileges thereby granted to the persons therein named, and to constitute U. S. Grant, W. T. Sherman, David G. Farragut, John A. Dahlgren, Oliver O. Howard, Lorenzo Thomas, Amos B. Eaton, Abram D. Gillette, Charles H. Hall, Henry D. Cooke, and James C. Carlisle, and their successors, a body-corporate in the District of Columbia, by the name of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home.

The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia reported two amendments. The first was in section one, to strike out the names "U. S. Grant, W. T. Sherman, David G. Farragut, John A. Dahlgren, Oliver O. Howard, Lorenzo Thomas, Amos B. Eaton, Abram D. Gillette, Charles H. Hall, and James C. Carlisle," and in lieu of them to insert "David K. Cartter, John H. Semmes, Franklin A. Dick, W. B. Woodward, Byron Sunderland, J. W. Alvord."

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "Byron Sunderland" and inserting "J. R. Elvans."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire why the amendment is proposed?

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Sunderland's name was put in without his knowledge, and he really does not desire it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Why strike out the names already in the House bill?

Mr. WILSON. Because we want to get the institution into the hands of persons who can attend to the business. These admirals and generals have something else to do. We therefore take it entirely out of the Army and Navy, and put it into the hands of the men here proposed. Henry D. Cooke, and David K. Cartter, are well known. John H. Semmes is a large business man here. Franklin A. Dick is a lawyer here. W. B. Woodward is a lawyer. J. R. Elvans, whose name I proposed to put in, is a business man. Mr. Alvord is a very active, energetic, organizing man. The object of the amendment is to put the institution into the hands of men who can attend to it. It is certainly a matter that General Grant and General Sherman and men of that class cannot attend to. The institution is located here in the city. The corporation has about twenty-eight or thirty thousand dollars in money and is taking charge of twenty or twenty-five very poor children.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, line seven, to strike out "five" and insert "four;" so as to make the section read:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the persons named in the second section of this act shall be the board of trustees of this corporation; and all vacancies caused by death, resignation, or otherwise in the office of trustee, shall be filled by the board by ballot, without unnecessary delay, as may be provided in the constitution and by-laws of the corporation. Four of such trustees shall constitute a quorum for the transacting of all business of the corporation, and a majority of the votes present shall decide all questions before it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WILSON. In the fifth section, after "sailors," in the eighth line, I move to insert "and marines, without distinction of color;" so as to read:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That immediately upon accepting this charter said trustees shall take entire control and management of all property, moneys, or other security or interest now held or used for the benefit of the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphan Home in the District of Columbia, of which they are hereby created trustees, and shall have power to establish a home for and to support and educate the destitute orphans of soldiers, sailors, and marines, without distinction of color, who have died in the late war in behalf of the Union of these States, from whatever State or Territory they may have entered the national service, or their orphans may apply to enter the Home, and which is hereby declared to be the object and purpose of said corporation, and to such end and for such use the said corporation may take and hold property, real or personal, only to an amount necessary for the support and maintenance of the Home and the orphans partaking of its benefits.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As the chairman of the Finance Committee does not propose to take up the tariff bill yet, I move that we proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 874.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 874) to regulate the duties of the Clerk of the House of Representatives in preparing for the organization of the House, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides in its first section that before the first meeting of the next Congress, and of every subsequent Congress, the Clerk of the next preceding House of Representatives shall make a roll of the Representatives-elect, and place thereon the names of all persons claiming seats as Representatives-elect from States which were represented in the next preceding Congress, and of such persons only, and whose credentials show that they were regularly elected in accordance with the laws of their States respectively, or the laws of the United States.

The second section provides that in case of a vacancy in the office of Clerk of the House of Representatives, or of absence or inability of the Clerk to discharge the duties imposed on him by law or custom relative to the preparation of the roll of Representatives or the organization of the House, those duties shall devolve on the Sergeant-at-Arms of the next preceding House of Representatives; and in case of vacancies in both of the offices mentioned, or of the absence or inability of both the Clerk and Sergeant-at-Arms to act, the duties shall be performed by the Doorkeeper of the next preceding House of Representatives.

The third section makes a violation of the provisions of the act by any of the officers mentioned a felony, punishable, upon conviction of the offender, by imprisonment at hard labor for a term of not less than one year nor more than five years, in the discretion of the court.

The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to amend the bill by striking out the third section.

Several SENATORS. Why strike it out?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The committee recommended the striking out of the third section, which imposes a penalty for violation of the performance of duty, on this principle, that that is an unusual provision to put in a law. We impose a duty upon an officer, and then to make it a felony if he does not perform it is a new feature in legislation; and a majority of the committee recommended that that section be struck out on that ground.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I think, sir, we passed a bill or joint resolution at a former session on this subject. I should like to know in what respect this bill differs from the existing law, there being one, as I understand, on this subject.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is a House bill. I understand that it differs by providing for other officers. My recollection is that the law as it stands provides only for the Clerk doing this duty, and in case of the sickness or absence of the Clerk there is nobody now provided for to perform it. This bill provides that in case of his absence or sickness the Sergeant-at-Arms, and in case of his absence the Doorkeeper, shall perform the duty. I think that is all the difference there is between this bill and the existing law. It was before the Committee on the Judiciary and I think we all agreed to it with the exception of the third section.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have no objection to the addition of other officers besides the Clerk in case of his absence; but if that be the only object of the bill I do not understand why we have so much matter.

Mr. TRUMBULL. There are but two sections in it now.

Mr. BUCKALEW. A provision enacting simply that the duties charged upon the Clerk by the former law in case of his absence should be performed by some other officer would occupy but two or three lines, I suppose, and would accomplish the whole purpose of the House, as I understand the explanation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Perhaps it might have been more briefly drawn. I think the first section reiterates what the former law is, though I am not certain but that the clause is new, which provides "that the Clerk shall place on his roll the names of all persons claiming seats as Representatives-elect from States which were represented in the next preceding Congress." I think that is new. It applies only to those Representatives from States that were in the preceding Congress, and provides that he shall not put on others from other States.

Mr. BUCKALEW. What would be the action in the case of a new State?

Mr. TRUMBULL. He would not put that on unless they were represented in the preceding Congress under this bill.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to understand what is the object of this bill. If it be to exclude persons not excluded by the existing law we ought to have the point distinctly understood.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in. It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill be read a third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. BUCKALEW. As the bill is now on its final passage I ask that it lie over until tomorrow until I can examine it in connection with the former law. I move to postpone it for the present.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection to its being laid aside if the Senate desires to look at it.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

TARIFF BILL.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. WULLEY, to strike out in line thirty-eight of section eleven of the committee's amendment "forty" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

On all articles of glass, cut, engraved, painted, colored, printed, stained, silvered, or gilded, not including plate-glass silvered, or looking-glass plates, fifty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will simply say that the cut-glass referred to in that particular clause, as every one knows, is the most expensive kind of glass, and the more expensive it is, the more it costs, the more the duty amounts to ad valorem. The ad valorem is forty per cent., and the Senator proposes to raise it to fifty. I think that would be too high, and I must therefore object to it.

Mr. WILLEY. The question is, I imagine, whether we can manufacture the glass in this country with any less duty than that proposed. That seems to be the question with those with whom I have conversed who are engaged in the manufacture of it. If it be proper to encourage the manufacture of the article at all in this country, or if it be to the interest of the country that it should be manufactured here, it seems to me, so far as my information extends, necessary that this additional protection should be given; otherwise I am sure the manufacture of it must cease entirely, and the production of the article be surrendered to the foreign manufacturer. As I stated to-day, I make this assertion upon the assurance of gentlemen who profess to be skilled in the matter and to have experience in the manufacture of the article, and the reliance I have upon their integrity and candor, stating again that for myself I am wholly ignorant of the question; but I believe those who have represented this matter to me and under the influence of that belief, and not wishing to see this class of industry entirely destroyed, I shall vote for the increase of duty. I hope that the Senate will also do so, unless they desire to see the manufacture of cut glass entirely destroyed and surrendered to the foreign producer. I feel pretty certain that that will be the practical result of the duty as it now stands in the bill. The gentlemen with whom I conversed desired that I should offer an amendment increasing it to sixty per cent. Upon conferring with them and with others who seem to have some knowledge on the subject, I was assured that fifty per cent. was the very lowest rate at which manufacturers of the article could live in this country under existing circumstances.

As I said to-day, I beg Senators to remember that the main ingredient entering into the value of this article is the labor. It requires a great deal of labor to cut the glass as I understand. It requires skilled labor, labor that can command the highest price; and that fact brings into competition the high-priced labor here with the low-priced labor of Europe; and therefore it not only involves the existence of the manufacture of cut glass in this country, but also involves the interests of a large amount of capital, as I understand, already invested in the manufacture and a large amount of industry connected with it. Having submitted the case, as I understand it, to the Senate I have nothing more to say in regard to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that if those who are engaged in manufacturing this sort of glass in this country cannot proceed with their business under a tariff of forty per cent. on this glass they had better engage in some other pursuit, because if I am not misinformed—and I derive my information from pretty good authority—the present tariff is very nearly prohibitory, and if it be made fifty per cent. almost all this glass will be excluded from the country and we shall lose the revenue upon it, and the price will be very greatly enhanced to the consumer. It does seem to me that on an article of this description, an expensive article, forty per cent. ought to be sufficient to protect those who are engaged in its manufacture. I hope that this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. WILLEY. In respect to the question of revenue, there are always two sides to it. We have revenue derived from imports and we have an internal revenue. In our efforts to increase our revenue on imposts it would be well to consider whether we may not destroy our internal revenue on the articles manufactured at home and the income derived from it at home. The result will be precisely that if by want of proper protection to our domestic industry in reference to any article we destroy its manufacture here. We may perhaps to some extent by increasing the importation into the country of that article increase the revenues derived from that source; but if at the same time we destroy the manufacture of that article at home and withdraw from it the capital now invested in it, and the industry now connected with it, we may destroy prolific sources of internal revenue, and the revenues of the country may suffer detriment in that direction to a greater degree than they will derive benefit in the other direction.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to offer two other amendments to this bill. I proposed to offer an amendment on page 31, but the information upon which I intended to move it has been corrected. Page 31, line one hundred and forty-one of section seven, authorized a duty on the wrought-iron tubes and flues there provided for of three and a half cents a pound. I was told they were made out of iron such as is mentioned in line seventy-six, on page 28, on which there is a duty of three and a quarter cents per pound. But since then I have been told they are made out of a different description of iron.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They are made out of iron on which the duty is two and a quarter cents a pound.

Mr. HOWE. On page 32, line one hundred and seventy, after "hollow-ware," I move to insert "and on all descriptions of wrought-iron enameled ware;" so as to read:

On glazed, tinned, or enameled wrought-iron hollow-ware, and on all descriptions of wrought-iron enameled ware.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose that is a mere matter of description.

Mr. HOWE. It does not change the duties; it is merely a description.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 39, in the thirty-eighth line of section eight, I move to amend by striking out "two and a half" and inserting "three;" so as to read:

"On lead in pigs or bars, three cents per pound."

I have only to call the attention of the Senate to the table I read the other day: I will not produce it again. When the duty was three cents a pound all the lead needed was delivered in New York from the mines of this country and sold at less than four cents a pound: four dollars a hundred; there was none imported. Under the recent rates of duty there is only about a million pounds—less than two million pounds—now sent to New York, and the price in New York is over ten dollars a hundred, and there are over thirty million pounds imported. Under these circumstances I think we can well afford to raise the duty another half cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the duty now?

Mr. HOWE. Two cents a pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This lead is of course in very great demand for many purposes. The statement made to the committee was that it was impossible for the lead mines of the West to supply the demand of the country, and for the reason that they could not get their workmen to do it. Their workmen had left and gone to other mines, and they could not get the mines worked—I would like to know whether that is a fact—and the consequence was that lead was absolutely imported and sent West. With all their advantages for making lead, they had not and could not get the force to get the mines fully worked. The tariff did not have any effect on it; the duty is high. It seems they had three cents some time ago, and it was put down to two; we have raised it to two and a half, and that ought to be sufficient.

Mr. GRIMES. I think the Senator from Maine has been misinformed as to there being any considerable importation to the West from the East of lead that had come from abroad. This is an article that is produced to a very considerable extent in the western part of Wisconsin, the northern part of Iowa, and in Illinois and Missouri. It was formerly produced to a much greater extent than at present, I admit. That falling off has been owing to two causes, as I am told: first, to the fact that a number of the miners have gone into the gold-producing Territories of the West; and second, because it is said of the want of this very protection which the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to afford. All I have to say in regard to this proposition is, that the relative proportion of increase suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin is not near as great, I think, as has been put already by the Senate upon copper, upon nickel, and upon that article which is almost a constituent of lead—zinc. We have raised them all, and it would seem to me that if we are going to continue this raising of metals, lead should go up pari passu with the others.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask the Senator from Iowa whether in his judgment this duty ought to be increased from two and a half to three cents per pound? I want an answer.

Mr. GRIMES. My views in regard to this tariff bill are very well known. I say that if you are going to raise upon one article that is produced in the country, you ought to raise a corresponding amount upon other articles. That is what I say.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is no answer to my question.

Mr. GRIMES. And as you have raised upon copper, upon iron, upon zinc, upon nickel, I cannot conceive of any substantial reason why there should not be a corresponding increase upon lead.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have not raised the duty on those articles fifty per cent. This is an increase of fifty per cent.

Mr. GRIMES. No.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly it is; from two to three cents. It stands at two now; we make it two and a half, or twenty-five per cent., and now it is proposed to go to three cents. But I do not get an answer to my question from the advocate of this increase of duty. He will not give his own opinion on the subject. Lead is produced in the upper part of Iowa.

Mr. GRIMES. One reason why I do not give an opinion on the point put to me is, because I have expended so much good opinion on the Senator from Maine without producing any effect upon him that I am conscious that any opinion I should give him now would not influence his judgment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senate, I think, will be able to infer what the Senator's opinion is on that subject.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no hesitation in saying candidly that if this proposition was a new proposition and stood by itself I would not vote for it; but after having raised the duty on all the other products of the earth, all the other minerals that are dug out of its bowels, I cannot conceive why there should not be a proportionate amount, a ratable proportion put upon lead.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is, as the bill is bad, make it as much worse as possible!

Mr. HOWE. I will only add a word or two. If my judgment had not led me to think this duty ought to be raised to three cents a pound I should not have made the motion. My judgment was formed on no practical experience in this business; I am not interested in it at all; but it was formed on the advice and information communicated to me by others. But I will say of this motion, as I have said of one or two articles before, that if there were no lead mines to be protected in this country the duty we propose to levy here is not a high duty even for the purpose of revenue. It is only three cents on an article which is worth from ten to twelve cents in market; from twenty-five to thirty per cent. That is not a very high revenue duty on foreign products. But there are mines to be protected, mines which twenty years ago furnished you all the lead you had in the United States, and furnished it to you at less than half the price you now get it at. It is said that now we cannot get labor to work it. There is nearly double the labor in the country that there was then, and these miners could employ that labor just as well as anybody else if they could pay them as well; but they certainly cannot employ them unless they can find a market for the lead when it is produced. I have seen no article produced here which exhibits so strikingly the necessity for protection as this very article.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he knows what the price of lead is in the pig?

Mr. HOWE. I do not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should think that would have something to do with this proposition which has been submitted, as it does not appear what per cent. this will be ad valorem upon the article. Now, the other day the Senator from New York [Mr. HARRIS] who is now absent moved to reduce the duty from two and a half cents, as reported by the committee, to two cents, and represented that the necessities of the country imperatively demanded that reduction in the price of lead. Now, the Senator from Wisconsin represents that it is necessary that the tariff should be increased from two and a half to three cents. I think that it is a very large percentage; think that is a very high ad valorem tariff upon lead; and according to all the representations that have been made on both sides of this question I should think that two and a half cents was as much as ought to be imposed upon this article, and that such a tariff is as high in proportion as the tariff that has been imposed upon other articles of a similar description produced in the country. The tariff was three cents on lead in 1842. In 1851 it was put at one cent; then it was increased to one and a half cent, and finally to two cents; so that the present tariff is two cents per pound on pig lead.

Mr. HOWE. Was that increase in 1864 or 1866?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In 1864 the tariff was increased to two cents per pound. The committee now report an additional half cent; and upon an article of that description, of comparatively so little value or at such low price, a half cent a pound is a considerable addition; and when you come to make the duty three cents per pound I think it is one hundred per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. CATTELL. The gentleman from Iowa has indulged in a little pleasantry in looking over to New Jersey in regard to zinc and nickel. I ask permission to say that the tariff now placed upon lead is a higher ad valorem, almost double that which has been laid upon either nickel or zinc. The ad valorem duty upon lead at two and a half cents a pound is, in my judgment, about sixty per cent. That is a rate of duty which my friend from Iowa, I think, pretty strongly objects to upon the highest degree of manufactures in the country: and upon an article in its first stage of preparation, like lead in the pig, it ought to be abundant even for a protective tariff man like myself.

Now, I do not like to oppose what is advocated by my friend from Iowa, for I am under a sort of implied contract with him that in his absence I will not move to reduce the duty upon anything in this bill. I think I made that bargain a day or two ago; and therefore I do not like to oppose his view of advancing the duty on lead. A reference to Commerce and Navigation Reports will show the importations of lead and its invoice value. The latter is between four and five cents a pound on the other side, and consequently two and a half cents a pound is a tariff of something like sixty per cent. If any more was needed I am the last man who would hesitate to grant it. In my judgment, however, two and a half cents is a fair and liberal allowance of duty, more so, in my judgment, than that on any other metal on the list.

Mr. HOWE. I only want to say, in reply to the Senator from New Jersey, that I do not think it fair to take the price at which an article is invoiced for the purpose of assessing duties as really the market price of lead in the foreign market. I now call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if five cents is not the foreign valuation of this article, and whether he wants more than fifty per cent. on this production?

Mr. HOWE. I have already said that I am not prepared now to state what the foreign price is.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can find it in the prices current.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is between five and six cents a pound.

Mr. HOWE. Fifty per cent. is not a high protection; it is not a very high revenue tariff. But lead is an article which can be imported at very low freights. It is a desirable kind of freight, but little bulk and a great deal of weight. But, however, I am not going to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing this matter. I just want to know who is for my motion and who is not.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suggest to the Senator that the price upon which the duty was levied upon the importations last year was between five and six cents. I would suggest to him, however, and to the Senator from New Jersey that the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin is not more than half the ad valorem duty which was voted this afternoon upon building-stone, an article that can be furnished, as I understand, for three dollars a ton, and there we voted this evening four dollars per ton duty.

Mr. BUCKALEW. A single remark on this amendment. This bill, after the Senate has concluded its action upon it, will go again to the House of Representatives, and afterward will go to a committee of conference. The House bill is a bill much higher than the one reported from our Committee on Finance. The practical result will be that all the changes made in this bill after it passes here will be in the direction of increasing rates. There will be no reduction in the committee of conference upon any vote taken by the Senate: all the changes will be to raise the rates: our committee will be obliged, as is usual in such cases, to give up the judgment of the Senate upon perhaps half the items upon which we are passing. Now, this being the condition of this measure, it follows that the Senate ought not to vote to increase any item in this bill as reported from the committee, unless the case is perfectly clear that it ought to be increased. If there is any doubt about it, if the question is dubious and uncertain, we ought to stand by the report of the committee and enable them to have a fair basis upon which to make an ultimate agreement with the House of Representatives. On that principle, on this and many other amendments, I vote steadily to sustain the report of the Committee on Finance and to retain the bill at the level of rate upon which they have reported it to the Senate, deviating from this rule only in cases where a particular argument excludes an item from the general rule.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not choose to give my vote on this question without the expression of an opinion. This whole bill, in my best judgment, does not improve past legislation. It is my opinion that we should return again to the system which treats equally all departments of the industry of the country. I made a little mistake this morning in the vote which I cast upon an amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, but I discovered my mistake in time to correct it. He proposed to give a special privilege to New England to bring down coal from the British colonies. I believe about all this matter, that we should legislate for every State; as well as for mine as for the State which is distinguished by the gentleman who is now temporarily presiding [Mr. HENDRICKS in the chair] as well as for all the States. Special legislation is an evil. Why should we legislate for New England as against Iowa? Why should we make distinctions as against or for California? Why should we discriminate in legislation for or against Oregon, or any other part of the United States? Special legislation is the evil of the day, and until we can again return to the old policy of legislation for revenue we cannot have much harmony on this subject of taxing imports. My opinion is that we should return to that policy as soon as possible, and that this extra, particular, special legislation is all wrong.

I believe that we should approximate free trade as soon as we can consistent with the interests of the Government, and that would bring us down again to the tariff of 1846, as near as can be; for I believe that the then Secretary of the Treasury organized a revenue system better than has been organized since, and I think it should be returned to now. We are not required to make those great demands upon the resources of the country. Why should we legislate against foreign commerce? Sir, commerce is the hand-maid of civilization, has been for ages, and should not be restrained and prevented by putting a Chinese wall around our country as there is about China. As near as we can afford to have commerce free it should be free.

But, sir, this measure as it stands is against the whole law of progress, as it is understood in Great Britain, as it is understood in France, as it is understood even in Belgium, a small State, as it is understood in every civilized foreign country. This legislation is against the whole law of progress, as laid down by every prudent legislator and high thinker of the last century. We should make our charges on foreign commerce upon a revenue basis; and the sooner it is perfectly free the richer we shall become. Why? The reason has been stated so often that I dare not even repeat it. It has been published, printed, and recorded by the great men of many States and the great men of our own country. That we do not understand it is a great fault, and it is because the subject is not carefully inquired into by those among us who undertake the high office of legislation. When they have studied and inquired into this they may improve. Perhaps the evil may be this: we are a new country; we have not passed through many centuries; we have not studied the institutions of other nations; in our busy life we have not had leisure to inquire into those laws that govern the condition of States and the necessities of their prosperity.

I do not affirm free trade absolutely, because we are a concrete people, and we cannot exist yet in the abstract. In the abstract free trade is a truth. All students of the science of Government and its policy know it. An approximation to it is demanded of us. If we cannot approximate to that we shall approximate to the other extreme; and the other extreme, in my judgment, leads to chaos.

I have made these remarks simply in order to give expression to my views as to what is the true policy in regard to the question before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose we are all striving for a common object, and that is to make this bill as near right as possible. It has been said that it is not a perfect bill, and in that opinion I concur. It was not a perfect bill when it came from the committee, and not in all respects satisfactory. I do not think it has been improved or is likely to be improved much by the amendments made in the Senate. As we are now called upon to vote on this question of lead, I think it would be well enough to state that no persons interested in producing lead asked for an increase before the committee, while there were before the committee several persons consumers of lead who asked that the duty might be reduced instead of increased. The duty now being two cents the consumers ask that it might be reduced to a cent and a half a pound; and my colleague, who is not present to-night, made a motion to have it so reduced. That motion did not prevail; but I wish to say that there is no demand for this increase, there is no necessity for it; it is not required. It is true, as has been said here to-night, that for two years past imported lead has been taken to the West and bought very largely. It has been bought very largely for the market at St. Louis within the last two years. I do not know that that is the case now. Perhaps it may have been owing in part to the small quantity of lead produced at the western mines during the war; but I am satisfied that the rate fixed by the committee, two and a half cents a pound, is all that is needed, and I hope the Senate will adhere to the report of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Since the colloquy about the price of lead I have sent and got the prices-current as given in the Iron Age of December 27. I find that the price of lead in England was twenty pounds per ton, or equivalent to four cents and four mills a pound. A duty of two and a half cents a pound is sixty per cent. on the present cost. I find the value of pig iron is $16 22 a ton, and the duty proposed on that is nine cents a pound, about the same rate. The duty on railroad iron is about the same rate, between fifty and sixty per cent. The duty on bar iron is higher than any other duty on metals in the list, probably nearly one hundred per cent.; but certainly the duty on lead is high enough as the bill stands; it is as high as any other metal on the list, except probably bar iron. I shall not vote for an increase.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to say a word in reply to the Senator from New York. He says that the producers of lead have not been here. That I think is a fact; they have not been in the Senate; they have not been before the Finance Committee; they were before the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives; they did insist upon higher protection, and the House conceded that they were entitled to it and put the duty at three cents a pound, just what I ask to have it put here. In the absence of the producers of lead, and as it seems to me by the statement of the Senator from New York, in the presence of those who import it the Finance Committee put down the duty to two and a half cents—put it down from what the House agreed it should be half a cent. I wish to have it put back.

In reply to the Senator from Ohio I simply wish to call his attention and that of the Senate to the difference between pig lead and pig iron. Pig iron is not what may be strictly called a raw material, but it is a very raw manufacture. Pig lead, when you get that put into market, is the article that you want for all uses. It is refined lead.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Connors, Cowan, Doolittle, Edmunds, Frelighuysen, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Norton, Trumbull, Wade, and Yates—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Cragin, Creswell, Davis, Fessenden, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Patterson, Poland, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Dixon, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Sumner—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. On page 55 I have been informed that the duty we have raised on these places: in lines three hundred and fifty-two, three hundred and fifty-eight, and three hundred and sixty, on "white lead or carbonate of lead, dry;" on "red lead or minium;" and on "red lead, moist, or ground in water or in oil." It is fair to say that in reference to this matter I move entirely upon the opinion furnished me by others. The duty on lead, as has already been noticed, has been raised from what it was before; and as these paints are manufactured from pig lead it of course necessitated raising the duty on them. That duty has been raised to be sure, but it is said that it is not sufficiently raised. I will submit a motion to insert "and a half" in line three hundred and fifty-two after "four;" so as to read:

On white lead or carbonate of lead, dry, four and a half cents per pound.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think when a proposition is made to increase the tariff upon an article of that description some good reason should be given for the change. Now, this is an article that is very generally used; it is one of the necessary ingredients of paint, and its consumption is very large in the country; and to add to the duty would impose a tax upon a very large number of persons who use the article, and I do not think there is any disproportion between a tariff of two and a half cents on pig lead and four and a half cents on white lead. Why should white lead be raised to four and a half cents, when the material out of which it is made is only subjected to a duty of two and a half cents? I think that if two and a half cents on the pig lead would protect that business, as I presume it would, four cents on white lead would protect the manufacturers of that article. I have had experience enough in connection with this tariff bill to know that all persons who take pains enough to come to Washington to make representations about this tariff say that it is necessary that the tariff should be very high so far as their particular interest is concerned; and I have become satisfied that it will not do to take the representations made by interested parties, and ask the Senate to adopt an increase of duty, when the duty already proposed is certainly reasonable, and in many cases a large duty. I have not had time to compare this duty on white lead as reported by the committee with the duty that was fixed in the House bill. I am not able to say now what the present duty is on white lead; but these matters were considered by the committee in view of both sides of the question; and to say simply that somebody who is interested in the manufacture of this article desires to have it raised seems to me to be a very poor reason for adding so much to an article of this description.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is raised more than the lead is: it is raised a cent a pound and the lead half a cent.

Mr. HOWE. The simple question for the Senate to pass upon is this: the lead can be exported by foreign producers to this country at two and a half cents; the paint at one and a half cent more. The question is whether they will export the lead or whether they will put it into paint and export it in that form; whether the foreign producer will send it over here as pig lead at a duty of two and a half cents or send it over here as paint at four cents.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. On page 66, between the lines six hundred and twenty and six hundred and twenty-one, I move to amend by inserting, "on aluminate of soda two and a half cents per pound."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a very high duty. The other salts of soda are only at half a cent a pound.

Mr. HOWE. On the sulphate of soda the duty is one and a half cent. I cannot testify what the precise rate should be. Such are my instructions.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know what the article is. I only say how it is with regard to the salts. Soda-ash is at half a cent; nitrate of soda is half a cent; sulphate of soda is half a cent. Why not put this at the same rate?

Mr. HOWE. Soda-ash and nitrate of soda are the basis of this.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose you put it at three fourths of a cent a pound, precisely what soda is. I do not know what the article is, and the Senator it seems does not.

Mr. HOWE. No; I am not acquainted with the article.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then I doubt whether it ought to be put in at all.

Mr. HOWE. I think that is no objection to putting it in. I do not understand that there is any objection to putting in this article if Senators can be satisfied with the rate. Well, put it at three fourths of a cent.

Mr. GRIMES. I object to anything of this kind going in unless the Senator can tell us what it is. It may be some generic term that includes some half a dozen other sodas. "Aluminate of soda." The Senator cannot tell us what it is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let it go to the House. It can be put in there.

Mr. HOWE. I would tell the Senate what it was if I knew, [laughter;] but I trust they will take my word upon the other branch of the proposition, and that is that I do not know. [Laughter.]

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. Now I wish to move an amendment in reference to an article that I think I do know what it is. It is on page 93, line one hundred and ten. It is "wheat." [Laughter.] I move to raise the duty to thirty cents a bushel. I move to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know that that there is any objection to that. I understand it is prohibitory now.

Mr. HOWE. If there is no objection to it—

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is for the Senate to say.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to it.

Mr. HOWE. I have one reason for thinking that the duty of twenty cents is not prohibitory, and that is that about half a million of value was imported last year of wheat and flour.

I have another reason for thinking that it is not prohibitory. A year or two ago the Congress of the United States was vehemently importuned to rescind what was known as the reciprocity treaty—a treaty that we had with Canada—under which wheat and flour could come from Canada here free, and our wheat and flour could go to Canada free; and as an argument to induce us to rescind that treaty we were pointed to the enormous importation of wheat and flour from Canada. My reply was that I was perfectly willing, so far as the farmers who are my constituents were concerned, to compete with the Canadian wheat-growers upon equal terms. I was perfectly willing that they should send their wheat and flour here without duty if we could send ours there without duty. I insisted upon it that we had the best soil and the best climate, and that our productions would excel theirs, and that we should sell them more, and we were selling them more than they were selling us.

But the argument that it was necessary in order to save our markets to rescind the treaty prevailed. Very well, sir, the treaty is gone. Now you have a duty of twenty cents per bushel to keep Canadian wheat out of our markets. That is not what it costs to get the wheat from the Northwest to the Atlantic markets. It often costs twenty cents a bushel to get wheat from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, and I think it is very seldom that it happens that wheat can be transported from Lake Michigan to New York for twenty cents a bushel.

Mr. GRIMES. It costs seventeen cents from the Mississippi to Lake Michigan.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Iowa says that seventeen cents is the price now for transporting wheat from the Mississippi river to Lake Michigan, and it is very rarely the case, and I do not think ever happens, that wheat can be sent from Lake Michigan to New York for twenty cents. Therefore we do pay a duty; we do not pay it to the custom-house, but we pay it to your transportation companies; a duty of much more than twenty cents a bushel to get to these markets, and we pay twenty cents a bushel over what it costs the Canadian farmer. The consequence is, that by virtue of rescinding the reciprocity treaty and renewing these duties the Canadians have a monopoly of the Atlantic market so far as their productions can supply it and we are excluded from the Canadian markets. Now, that is the justice that you mete out to us by this sort of legislation! The House, I believe, put up the duty to forty cents a bushel. I have learned to be modest during the discussion of this tariff bill and to ask for but very little, and not insist much upon that. I have proposed to put this up to thirty cents, and I hope the Senate will agree to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope that this amendment of my friend from Wisconsin will be adopted. Vermont is a State that produces very little wheat and consumes a great deal of flour; but I, for one, as a Vermonter, am perfectly willing to protect the products of Wisconsin or Iowa or the West, any part of the country that is able to produce a thing which we want ourselves. I do not think we owe any gratitude or consideration whatever of any kind, except our own interests, to the Canadians. The policy which they pursue is hostile to us in all respects, political, economic, and every other. I beg to call the attention of the Senate to a paragraph which I find in this evening's paper, which could not have been gotten up for this occasion, touching Canadian policy:

"The report of the Canadian minister of customs recommends that American vessels be refused the privilege of passing through the Welland canal for a few months. 'By doing this,' he says, 'we will bring the Americans to reason.'"

Well, if it will bring the Americans to reason, I hope they will stop our passage through that canal, so that we shall have public works of our own by which we can transport our own products from one part of the country to the other. I hope this amendment, by which Canadian wheat will be taxed higher than it is now, will be agreed to, although it may for the present moment bear hardly upon the constituents whom I represent. I believe that when we are able to produce wheat enough for ourselves, and when we have the means of home transportation, as we may have, we shall be unwise in every respect if we admit the products of a community who are hostile to us into the country without their paying a fair share of the burdens which fall upon our own producers. I am willing, therefore, to pay a little more for Wisconsin and western wheat than I should be obliged to pay for Canadian wheat, in the hope that by mutual protection to all parts of the country we shall develop our own productions and be independent of those foreigners who entertain toward us the spirit which this paragraph shows.

Mr. HOWE. I am urged by several gentlemen to modify the motion so as to put the duty at forty cents, the House rate, instead of thirty, and I will do so. I suppose it is at my option.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HENDRICKS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin, increasing the duty on wheat from twenty to forty cents a bushel.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. Now, Mr. President, on page 89, section fifteen, line twenty-four, corresponding with that, I move to strike out "fifteen" and to insert "thirty;" so as to read:

On flour and meal, middlings, and mill-feed of wheat, rye, oats, or other grain not herein otherwise provided for, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have no particular interest in this matter one way or the other, and I suppose my constituents have none; but one Senator represents the men who produce the wheat; another Senator proposes this legislation because of the action of the people in Canada; but nobody represents the vast proportion of the people of this country who consume this article, and who are compelled to pay a very much higher price for the bread which they eat on account of this additional tariff. It seems to me that this class of people, constituting a very large proportion of the community, ought not to be wholly ignored. Before we put fifty per cent. or forty per cent. or thirty per cent. upon wheat and flour, we ought to remember that there are thousands of poor people in this country who have families to support who will be oppressed by this additional tariff, and it is on their account that I protest against this addition to these taxes upon the food which the people of the country consume.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am much obliged to the Senator from Oregon for speaking for the poor, although I fancy that he can have very little knowledge of that class of people; but I represent in part three hundred and twenty-five thousand poor people who do not raise any wheat, but who eat it, and I will take the responsibility of speaking for that portion of the community. I do not oppose this section as it stood on wheat and favor the increase on the ground of the hostility of the Canadians to us merely; but I said that we ought not to enter into any legislation which would favor foreigners at the expense of our own producers and laborers and agriculturists for people of that description. That is what I said.

Now, we have repeated the reciprocity treaty and set it aside; but if we are to give the Canadians almost the same privileges under a low tariff that they had under the reciprocity treaty, while we receive none of the corresponding benefits, as few and feeble as they were under that treaty while it lasted, then I say we shall be carrying generosity a great deal further than we do justice. We are able to produce, and we do produce all the agricultural products that all the people of the country need; and if by protecting manufactures and the industrial arts we give employment to the poor of the eastern States, then they will have the means of paying the western States for the products which they furnish for their consumption. Therefore, if the western States are willing, as they seem to be, to protect the mechanic arts and manufactures so as to furnish the means of industry and of earning to the poor of the East, I say I am willing to protect the agricultural products of the West, so that we shall consume them rather than the products of a foreign country; and I believe that on such a policy the country will grow rich instead of poor. That is my position.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to ask gentlemen if they have entirely forgotten that this bill has some reference to revenue?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not forgotten it.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know but that I had forgotten that. [Laughter.] But I wish to make a suggestion in reply to the Senator from Oregon. He objects to a raising of the duties on flour after assenting to a raising of the duty on wheat. If we refuse now to raise the duty on flour, the only effect will be that the farmer will send his grain in here in the shape of flour instead of wheat. It will cheat our bill, and still the Canadians have all the benefit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question on the amendment to the amendment, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. HOWE and Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Norton, Patterson, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Davis, Fessenden, McDougall, Morgan, Poland, and Williams—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Dixon, Fogg, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, Sumner, and Trumbull—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the bill on page 85, section thirteen, line thirty-six, by striking out the words "unfinished, per cent. ad valorem," and inserting "three dollars per ton of thirteen cubic feet;" so as to read:

On grindstones, three dollars per ton of thirteen cubic feet.

This article of grindstones was included with freestone and other stone when the subject was considered in the Committee of the Whole before, and those stones have since been put up. They have been put at four dollars per ton; and now I propose to put grindstones under that, at three dollars per ton. I do not propose to argue the question over again; but I take leave barely to read the statement of one of the gentlemen engaged in this business. I do it with the more freedom because I know from what has been said here that the committee who arranged and settled upon these duties did in a great measure get their information from men who were interested, as they had to do, because those interested in a business are the ones generally, and frequently they are the only ones, who really know all about the business, and if they are honest they must be trusted. All that I can say is, that the gentleman whose statement I propose to read is a gentleman fully acquainted with the business, who has worked at it for a long time, and a gentleman of veracity and truth, and whose word is taken and believed ordinarily in what he says. Here is what he says on this subject:

"Nova Scotia grindstones can be imported into the eastern market at from six to eight dollars per ton less than those of Ohio owing to the difference of freight and labor. They allow us to establish the market price, they selling just enough below us to take the trade, there being no other competition. A higher duty would not raise the price to the consumer as they would lessen their profits to keep the trade, which they can do, and then make a better profit than we can. Advancing the duty would not advance the price in the western market, as our competition at home is too strong for that, it being always our only market, and the West is now flooded with these grindstones. There are in northern Ohio fifty quarries that employ in all over two thousand men. In Michigan there are a number of quarries working by a large number of men, and also large quarries in southern Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Kentucky, and Illinois. If we cannot have a proper protection, fully one third, and perhaps one half of our men, will be compelled to seek other employment, as our market is being cut down by the foreign competition. The quality of our stone, both for grindstones and building purposes, is not probably surpassed in this country, and we have enough to satisfy the markets of the world. The duty at four dollars per ton is about twenty per cent. of the selling price of the Nova Scotia stone. The item of stone is a small matter in comparison with the other stock the manufacturer uses, such as iron, steel, and coal. Small grindstones will cost the farmer about three dollars and will last over a year."

That I suppose will answer the argument that is made that this is going to burden the farmers very much. It appears that their grindstones cost almost nothing. The only competition is in the large article, used I understand in manufacturing establishments, and they come in almost dressed and finished. The bill makes a distinction between finished and unfinished grindstones; but the trouble is that they come in under the head of unfinished grindstones with almost the entire work done upon them before they come here, as this gentleman states. But I do not wish to add anything to his statement of the case. I believe that he has stated the facts in relation to it.

There are more workmen engaged in this business than I supposed there were. He says that there are two thousand men employed in Ohio in this business of getting out these stones. It is a very heavy, large business. Some revenue would be derived from this duty should it be levied, and as they believe some protection would be given to the business and it would continue these laborers in their employment. If it would have that effect I think it would be well to adopt it. I do not believe anybody will be hurt by it. I think the reasoning of this gentleman to show that it would not enhance the price of these stones, either in the eastern or western market, is good. They can produce them in Nova Scotia very much cheaper than we can, and then they bring them in and gauge their prices just under the western prices so as to command the market. I believe the effect of this duty would be to decrease their profits but not to increase the cost of the article.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like the Senator to inform us how a ton of grindstones is ascertained by the cubic feet.

Mr. WADE. Well, sir, that is done by mathematics, I take it, very easily. I have no time to work out the problem now, but I believe I could do it. There is no difficulty about that. I will state that we have already protected building-stone, and these stones are used for building-stones as much as for grindstones. We have already protected building-stones to the amount of four dollars per ton of thirteen cubic feet, and I ask now for three dollars on these. I leave to the Senate to decide what they will do with the question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to reply to one remark made in that paper where the gentleman, whoever he is—Mr. Wilson, I suppose—states that the other people were represented before the committee and he had no chance to be, &c.

Mr. WADE. No; he does not say any such thing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then you said it.

Mr. WADE. No; I did not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There was something of that kind said.

Mr. WADE. I think not. I do not think he mentions anything about that. He strikes right on his subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then the Senator said something about it.

Mr. WADE. No; I did not say one word about it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is either one way or the other; I do not know which. Now, all the evidence there was before the committee I read to the Senate.

Mr. WADE. I will state what I did say, as it occurs to me now. I said I would read a paper from a gentleman engaged in this business, because I had observed from the statements of the committee that they derived much of their information in the same way; that that was the only way they could derive it, as these men engaged in the business were the only ones that knew all about it. That is what I said—nothing more.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We will not dispute about it. All the information the committee had on the subject, besides what they knew themselves, was derived from the two letters which I read to the Senate. From one of the letters I read it appears—and that contradicts one statement in the paper read by the Senator—that these grindstones cost in the Provinces ten dollars per ton, and the rate of duty, ten per cent. ad valorem on the finished article, was one dollar per ton; and this one company that I speak of at one dollar per ton paid $4,500 a year for duty on grindstones. At the rate in this amendment they would pay $13,500 a year duty on grindstones, and it would be in that proportion all through.

Now, sir, there is one thing that this Mr. Wilson stated in his letter to me—I am sorry I have not the letter here; I left it in my room—that he was kept out of the eastern market. I asked him if they did not have the entire control of the western country. He said yes, they did; but they could not get their grindstones down in the eastern market at the rates fixed because freights were so high. I met him afterward and had a conversation with him.

The result simply is this: the object is by getting this heavy duty to bring their grindstones from the western market, where they have the entire control, to the eastern market by imposing this heavy additional duty, so that we must do one thing or the other: pay the heavy additional duty, or we must pay the freight from the western country over the railroads of this very heavy, bulky article. That is the amount of it; and if the Senate think that is just or proper, when these men have the control of the market in the West, the Senate will so vote.

Mr. WADE. The gentleman speaks of this as a very heavy additional duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think so.

Mr. WADE. It is among the lightest duties that have been put upon any article on which you have placed duties. I do not suppose it is over fifteen per cent. There is four dollars per ton on building-stones, which would amount to just about twenty per cent.; but I suppose the increase here would be about fifteen per cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If you strike out the ten per cent., which is about one dollar, and put the duty at three dollars, it will be nearly thirty-three and one third per cent.

Mr. WADE. It is a very light duty and it is analogous to all the duties levied on these things, and it is difficult now to distinguish between the principle I am advocating and that the Senate has already passed upon in regard to this other building-stone.

Mr. FESSENDEN. One of the arguments used in regard to freestone was that it was an article of luxury used in veneering and making fine articles, and all that. This is an article of prime necessity, used by everybody, a very cheap article, while that is an expensive one. This is mere rough stone.

Mr. WADE. No, sir, it is not rough stone, not the way they are brought in. Nearly all the work is done upon them that is found necessary to fit them for the business for which they are desired. I can see no difference between the principle of this and the others, and the duty I place lower than it was fixed on the other. But I did not wish to continue the argument upon it; it is understood by the Senate. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it, as I am afraid a division would not disclose a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Patterson, Sherman, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Yates—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cattell, Cragin, Davis, Fessenden, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Norton, Poland, Ramsey, Sprague, Trumbull, Williams, and Wilson—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Fogg, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Kirkwood, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Sumner—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the bill on page 89, section fifteen, by striking out the word "twenty" in lines six, seven, eight, and nine, and inserting "thirty;" so that the clause will read:

On animals living, namely, on horses, mares, colts, asses, and mules, thirty per cent. ad valorem; on neat cattle, thirty per cent. ad valorem; on sheep, goats, calves, and swine, thirty per cent. ad valorem; on all kinds not otherwise herein provided for, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

I think that the rate imposed upon these animals, as compared with the ad valorem rate upon all other classes of importations, is below the just average; and inasmuch as all these animals are of Canadian production, or else are very high-priced imported animals from abroad, that thirty per cent. ad valorem is not too much, either for revenue or protection. I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—ayes 14, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Creswell, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Kirkwood, Lane, Norton, Poland, Ramsey, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Yates—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cattell, Davis, Fessenden, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Patterson, Sherman, Sprague, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Sumner—22.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have two or three other amendments I should like to offer.

Mr. SPRAGUE. If the Senator will give way, I desire to add a proviso to the section he is upon that I think will commend itself to him and to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my friend will allow me to go through with the amendments that I propose to this section. I propose to amend on page 92, section fifteen, by inserting after line seventy-nine:

On oats, ten cents per bushel.

I think that is an accidental omission in the bill. On a careful search I am unable to find any place in the bill where any impost is laid upon oats. The present rate is ten cents per bushel, and is probably right. It ought to be at least that; and I presume it to be an accidental omission.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the bill touching the subject of lumber. On page 93, section sixteen, line nine, I move to strike out the words "whitewood and" and to insert after the words "basswood," in the same line the words "and pine, valued at not over ten dollars per thousand feet;" so that the clause will read:

On sawed boards, plank, deal, and other lumber of spruce, hemlock, basswood, and pine, and valued at not over ten dollars per thousand feet, one dollar per thousand feet, board measure.

The object of this amendment is to place whitewood, which is a costly wood and enters into the finer descriptions of architecture, under the two dollars a thousand head which follows. That is the first object.

Mr. CHANDLER. You put whitewood in a higher class?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With the high-priced pine in the two-dollar class. I presume no objection will be made to that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I presume the Senator is mistaken in that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very likely; I generally am; but having been, with a great many other Senators, born and brought up in a country where lumber is one of the chief commodities, we have some personal knowledge, not derived from any interested party either, as to the respective classifications and values of lumber. Now, if the object of the committee be to obtain revenue from lumber, whitewood, which sells in the New England markets at from twenty-five to fifty dollars a thousand, ought to be in the higher class, so as to pay the highest rate of duty per thousand feet. It will be remembered that this is a specific duty and not an ad valorem one; and so in order to make the higher-priced and higher-valued commodities pay their proper per cent. we must classify them as they ought to be; so that whitewood ought to be in the class that pays the higher rate of duty. So much for that.

Now, as to pine. Pine by my amendment is inserted in this first class together with the other descriptions of wood, provided the valuation in the foreign market does not exceed ten dollars per thousand feet. There is, as is well known to everybody who is acquainted with the subject, a certain class of pine lumber which in the foreign market and in the home market is very inferior. It is knotty, or shaky, or otherwise unsound, and it is used for the commonest and cheapest purposes of business—the making of fences, the covering of cheap buildings, and of the inferior and humble houses, so to speak, to which other cheap descriptions of lumber are applied. Therefore, it seems to me that all this class which comes in under the dollar a thousand head ought to be limited in its price in the foreign market to ten dollars, and thus to pay ten per cent. by the tax of a dollar a thousand upon it; and all the rest of the commodity that comes under the two dollars per thousand rule will be covered by the increased valuation above ten dollars per thousand.

This is a subject in which my constituents have no other interest than that which is felt by every class of the community, because they are neither great producers nor great consumers of lumber; but from my acquaintance with the subject, and from the acquaintance with the subject which my constituents have who deal in it, and who do not particularly care, so far as they are concerned, what the duty may be, except to have it best for the country, in this view I have proposed this amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I understand, whitewood is a very cheap wood. It is used a great deal for linings for furniture and one thing or another of that sort. I suppose the next move will be, after raising that from the lower class, to put up the duty on furniture, because it costs so much more for whitewood than the furniture will cost more. Pine is considered the most valuable lumber; and in this, as in other tariffs, has been placed in a higher scale than other kinds of wood of that description.

I think it operates a little differently up there in Vermont, where the Senator lives, from the duty on animals. They have got animals enough, but they have not got pine enough, and "for the benefit of the American laborer" they would like to get pine a little cheaper from the Provinces. I cannot account in any other way for the fact that the Senator wants to change the present classification, which is the proper one, as I believe. The Senate will do as it pleases about it. I believe my friends up in Michigan feel a little interest in this matter with regard to the duty on pine and the transfer of it to the two-dollar instead of the one-dollar schedule. I leave the question, therefore, to the honorable Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment again.

The Secretary read the amendment:

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will suggest in addition, before the honorable Senator from Michigan goes on, that as this is to be a matter of valuation we do not know what kind of lumber will come in under the valuation of ten dollars a thousand feet.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the amendment will not be made if pine is put in. I understood the Senator from Vermont to say that he proposed to put whitewood at two dollars a thousand of a certain quality; but I object to inserting pine. I hope the amendment will not be made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say one word in reply to my friend from Maine, who suggests the difficulty as to valuation. I have discovered the secret of making this classification by valuations from the committee itself. In the case of oil paintings, which I take it is quite as difficult to classify in respect to valuation as lumber, they take exactly that rule; that is, upon pictures valued at not exceeding a certain sum they place a certain tax; and upon pictures valued exceeding that sum a certain other tax; and I think that is not an unusual or improper proceeding. The committee did right in that respect; but having done right in that respect, I am sorry to see them turn around and object to a similar proposition based upon the same principle upon the mere ground that it will be difficult to ascertain the classification between one kind and another.

Now, it is well known to the customs officers in the United States, in every port into which lumber is introduced, that there is practically a classification now by value, although there is a simple ad valorem duty; and the first thing that the inspector of lumber does is to see that the lumber is properly classified into the assortments that are sold in the market under one head or another. That classification having been made, then the duty of twenty per cent., as the present law is, is imposed upon it. There is no practical difficulty whatever among practical men in reaching a classification of that description.

Mr. CHANDLER. This valuation of course will be the Canadian valuation. If you come to a classification it will be open for very great fraud. Lumber, as is well known, all costs about the same, and it is then graded for manufacture. Somewhere about one fifth is clear lumber; another portion of it middling clear; another common; another culls. It is shipped usually altogether, and sold altogether, and then assorted by the purchaser, and he fixes its different grades of valuation. The commonest pine lumber is worth in our markets much more than the price fixed in this amendment; but with the Canadian valuation, and with the opportunities for fraud, I am satisfied that this amendment will work injury to the lumber interest. I hope that it will not be adopted in this present form. I should be in favor of putting whitewood of a certain quality into the higher list, but not of putting pine in a lower one.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I think there cannot be any practical difficulty whatever in distinguishing between lumber at ten dollars and lumber valued at over ten dollars. I know there is no practical difficulty when you go to buy it. There are but few kinds of lumber that will come in under the reduced duty. The lowest-priced article sold in the Chicago market is now selling at twenty-one and twenty-two dollars per thousand; and that is only fencing lumber, joists, scantling, and small timber. There is none except that which is selling in the Chicago market at less than thirty dollars and from that to sixty dollars per thousand. There is not, and cannot be, any practical difficulty whatever in making the distinction between lumber worth ten dollars and lumber worth more than ten dollars; and the adoption of this amendment will have a tendency to reduce the price of the lower grades of lumber that enter into the fencing of the West, that every man living in the West is interested in having reduced. I had occasion to say the other day, in a few remarks on this subject, that we used pine boards in fencing our prairies. It is an absolute necessary for us; and it does seem to me strange that we insist upon placing duties upon articles that are thus of prime necessity to men living in our western States at least.

Mr. WILSON. Did you vote to raise the duty on wheat?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Certainly I did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Canadian wheat is not a necessity.

Mr. WILSON. It is a raw material.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. We can raise all the wheat in this country that we consume, and do raise all that is necessary for the consumption of our country and a large surplus besides.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then why do you want a duty of forty cents on it?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. To prevent that of Canada coming into competition with ours. I am told, I do not know how truly, that the extent of pine forests in this country is not very large. We have some in Michigan, some in Wisconsin, some in Maine, perhaps some upon the upper waters of the Susquehanna river. It is not an inexhaustible supply. We were talking about taxing coal the other day, of which we have an inexhaustible supply, a supply that will last for centuries, and gentlemen were unwilling to put a tax upon that to develop that which we had in inexhaustible quantities. The quantities of lumber we have are far from being inexhaustible. They are small compared with the demands of the country; and it does not seem to me to be wisdom to follow such a plan as will exhaust our own forests and compel us to rely in the future entirely upon the forests of Canada.

We have then, I think, two objects to secure by this proposition: to get the lower grades of lumber, the very commonest kinds of lumber, such as are absolutely essential for the development of the prairie country at a low price, and at the same time save to some extent our own forests for future use.

Mr. HOWE. There is no practical difficulty in fixing the valuation of lumber, especially if you leave the Canadian manufacturer to do it. The practical effect will be that all pine lumber manufactured in Canada will be valued at less than ten dollars, and will come in at one dollar duty under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont. Now, one of the great inducements held out to induce the country to repeal the reciprocity treaty was that Canadian lumber was coming in competition with ours. Carrying out the promise of greater protection to our lumber interest, it is now proposed to admit all pine lumber from Canada at one dollar a thousand. That is practically the proposition. That will be the practical effect of it. That does not begin to pay the difference between the cost of manufacture in this country and the cost of manufacture on the other side of the line.

The internal duties that our lumbermen have to pay on their machinery, and the indirect taxes they have to pay, will more than eat up the two dollars that is provided for by the bill as it now stands, and this duty is therefore very light, and I can hardly believe the Senate will be prepared to reduce it, notwithstanding, I suppose, there are but very few of the Senate whose constituents are directly interested in this manufacture. That is true of a great many other manufactures that we have endeavored to take care of in this bill. If one article so important as this, the manufacture of which amounts to about one hundred million dollars annually, is selected out and made a burnt-offering, as it were, for all the rest, it does not look to me like equal justice, and I hope the Senate will not agree to it.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I now propose another amendment on the subject of lumber, which I trust will meet the approbation even of the committee. It is on page 93, section sixteen, line nine, to strike out "spruce, whitewood, and basswood;" so that that clause will read:

On sawed boards, plank, deals, and other lumber of hemlock, one dollar per thousand feet, board measure.

And after line ten to insert the following:

On spruce and basswood, $1 50 per thousand feet, board measure.

On pine, whitewood, ash, and oak, two dollars per thousand feet, board measure.

On black walnut, $2 50 per thousand feet, board measure.

The classification which I have proposed in this amendment is suggested to me by a gentleman engaged in importing lumber, and I think the committee will agree that it increases on the higher-priced and more valuable descriptions of lumber somewhat the rate. The interest of this gentleman, if he has any to injure his country, would be in the opposite direction; and so far as my knowledge goes—I admit it is not equal to that of the committee on the subject of lumber or anything else—it is a classification which is much more appropriate than the one proposed by the committee. It leaves hemlock lumber just as it stands.

Certainly on the northern frontier spruce lumber and basswood bear a much higher rate of value than hemlock does, and therefore it is just that they should pay a somewhat higher rate of duty. Then pine is left by this amendment just as it stands now. Whitewood is put with pine. That subject has already been discussed sufficiently. Ash and oak are also put with pine, and there is no change on those, because under the present amendment of the committee they come in under the head of "other varieties of lumber" at the same rate of two dollars per thousand, while black walnut, which is a much more costly article, and also one of a higher degree of luxury, so to speak, is put at half a dollar a thousand feet more. It does seem to me, if you look at it candidly and with a reasonable desire to classify it correctly, that these classifications ought to be satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question, and declared that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us have a division. This duty is as low as it ought to be.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This amendment makes it higher for the higher-priced lumber.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have got on the importer's side now, and I shall make the same objection to that that I did to the other.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment. We cannot get a quorum in any other way, it seems.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. Since the yeas and nays are called for on this amendment I desire to say a word or two about it. There is very little difference between the proposition made by the Senator from Vermont and the proposition contained in the bill. My own individual interest, the interest of the people of my State, is against this proposition. The State of Ohio, of course, uses a considerable amount of lumber. Fifty years ago the whole of the State was an immense forest, with scarcely a plain or an opening; but now most of the lumber used in the State of Ohio is imported from Michigan.

This change has all been effected in fifty years. We import a great deal from Canada, and therefore the interest of our people is to have cheaper lumber; but at the same time it will be seen that the duty on lumber is lower than on any other article in the whole tariff list. The rate proposed by the Senator from Vermont, to my knowledge, will not exceed five per cent. I do not think it is five per cent. The rate proposed on walnut is $2 50 a thousand, and the market price ranges from thirty-five to fifty dollars a thousand; sometimes seventy-five dollars a thousand. So on ordinary sawed lumber. Clear pine is worth even in Detroit from thirty-five to sixty-five dollars a thousand. It seems to me two dollars a thousand is a very small rate of duty. Although I am perfectly willing to vote for the bill as reported from the committee, yet it seems to me there is so little difference between it and this classification of duty that I feel disposed to vote for it, and perhaps the chairman will be willing to let it go, because the classification is much better. The division into three or four classes is just to correspond to the difference in the value of the various kinds of lumber. I could not understand the proposition made by the Senator a little while ago to put a duty on lumber that is worth less than ten dollars a thousand, because I do not know that lumber of any kind can be bought for ten dollars a thousand. With us on the border, right near the market, the coarsest quality of lumber, even slab lumber, would be worth ten dollars a thousand, and that proposition would not apply to any lumber; but as this amendment is now drawn I think it makes a fair discrimination, and makes a rate of duty not to exceed five per cent. That is certainly not too much.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The amendment as offered does not describe it as sawed lumber at all. It simply means lumber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; you are mistaken about that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to hear it read again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It preserves the first branch of the clause as it stands, and then follows right on.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How would it read?

The SECRETARY. The first branch of the amendment is to strike out the words "spruce, whitewood, and basswood;" so that the clause will read:

On sawed boards, plank, deal, and other lumber of hemlock, one dollar per thousand feet, board measure.

And after line ten to insert:

On spruce and basswood, $1 50 per thousand feet, board measure.

On pine, whitewood, ash, and oak, two dollars per thousand feet, board measure.

On black walnut, $2 50 per thousand feet, board measure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have it described as sawed lumber throughout, so that there shall be no mistake.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that. Following in the same classification, I thought that the words "sawed," &c., would apply to them. If the Senator from Maine has any doubt about that, I will modify the amendment by adding before each one of these subsequent clauses, "on sawed boards, plank, deal, of pine, of spruce, and basswood," so as to attach that description to each one of the classifications. It did not appear to me that it would be open to this construction as it stood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does the Senator leave in the proviso?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, certainly; the proviso attaches to all other varieties of lumber.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The proviso attaches to lumber of every sort.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; I leave it just as it stands, applying to everything.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the whole read as it will stand, if amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

On sawed boards, plank, deals, and other lumber of spruce and basswood, $1 50 per thousand feet, board measure.

On sawed boards, plank, deals, and other lumber of pine, whitewood, ash, and oak, two dollars per thousand feet, board measure.

On sawed boards, plank, deals, and other lumber of black walnut, $2 50 per thousand feet, board measure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The next lines "on all other varieties of lumber" should be retained.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My motion does not apply to the succeeding part. That stands just as it now reads.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll on the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there is no real objection to the amendment, I will ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the withdrawal of the call?

Mr. FESSENDEN. All I can say is this: I suppose this proposition would suit my constituents; it raises the price of lumber, and I live in a lumber State; but the bill as it stands was discussed and considered and finally adopted in the committee, and I feel disposed to act with regard to this clause in good faith as I have upon all other matters upon which the committee agreed, and not to change my position simply because it happens to apply to my own State particularly in this instance. I am obliged, I find, to contend against members of the committee, as well as other gentlemen, and I am pretty much tired of the whole thing.

Mr. SHERMAN. There was no occasion for the last remark of the Senator from Maine. I will do in regard to this matter as I think right. I never committed myself to vote for this particular clause; on the contrary, I expressly disclaimed it in committee, and said that if necessary I should move to increase the duty on lumber; and it is unnecessary for the Senator to make such remarks here to me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no recollection of anything of that sort.

Mr. SHERMAN. I stated it in committee, and I state it now; and even if it were not so, I did not propose to bind myself to adhere in all cases to the action of the committee, not by any means. Where I think they are right I adopt the suggestions made in debate, and shall do so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is at liberty, unquestionably, to do just as he pleases; I do not dispute his perfect right to do it; but it makes it very difficult for me as chairman of the committee to bring in a bill here, upon all the items of which the committee have agreed, with perhaps one or two exceptions where notice was given in committee of a disagreement, and not only be obliged to meet gentlemen on the different sides of the Senate, who have their particular objects to accomplish with regard to particular things, but while I must adhere to it, as chairman of the committee, representing the committee in all cases, to have the different members of the committee at perfect liberty to vary just as they think proper to be right, after the matter has been decided, and leave me to stand alone to defend the action of the committee, and see if I can get the bill through. While I do not dispute the right of Senators to do so, I say it makes it pretty difficult for the chairman. I think the chairman has a right, ordinarily, to the aid of the members of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have only to say this in respect to the committee, and it may as well be said once for all: I entertain the highest respect for the ability, the fidelity, the faithfulness, and the courage of the committee; but I do not think it right for the committee to say that it is not perfectly right and just and fair and fit for the Senate to make any suggestions of amendment to the report of the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not complain at all of the Senator or any other Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There ought to be no feeling about it, because the committee are not necessarily infallible. If the committee were, we might as well dispense with the rest of the Senate. I know it is sometimes said, "What is the use of having a committee unless you follow their report?" I reply by saying, what is the use of having a Senate unless they can review the report of the committee? I think we had better all dismiss any feeling on this subject, because this subject of basswood and whitewood, and so on, is not a very exciting subject, [laughter,] and proceed to consider for a moment, with candor and without any feeling, the precise point which is under consideration.

This classification leaves hemlock just as it stood; and we may dismiss that. It leaves pine just where it stood. There is no occasion to have any quarrel about that. It increases the duty on spruce and basswood fifty cents per thousand feet. Now, I assert (and if I am incorrect I call upon the honorable chairman of the committee to correct me) that the market price, in every place where the two articles are sold of spruce above hemlock is greater than the difference which is here made. It is a higher class lumber. It is used generally for different purposes: for floors, for the finishing of the poorer classes of houses; whereas hemlock is not generally. In addition it may be said that many varieties of basswood are used for the finer descriptions of carriage-making; also in some degree for interior finishing. It can therefore justly bear a higher rate of duty. I am not speaking in the special interest of my constituents when I venture to make the suggestion, but in the interest of the revenue and in the interest of the country. There is no occasion, therefore, for any feeling upon this subject at all.

With the consent of the Senate, in order to expedite proceedings, I will withdraw my call for the yeas and nays, in the hope that upon a division, if one should be demanded, Senators will vote one way or another so as to produce a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the withdrawal of the demand for the yeas and nays?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would rather that the vote should be taken by yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the question will be taken by yeas and nays.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Cowan, Edmunds, Fowler, Frothinghams, Henderson, Howe, Morrill, Poland, Sherman, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Connors, Creswell, Davis, Fessenden, Grimes, Hendricks, Johnson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Norton, Ramsey, Trumbull, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Fogg, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Howard, Lane, Morgan, Nesmith, Nye, Patterson, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Sumner—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments to submit one other amendment, which may possibly meet the same fate with some of the others, but which is nevertheless just. On page 86, section thirteen, line forty-nine, I move to strike out the words "fifty cents" and to insert "one dollar;" and in line fifty to strike out the words "and twenty per cent. ad valorem;" so that the clause will read:

On all other marble, in slab or block, one dollar per cubic foot.

Mr. President, when this subject was under consideration the other day it was stated as an effective argument, by my friend from Maine, against this provision which was agreed upon in the House and sent to us, that the marble interests, as he understood it, of Vermont were not suffering, and he called upon me to state whether they were or not. Not having information of a reliable description upon that subject I would not say that they were, because I felt it to be my duty to the Senate to be careful, as I trust every other Senator is, in stating any matter of fact upon which the Senate is to act, to state it within bounds. Since that time I have had a conversation with an eminent and highly respectable gentleman of that State engaged in the business of quarrying and working statuary marble of the description that comes under this clause that I am seeking to amend, and who, although he has a complete knowledge of the whole subject has no interest in this description of marble.

This gentleman tells me that at the present rates of duty and with the present competition of Italian marble, introduced, as it undoubtedly is, at a false valuation, at only sixty cents or thereabouts per foot instead of sixty-five, as I stated the other day, the marble production of Vermont is absolutely in distress, and that the stock of marble produced of the veined description is accumulated on the hands of the quarrymen and the marble-workmen. He also states, what I stated before, that under the present tariff increasing the rate from the old law the increase of revenue has been very considerable. He also states, what I was in error in stating otherwise the other day, that not only is the revenue increased but under this present increased rate the importation still continues to increase above what it was before.

We have, therefore, this case for the candid consideration of the Senate: here is an interest in which millions of dollars are invested; and a very large number of persons are engaged in labor in making this capital invested productive. The product, this veined marble which comes in competition with the cheaper descriptions of the Italian marble at the present rates, with the present internal revenue tax, with the present price of gold, being nearly one hundred cents lower than it was when the last tariff act was passed in 1864, is unable to compete with this foreign production, and therefore the foreign importer sells his blocks of the veined marble, which comes in competition with this description of which I am now speaking, at a rate which enables him to command the market against the home producer.

Now, upon these facts, which I am willing to vouch for myself, because I know so well the honor and integrity of this gentleman, who lives in the marble district and states the fact to me, I submit it to the candid judgment of the Senate whether it is right when you have increased the duty almost up to the House rates, and increased it on everything above the old law almost, that you should still leave this one single interest just as the present law is. Is it right? Is it just? Is it doing that justice to one description and one class of industry which has been done—and I am glad it has been done—to other classes of industry that needed it?

I was not able to say upon my knowledge the other day that this class of industry did need it in the face of the statement of my friend from Maine, that these gentlemen had more orders than they could fill. As applied to the white or statuary marble, which is superior to the Italian altogether, it is true; because that description of marble is somewhat scarce and therefore the orders for it are as great as can be filled. As to this veined description of marble which makes your table-tops and your wash-stands, and most of your mantels and that sort of thing, the truth is otherwise.

Now, upon this state of facts I think it right that the Senate should extend to this branch of industry the same protection which you have extended to other branches of industry, and to give us that protection which, while it increases your revenue, as your experience so far has shown that this increase of duty does, will protect in some measure this large branch of industry.

Mr. MADDOUGALL. Mr. President, the question now is, whether everybody shall be protected in building and working marble, or whether we shall all be protected ourselves. In that lies the whole problem. We hear now persons constantly asking for protection, from Salem, for instance, from Boston, from Lynn, wanting something about the introduction of coal from the Provinces and a duty on wool. Wool came first. The first question of wool was from the State of the Senator from Vermont, where they made first the whole question about protection. It comes now from some parts of the West, and at last we have got to have wheat protected, and lumber protected, and we here talk about the difference between whitewood and basswood, but without understanding their distinction, as if pine were of the same family. It all amounts simply to this: that all of us in our great country, bordered by the seas and the great lakes, from every locality are looking constantly and continually after our own little local interests. Sir, if we cannot avoid that and lay the base of our system upon the revenue and the needs of the Government with regard to equality, East, West, North, and South, over this great continent, we cannot last.

I did not have the opportunity to express my views about the matter when I had to change my vote yesterday. I misunderstood the pending question about the introduction of coal from the Provinces here, to promote industrial operations in New England, as against all the people of the United States. We have coal and iron and all those things in the mountains and in the valleys throughout the country where I inhabit. But my people ask no protection: they protect themselves. The objection to all these measures that are multiplied upon us until they are almost infinite is that they make us a diverse people instead of being one people. If an interest grows up in Rhode Island connected with the reeling of cotton it must be specially attended to by the Senators and Representatives from that State, and so throughout the country. I believe my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has not asked for protection upon pork, at least not that I remember; but there are gentlemen here asking for the protection of wheat. Suppose that I should ask that gold should be protected in its production, or silver, or copper, or any of the results of our great mining interests, or any of those things that are being now developed on the Pacific coast; what would be thought of it? I should be laughed to scorn; I should not get the approbation of even a small minority; and yet I have the same right to ask that the laborers in the mines of the West, Colorado, Dakota, Idaho, Montana, Oregon, and California, my own State, should be protected, and that interest is more worthy of protection on account of the internal economy and according to the true rules of conducting a Government that wants a money basis for its circulation. This interest is entitled, I will not say to protection, but to promotion, and in any State in Europe would be aided, not protected, advanced by the Government. Those interested in these pursuits have never asked protection. All they have asked is not to be crowded with impositions.

Sir, until we go back to a system of legislation that shall treat North and South and East and West upon the same cardinal principle of equality we shall never have recovered our former status, and shall not be in as healthy a condition as when we passed the tariff law of 1846. My constituents seek no legislation for protection; but if there is any part of the continent of North America that might ask for it with justice it is a people who have developed the wealth that has built your palatial residences in New York, Newport, Boston, and elsewhere. But, sir, they have asked nothing; they have rendered their labor and sent you gold. I am satisfied that the chairman of the Committee on Finance is endeavoring to conduct business properly, but I wish we might get back to some basis governed by a systematic policy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 12, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Connors, Edmunds, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howe, Kirkwood, Poland, Sprague, Wade, and Wilson—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Fessenden, Grimes, Lane, McDougall, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Yates—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cattell, Cragin, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Fogg, Foster, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Patterson, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, and Sumner—25.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move on page 66, in line six hundred and nineteen of section nine, to insert "one and" after "ash;" so as to read:

On soda-ash, one and a half cent per pound.

Soda-ash is an article that goes largely into the consumption of the country. We import an immense quantity of it—eighty thousand tons. I propose to put up the duty from a cent to a cent and a half.

Mr. WILSON. What is it used for?

Mr. CHANDLER. For the manufacture of glass, for the raising of bread, and for a thousand purposes. It is an article of absolute necessity. The constituents of it are salt, sulphate of copper, limestone, and wood; and that is all there is in soda-ash; these are the entire articles used in the composition.

At this time we have one establishment that cost several hundred thousand dollars in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; but we have the materials in the greatest abundance all over the country. Now, in case of a war with Great Britain the price of soda-ash might go up to fifty cents a pound in ten days. At one time there was a prevalence of westerly gales for a few weeks, and the price of soda-ash went up from four or four and half to fifteen cents, and remained there for two months. It is an article of prime necessity, and we have the materials for its manufacture in the greatest abundance and ought to produce it. It is a very cheap article, costing now only four and a half cents a pound. The manufacturers tell us that with a duty of a cent and a half a pound they can produce and will produce within a very short time all that the country requires. This increase of duty will not diminish the use of it to the amount of a pound while we are getting under way. We have salt in the greatest abundance. Sulphate of copper is to-day exported from the Lake Superior region to England to be turned into soda-ash and brought back to Michigan, and there used in the manufacture of glass and for the raising of bread.

It seems to me that if so small a duty as a cent and a half a pound will enable our own manufacturers to produce this enormous quantity, for it is really enormous, that is used in the country, we ought to grant that little protection, and I hope this amendment will prevail. It will increase the revenue immensely and enable us to take the duties off tea and coffee and things that the poor people use.

Beside the articles that I have named for which soda-ash is used, I might mention soap, and I might name many other things in the manufacture of which it is used. It is an article of prime necessity. We now use about eighty thousand tons of it. This establishment in Pennsylvania, which cost some two or three or four hundred thousand dollars, is lying idle for want of a little protection. I think the article is one which should receive protection in this way, and I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know whether this bill has any friends in this body or not. If it has any they had better come to its rescue. I think, judging from the debates and the amendments which have been offered, that this city is full of the representatives of every interest in this nation, and that every night they see somebody, and some gentleman of this Senate suggests this amendment, and another that one, and so on, and every night furnishes material for amendments and food for debate in this body. If the bill is going to pass at all, it seems to me that its friends had better come to a conclusion and pass it. There is no difficulty, so far as the enemies of the bill are concerned, I believe. The little squad on this side, I believe, are unanimous against it, having some little support on the other side; but we do not intend to throw any difficulties in the way of the speedy conclusion of the consideration of the bill; but it would be a matter of comfort if there could be some prospect in the future of getting through. "Variety is the spice of life," and I would like to hear of another bill being taken up in the course of this session. [Laughter.] I think myself the bankrupt bill will be the next bill in order properly: pass this, and then we ought to take up the bankrupt bill. [Laughter.] I think it has a logical connection with this bill. Let us finish this bill, pass it, then pass the bankrupt bill, and then adjourn.

The purpose I had in taking the floor at this time was to make a suggestion to the friends of the bill to show their attachment to it by coming to some results. The supply seems exhaustless; one amendment is considered and voted down; another amendment very much like it is brought up; we have got to discuss that at equal length, and so on. Now, there are some things that can be understood without great elaboration. Take my friend's subject [Mr. WADE] of grindstones. It seems to me one man can see as far into a grindstone as another. A reasonable amount of speaking on the subject of the grindstone would enable us to understand it. I use this merely as an illustration. My friend's argument was exceedingly brief and very clear, and went as far into the grindstone as was possible; but when a thing is reasonably understood I think we might as well vote upon it. I do not intend to abuse the Senate by occupying any more of its time on this bill; I intend to take about two seconds in recording my vote against it.

Mr. CATTELL. I agree most heartily with the Senator from Indiana that both the Senate and the country would be very much rejoiced if the Senate got through with the tariff bill and were engaged in something else; and I most perfectly agree with him, too, that if the result he desires shall be accomplished, namely, the defeat of the bill, the most appropriate thing to pass next would be the bankrupt bill. I have not the slightest doubt that with the views he has expressed and entertains with regard to the bill he wishes its defeat; and if that result should ensue the bill to which he has alluded as coming in such proper connection with this would then be very well in place.

I shall be exceedingly happy, quite as much so as the Senator from Indiana, when the Senate shall have disposed of this question; and I think I express most heartily the sentiments of the chairman of the Finance Committee, who has stood here day after day faithfully attending to what he conceived to be the interests of the country and of the Senate in regard to this bill, when I say that he will also be pleased at that result. It is neither his fault nor the fault of the friends of the bill particularly that it is embarrassed by these long discussions. It is a natural result which must come from a bill of such importance as the one before the Senate—so much of detail—a bill which proposes to sweep out of existence six or seven remnants of tariff bills, and to supply their place with one which, it was hoped, would be considered more perfect.

But I did not rise for the purpose of doing other than objecting to the amendment of my friend from Michigan relative to soda-ash. I have only to say in regard to that that if I could have it so soda-ash would be one of the articles I would admit free of duty, as being the base of a large number of our manufacturing articles, a very large number. I do not think our country is adapted to the manufacture of soda-ash; it has been tried; experiments have been made with it without success in a number of instances, and it has hitherto been free or nearly free. It is now proposed to put on a duty of half a cent a pound, ten dollars a ton, simply as a matter of revenue. That will give us an importation of eighty thousand tons; $800,000 of revenue. I think it is wise and proper to impose a duty of half a cent a pound on this article, which, in the present condition of the country, cannot, I think, be manufactured here even if we impose the proposed duty. Even if it could be, that rate is too high, because the article on the other side in ordinary times is not worth more than a penny or a penny and a half penny. The duty proposed by the committee is for revenue, and I think it ought to be maintained.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the question is put I merely wish to make one observation, not to argue it. There are a great many other things in this bill that are predicated upon the duty on soda-ash and if you change the duty on soda-ash you must necessarily go through with those articles and change the duties on them also. I suppose the Senator from Michigan is prepared to do that, to change them all, to make them square with what they should be, provided this duty is raised from half a cent to a cent and a half.

Mr. SPRAGUE. This article of soda-ash is used in bleaching—used probably more extensively than any one article for that purpose. I hope the duty will not be increased.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIMES. On page 91, in the seventy-fourth line of section fifteen, I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "forty," so as to read "on malt, forty per cent. ad valorem." The Senate yesterday raised the duty on barley from fifteen cents, which the committee reported as the proper rate, to twenty cents a bushel. My amendment is to raise the duty on barley after it shall be converted into malt from thirty to forty per cent., exactly the same increase that has been voted on barley. This amendment becomes necessary in consequence of the amendment made yesterday increasing the duty on barley. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us vote it down.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire simply to say that this is a question whether or not we shall have the barley that is raised in Canada converted into malt on the other side of the Canada line or on our own side. We have already increased the duty on barley to twenty cents, and this amendment carries up the duty on malt exactly in the same proportion that we have carried up the duty on barley.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no need of carrying it up in the same proportion. That argument is a non sequitur entirely. The question is whether thirty per cent. is high enough.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Davis, Edmunds, Grimes, Hendricks, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Ramsey, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, and Yates—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Cragin, Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Morrill, Poland, Williams, and Wilson—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Fogg, Fester, Guthrie, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Patterson, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, and Sumner—25.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, (at twenty minutes past ten o'clock p. m.) I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator will withdraw the motion to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer this amendment, to come at the end of line seventeen of section seven, of page 26:

And all provisions of law requiring any railroad company to purchase railroad iron of American manufacture exclusively are hereby suspended for two years from and after the taking effect of this act.

This amendment was submitted to the Committee on Finance, but it was thought better to present it to the Senate, because it modifies several important laws relating to the Pacific railroad. I do not know that it is necessary to explain it very fully, because it explains itself. By the provisions of the act organizing the Pacific railroad that road and its several branches are required to be made of iron exclusively of American manufacture. They have found it very difficult during the last summer to get that iron in sufficient quantities at reasonable rates. The California branch of the road especially has found it extremely expensive to transport railroad iron from Pennsylvania and other parts of the country around to California; and this exclusion prevents them from entering into ordinary competition, a competition which is but reasonable and fair. The United States has a very large interest in the Pacific railroad; it is interested in its rapid construction; and yet the railroad companies are now compelled to pay largely advanced rates on the iron consumed by them on account of this restriction. There is no reason for the restriction in my judgment, because if these companies purchase the iron abroad, as any other railroad company may do, they have to pay the duty when it is introduced here.

I may state the fact that the Pennsylvania Central Railroad Company and other railroad companies connected with it are now purchasing iron in Wales, and transporting it and laying it down alongside of the very works which are making American bars, and shipping them to Omaha and thence westward for the Pacific railroad. To require a company in which the United States has so large an interest to enter into a competition of this kind is simply suicidal.

It may be said that to repeal these provisions of law would be unreasonable, and therefore I have provided only for their suspension for the next two years, in which time it is impossible for the American works now in operation to supply the enormous demand for railroad iron. There is not a single establishment engaged in rolling railroad iron that is not now employed to its fullest capacity. The great number of railroads now building, and the enormous quantity needed to supply the waste material, will keep every rolling-mill, in my judgment, working to its fullest capacity for two or three years.

I think there is no reason for continuing this restriction, at least during the next two years. Perhaps at the end of that time our rolling-mills may be able to supply the demand at reasonable rates. The present price of railroad iron in Wales is only between five and six pounds per ton, not over thirty dollars. Under these circumstances to require this railroad in which we are so much interested to pay the present rates, which I believe are from eighty to ninety dollars, is, it seems to me, unreasonable.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Creswell, Davis, Fowler, Henderson, Kirkwood, Ramsey, Willey, Wilson, and Yates—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howe, Lane, Morrill, Poland, Sherman, Trumbull, Wade, and Williams—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Cattell, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fogg, Foster, Grimes, Guthrie, Harris, Howard, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Patterson, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, and Van Winkle—26.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) The Senate refuses to adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. Let us have a vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call for the yeas and nays appears to show the fact that no quorum is present.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Some other Senators have come in since.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire to have my name recorded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The result having been announced, the vote of the Senator from California cannot be received except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose his appearance makes a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the name of the Senator from California will be recorded in the negative on the motion to adjourn. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. RAMSEY. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think the repeal of so important a law as the one proposed to be repealed should take place in a bill like this. My impression is that I was opposed to the original measure which is proposed to be repealed, but the repeal ought not to be in this bill. We have not time properly to consider the question nor to review the considerations that influenced Congress in the adoption of that policy. I have some recollection, though not very distinct, that there were certain privileges granted to the Pacific road in the iron and coal mines along the route that had something to do with this particular provision; but I am not able to-night to refresh my memory about it. I think the proposition is of sufficient importance to come before the Senate as an independent bill. I cannot vote for it as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is the proper place to put this provision if we intend to suspend these laws or repeal them. There is no other bill likely to pass at this session to which it would properly apply. The objection that it is out of place I think is not well taken. This bill levies duties on railroad iron. There is a provision in two or three railroad laws limiting corporations created by Congress to the purchase of American iron. This bill is designed to raise revenue from duties on railroad iron. It seems to me no place could be better for such an amendment. The question is perfectly understood, and I do not want to debate it to-night. I am willing to take the vote without discussion.

Mr. CONNESS. I beg to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that it is very evident that it is unwise to come to a vote to-night on this proposition. As has been stated, it is a pretty important one. I do not know just now how I shall vote upon it myself. There is probably less than a quorum in the Senate at the present time.

Mr. SHERMAN. If any Senator wants to offer any other amendment, I am willing to withdraw this now and offer it in the morning.

Mr. CONNESS. It is very evident to my mind that we shall not be able to proceed any further to-night. I voted against an adjournment before, but I do not think there is any more business left in the Senate to-night. That is my impression; and I move therefore that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 12, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Creswell, Davis, Henderson, Howe, Kirkwood, Ramsey, Sprague, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wilson—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Cowan, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Lane, McDougall, Morrill, Poland, Sherman, Trumbull, Wade, and Williams—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Dixon, Doolittle, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Guthrie, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Patterson, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, Sumner, and Yates—24.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understood that the Senator from Ohio proposed to withdraw it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there are other amendments to be offered I am willing to withdraw it to-night and renew it to-morrow. I do not wish to break up the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought we were staying here to-night in order to finish the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we are going to sit it out I insist on my amendment, otherwise I am willing to withdraw it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How can it be withdrawn after the yeas and nays have been ordered?

Mr. CONNESS. I hope it will be withdrawn to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Conness, Davis, Henderson, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morrill, Sherman, Trumbull, Williams, and Yates—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, McDougall, Poland, Ramsey, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Dixon, Doolittle, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Guthrie, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Patterson, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, and Sumner—23.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire to give notice that I shall move to reconsider the vote just taken. I voted in the negative in order to be able to move a reconsideration. I now give notice of that motion.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On page 57 I move to insert "of seven and a half pounds" after "gallon" in line four hundred and fourteen of section nine. This amendment is in reference to linseed oil. A gallon of that oil is seven and a half pounds, and it is sold constantly and uniformly by weight. The reason is because the bulk of it is very much affected by the temperature, so that a cask will at noon hold two or three gallons more than it will at night. Great errors occur in gauging it. I have consulted with the commissioner on this subject, and this amendment meets his approval.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose that they have custom-house regulations upon this subject, and that will apply if they are now in force. Why not leave them alone?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The custom-house regulation is to have some process by which they gauge the quantity of gallons there are in a cask, and errors are constantly occurring.

Mr. SHERMAN. You are introducing here, without inquiring, a new system and a new mode of gauging, which is a departure from the general rule. It seems to me rather an unwise step. What assurance has the Senator that seven and a half pounds constitute a gallon? We have never heard of that before. The gentleman who appeared before us never made the representation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This is my information from gentlemen with whom I am well acquainted, who are extensively engaged in this business, and I have no doubt of its correctness. Of course, if there should be any deception in this matter it can be corrected before the bill becomes a law; it has to pass through the other House. I am perfectly satisfied, or I would not make the motion.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he has any information in reference to the weight of the different kinds of oil mentioned in this clause. I apprehend that when he speaks of oil being seven and a half pounds to the gallon he refers to flaxseed oil simply. Is it not true that hempseed oil is less in weight? I presume the flaxseed oil is heavier. If there is any difference in the weight of these oils, it would not be proper to apply this rule to all the oils mentioned here.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There may be something in the objection of the Senator which had not occurred to me. My amendment was intended to relate to linseed oil. I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I now move on page 30 to strike out from line one hundred and twenty-seven to line one hundred and thirty-two inclusive of section seven, and in lieu thereof to insert:

On chains, trace-chains, halter-chains, and fence-chains made of wire or rods not less than three eighths of an inch in diameter, two and a half cents per pound; less than three eighths of an inch in diameter and not less than No. 9 wire gauge, six cents per pound; less than No. 9 wire gauge, eight cents per pound.

Persons engaged in making these chains and cables referred to in this amendment have expressed great dissatisfaction with this bill. This amendment was placed in my hands by the commissioner, I believe written by him, stating that it would be satisfactory; and I offer it that a vote may be taken upon it, without making any remarks about it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope it will not be adopted. It is a very great increase, as I understand it, from the proposition of the committee, which was protective in its character.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Persons employed in manufacturing these chains and cables assure me that under the present tariff they cannot carry on their business; and the object of this amendment is to have an increase of tariff. That is the purpose of it; and instead of that being an objection to the amendment, it is its very merit. The increase has been adjusted by the approval of the commissioner in a manner satisfactory to him.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I dare say that the Senator from New Jersey has his information from very respectable sources, but it is from persons who are interested in this pursuit. I am astonished, sir, that this country is threatened with such an entire ruin of all her interests if this bill does not pass. If we take the assurances made here by Senators, based upon information they receive from parties interested in particular pursuits, there is not a single pursuit of importance in this country that is going to survive two weeks the defeat of this bill.

Now, with the greatest respect in the world to the Senator's information, I do not believe a word of it. I do not believe this country is in any such imminent danger. These pursuits have gone on, and men invested their money with a full understanding of the business long before they had such a system of protection as existing laws furnish, and they have made money. But, sir, what is to compensate the men who are to use these chains? What increase does the farmer get when he has to pay one third more for the chains he uses, by a policy that cuts him off from a foreign market and makes him look exclusively to a home market? None in the world.

Mr. KIRKWOOD, [at eleven o'clock and five minutes.] I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 6, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Creswell, Howe, Kirkwood, Sprague, and Van Winkle—6.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Frothinghuyssen, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Lane, McDougall, Poland, Sherman, Trumbull, Wade, Wiley, and Williams—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fogg, Fowler, Grimes, Guthrie, Howard, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Patterson, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, Sumner, Wilson, and Yates—29.

The President pro tempore. There is not a quorum voting.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 30, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REVENUE-CUTTER SERVICE.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask leave to report from the Committee on Commerce a bill which the chairman of that committee [Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois] was to have reported had he not been compelled to leave in consequence of sickness. It is a short bill and one that it is very necessary should be passed. I hope there will be no objection to it.

No objection was made, and Mr. ELIOT accordingly reported back House bill No. 800, to fix the compensation of the officers of the revenue-cutter service, and for other purposes.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time:

The bill was read at length. The first section provides that from and after the 31st day of December, 1866, the compensation of the officers of the revenue-cutter service shall be at the following rates: Duty pay—Captains, $2,500 per annum; first lieutenants and chief engineers, $1,800 per annum; second lieutenants and first assistant engineers, $1,500 per annum; third lieutenants and second assistant engineers, $1,200 per annum. Pay on leave of absence or while waiting orders—Captains, $1,800 per annum; first lieutenants and chief engineers, $1,500 per annum; second lieutenants and first assistant engineers, $1,200 per annum; third lieutenants and second assistant engineers, $900 per annum.

The second section provides that from and after the 31st day of December, 1866, each officer of the revenue-cutter service while on duty shall be entitled to one Navy ration per day.

The third section provides that, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the provisions of this act during the last half of the current fiscal year and during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, the sum of $133,400 is hereby appropriated for the expenses of the revenue-cutter service out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FORT RILEY RESERVATION.

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON, the Committee on the Public Lands were discharged from the further consideration of a petition of citizens of western Kansas in relation to the Fort Riley reservation; and the same was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

POTAWATAMIE INDIAN CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. KASSON, the Committee on Appropriations were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial and papers of a delegation of Potawatamie Indians, asking an appropriation of $164,584 75 due them from stipulations of various treaties made between them and the United States, and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

BRANCH OF BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

On motion of Mr. KOONTZ, Senate bill No. 507, to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the extension, construction, and use by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company of a railroad from between Knoxville and Monocacy Junction into and within the District of Columbia," approved July 25, 1866, was taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. KOONTZ. I ask that the committee have leave to report this bill at any time.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. KOONTZ. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection; for the reason that this is a measure of great importance, not only to Washington city, but to the whole country.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KOONTZ] that he can accomplish the object he is aiming at by simply entering a motion to reconsider the reference.

Mr. KOONTZ. Very well; I submit that motion.

The motion to reconsider was entered upon the Journal.

CAPTAIN DANIEL C. TREWHITT.

Mr. STOKES. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for consideration at this time a joint resolution for the relief of Captain Daniel C. Trehwhitt, of Tennessee, and late of the United States Army. I will in a few words state the reason for this bill. Captain Trehwhitt was placed upon the staff of one of the generals of the Union Army; his name was submitted to the President, who sent the nomination to the Senate, and the Senate put upon the nomination the proper indorsement, and he was duly commissioned. But the paymaster refused to pay him unless he could produce the paper from the Senate. That he could not do, for he had lost it, with all his other papers, at the battle of Stone river. Now, he served faithfully, and I think he should be paid for his services.

Mr. ALLISON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STOKES] that the case to which he refers is fully covered by a general law now upon the statute-books. I do not recollect the precise provisions of that law, but I am certain it covers this case.

Mr. STOKES. Very well; I will not press this matter until I can examine the law to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] refers.

CONSTANCE BATEMAN AND OTHERS.

On motion of Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Appropriations were discharged from the further consideration of papers relating to the claim of Constance Bateman, Augustine De Caidry, and Julia L. Wamaling, and the same were referred to the Committee of Claims.

RIGHTS OF NATURALIZED CITIZENS.

Mr. COOK. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution, and I may state that I propose to have referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs certain memorials on the same subject. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of an assertion by Congress of the principle that naturalization by the United States of a native-born subject of any other State exempts such naturalized citizen from the performance of military service under any foreign Government so long as he does not voluntarily renounce the rights of a citizen of the United States.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

FLORA MEIGS.

Mr. HUMPHREY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Flora Meigs; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

COMMON SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to establish a system of common schools for the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the select committee on the subject, and ordered to be printed.

PROCEEDINGS IN FEDERAL COURTS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to conform the rules, practice, and pleading in the courts of the United States to the laws of the respective States; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRACTICE IN SUPREME COURT.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask that the bill which I introduced some time ago in reference to the practice of the Supreme Court may be ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

CIVIL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order the consideration of bill of the House No. 889, to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof; on which Mr. HALE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. To accommodate gentlemen who are interested in the business of the morning hour I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed till after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

INSPECTION OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order during the morning hour the bill (S. No. 204) entitled "An act to provide for an annual inspection of Indian affairs, and for other purposes," on which Mr. WINDOM was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] to permit me now to offer the substitute of which I gave notice yesterday.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to allowing the substitute to be voted on.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That from and after the 1st day of July, 1867, the Secretary of War shall exercise the supervisory and appellate powers, and possess the jurisdiction now exercised and possessed by the Secretary of the Interior in relation to all the acts of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and shall sign all requisitions for the advance or payment of money out of the Treasury on estimates or accounts, subject to the same adjustment or control now exercised on similar estimates or accounts by the Auditors and Comptrollers of the Treasury, or either of them.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall be authorized, whenever in his opinion it shall promote the economy and efficiency of the Indian service, to establish convenient departments and districts for the proper administration of the duties now imposed by law on the superintendents of Indian affairs and upon agents and sub-agents, and to substitute for such superintendents and agents officers of the Army of the United States, who shall be designated for that purpose, and who shall then become charged with all the duties now imposed by law upon the superintendents and agents thus superseded, and without additional compensation therefor. The Secretary of War shall also detail an officer not below the rank of brigadier general to fill the office and discharge the duties of Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Officers of the Army designated to perform the duties of commissioner, superintendent, agent, or sub-agent shall not be required to give the bonds now required of civil appointees, but shall be responsible for any neglect or maladministration according to the Rules and Articles of War.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all contracts for transportation connected with the Indian service shall hereafter be made in the same manner and at the same time provided for transportation for the use of the Army.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall be authorized to withhold all special licenses from traders, and under regulations to be by him prescribed, to provide the times and places at which all traders complying therewith may present themselves for bargain, barter, and exchange with the several Indian tribes, according to the laws of the United States regulating the same.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Speaker, regarding this as the most important bill with reference to our Indian affairs that has been introduced since I have been in Congress, and as better calculated to remedy existing evils than any other, I desire to state very briefly what it is and how it comes before the House.

In 1865 a commission was appointed for the purpose of making an investigation into our Indian affairs. That commission traveled over a large part of the Indian country and gathered a vast amount of information in reference to this subject. They heard the complaints of Indian chiefs and of all others who were aggrieved in any way in Indian matters. They investigated numerous charges of fraud, and sought as the result of their labors to devise some way of preventing a recurrence of the evils complained of. In order to do this the committee have reported the bill now before the House. Its purpose is to provide boards of inspection of high character, who shall visit the Indian tribes once every year for the purpose of correcting any evils which may exist among them.

I have yielded the floor to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to submit an amendment to the bill, not because I favor the amendment, but because I desire the gentleman may have an opportunity fairly to test the question before the House. He endeavors by this amendment to place the management of Indian affairs under the entire control of the War Department, and insists if it shall be adopted there will be no necessity for the bill under consideration.

This bill, which I had the honor to introduce from the Committee on Indian Affairs yesterday, received the unanimous sanction of the joint select committee to which I referred a moment since. I believe it had also the unanimous recommendation of the Committee on Indian Affairs in the Senate, and that it passed the Senate by a large majority. The Committee on Indian Affairs in this House have given it a thorough examination and are almost unanimously in favor of its passage. So it has received the sanction of one select committee, the sanction of the committee in the Senate, and the sanction of a very large majority of the Indian Committee in the House.

Mr. Speaker, as I said a moment ago, the purpose is to provide five boards of inspection, who shall be clothed with the power to supervise and inspect the entire Indian system. They are to be appointed in such way as the committee deem will most surely secure the selection of the best men that can be found. The difficulty with our Indian system now is not perhaps so much in the system itself as in the fact that the best men are not always selected to execute it. Agents are sent a thousand miles into the interior among the Rocky mountains and the vast plains of the West. They feel they are beyond the reach of civilization almost; that nobody will be sent to investigate their conduct, and in too many instances I am aware they unlawfully make money out of their position. The object of this bill is to send a commission clothed with full power to investigate their transactions and to suspend or remove them from office if necessary. It is a commission to be composed of the best men that can be found, and who shall have full authority to examine their books and everything appertaining to their official conduct.

This commission is to be appointed in the following manner: one commissioner selected at large from the mass of the people by the President of the United States; another from such persons as may be recommended by several religious denominations of the country at their annual conferences. The third is to be detailed from the Army. It will scarcely be doubted by the gentleman from Ohio, who wishes to place the whole bureau under the War Department, that the Secretary of War will appoint an honest and competent man. Then we will have a guarantee that at least one member of the board will be a gentleman of high character.

Can it be believed, Mr. Speaker, that the religious denominations of the country at their annual conferences will select any other than the best men for this duty?

A MEMBER. Which church is to make the selection?

Mr. WINDOM. My friend asks me which church is to make the selection. Under this bill all the churches which hold annual conferences or conventions are to make their recommendation, and the President is to make his selection from such persons as may be thus recommended. There are to be five appointed each year.

A MEMBER. By this President?

Mr. WINDOM. I suppose if the bill passes now they will be appointed by this President. But it cannot be that men of the high character of those who compose these annual conferences and conventions will recommend any other than pure, straightforward, high-minded men for this position; so that we may be sure of securing on each one of these boards at least two men who will be above suspicion, above indulging in any of the frauds now charged against the Indian system. As to the honesty of the other member of the board, who may be a politician, the House can judge as well as myself.

Mr. COOK. I would like to ask if any provision has been made for those religious societies that have no general annual meeting.

Mr. WINDOM. There is no such provision.

Mr. COOK. Some of the largest religious denominations in the United States I believe have no general convention of any sort—for instance the Baptists and Congregationalists.

Mr. WINDOM. I am not aware that any provision is made in the bill to meet that case. I will yield to the gentleman to offer an amendment for that purpose.

The special committee of investigation to whom I have referred have submitted a report upon this bill. As it is very brief and states succinctly the grounds upon which this bill is based, I desire to have a portion of it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The purpose of the bill is to provide boards of high character, and to organize them in such a manner and to clothe them with such powers as to supervise and inspect the whole administration of Indian affairs in its threefold character—civil, military, and educational.

To the position of chief of this board there should be appointed an assistant commissioner, with a salary sufficient to command the services of a man of character and great ability, whose whole time is to be devoted to this important work.

One of the board is to be an officer of the regular Army, to be assigned by the Secretary of War; (it is believed that he would be an officer of high standing in the Army;) and the third is to be selected from among those persons who may be named by the great religious conventions or bodies of the United States. It is impossible to believe that these great bodies could name any other than a man of high character and great ability. Such a board not organized upon political grounds at all, and possessing, as they will, the important powers conferred in the third section of this bill, will, in the judgment of the committee, do more to secure the faithful administration of Indian affairs than any other measure which has been suggested.

The assistant commissioner will report to the Secretary of the Interior; the officer of the Army to the Secretary of War; and the third will report, not only to the Government, but to that religious body which may have recommended his appointment. Thus the treatment of the Indians by the civil authorities, by the military authorities, and by their teachers and missionaries will be subject to constant inspection and supervision.

It is urged that the expenses of these boards will be considerable; but in comparison with the greater economy and efficiency their supervision would secure that expense will be comparatively trifling.

Such boards charged with the duty, among other things, to preserve amity, will doubtless sometimes save the Government from unnecessary and expensive Indian wars.

As an instance bearing upon this point, when that portion of the committee who were charged with the duty of inquiring into the condition of Indian affairs in Kansas, New Mexico, and Colorado, arrived at Fort Larned, they found that the officer there in command had just issued an order to his troops to cross the Arkansas, going south into an Indian territory where not a single white man lived, to make war upon the Camanches, a most powerful tribe, which roams over all that region from the Arkansas to Mexico. Your committee felt that such an expedition would of necessity bring on a long war with that tribe; that it was wholly unnecessary, and they took the responsibility of advising General McCook, a member of the staff of General Pope, who accompanied them, to countermand that order until he could communicate with General Pope at St. Louis. The order was countermanded: the troops then in motion were recalled, and thus by the mere presence and advice of the committee a war was avoided with the Camanches, which, had it once begun, would not have been prosecuted to a successful termination without an expenditure of $20,000,000.

Your committee took the testimony, among others, of Colonel Ford, then in command at Fort Larned, upon this subject. He says, speaking of the Camanches: "From the best information I can get, there are about seven thousand warriors well mounted, some on fleet Texan horses. On horseback they are the finest skirmishers I ever saw. How large a force, mounted and infantry, would be required to defend the Santa Fe road and wage a successful war against the Indians south of the Arkansas? It would require at least ten thousand men; four thousand constantly in the field, well mounted; the line of defense to extend from Fort Lyon to Fort Riley, and south about three hundred miles. All supplies would have to come from the States. Contract price for corn delivered at this point was $5 25 per bushel." With corn at this enormous price, and hay and wood and all supplies in proportion, the expense of such an Indian war is beyond belief. By many it was estimated that such a war would have required at least ten thousand men, and a war of two or three years' duration, to make it successful, with an expenditure of more than thirty million dollars.

It is believed that such boards of inspection, thus organized and composed of the men who should be appointed to fill them, would save the country from many useless wars with the Indians, and secure in all branches of the Indian service greater efficiency and fidelity. If such boards should cost the Government $150,000 annually, and should avert but one Indian war in ten years, still, upon the score of economy alone, the Government would be repaid five hundred per cent.

Mr. WINDOM. Having shown how these boards are to be organized, I desire to call attention for a single moment to what their duties are, and to ask the candid consideration of this House as to whether, if such duties are faithfully performed, it will not correct the evils of the system?

Under the third section they are required to visit all of these tribes once every year; to examine into their condition; to hear the complaints of every one who may be in any way injured or aggrieved by our agents and officers; to examine the books of accounts, the manner of doing business of the superintendents and agents in their respective districts. They are not to go among them as mere inspectors to report to somebody else, but they are to be clothed with authority when they find any one cheating or swindling to at once suspend or remove him from his office, and they are to ascertain this by the examination of witnesses to whom they are authorized to administer oaths.

Now, sir, I believe that when these gentlemen, who are a thousand miles from your capital among the savages on the plains, and who now feel that they are never to be supervised by anybody, remember that a commission such as this, clothed with powers such as these, composed of men selected as these will be, is to visit them once every year and inspect all their transactions, they will be very careful to give no cause of complaint.

But how does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] propose to prevent this difficulty? by simply turning over the Indians to the War Department. A man may be dishonest now who is an Indian agent; but if, under the system of the gentleman from Ohio, you put shoulder-straps upon his shoulders, with stars or eagles, or even a couple of bars, he becomes entirely honest, and will not steal from an Indian.

Now, we have had some experience in the last four years. I have as much faith as the gentleman in those who are engaged in the military service; but I have no faith that to put stars and bars on men's shoulders will make them more honest than they are now. But even if the gentleman's system should prevail, and Congress should propose to turn over this management of the Indians to the War Department, we shall have the same necessity for the bill that we have to-day.

I want to call the attention of the House to this point: whether the agents to whom the interests of these Indians are committed shall be under the control of the Interior or the War Department they will still need that supervision which this bill provides for them. We have treaties with a great many of these tribes; and whether it is the Secretary of the Interior or the Secretary of War who is to pay out the appropriations at the time they need them, it will be superintended by this commission just as much in the one case as in the other.

It is proposed to provide in this bill for a sort of civil jurisdiction among the Indians, and the agent is authorized to exercise the power of a court commissioner to the extent that our civil laws may be practically extended over them. There will be somebody to execute those laws when we have thus given to the agent among the Indians the power to punish them, and send a commission every year to inquire into his action.

I ask the House if it is not worth while to try this remedy and see if the great evils which now exist in our Indian department cannot be removed. Now, as I have often said here, I know that in any matter that is presented in reference to the Indians, there are those who suspect there is steal in it somewhere. And I do not wonder, for the system of managing our Indian affairs has been a bad one and productive of much evil. I ask every gentleman who believes that there are those evils to give this measure a fair and honest trial. I will not take up further time, but will yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. While I trust the discussion of so important a subject will not be closed even within an hour, without reference to the possibility of that I shall submit very briefly the reasons which have induced the Committee on Military Affairs—for it is from that committee this substitute I offer comes, the subject having been referred to them—to offer it as a substitute for the bill reported from the Indian Committee. The bill which I offer as a substitute is a bill with amendments added to it by the Committee on Military Affairs, introduced into the House by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] originally, and referred to the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman. It presents now, being offered as a substitute, the antagonism between the two schemes of managing the Indians, consisting on the one hand in leaving their management to the Interior Department, or on the other of transferring it to the Department of War.

The gentleman has explained his bill to the House. It is simple; it is no doubt designed to correct the evils which he and I and all of us admit exist in the present management of our Indian affairs, evils which result from the dishonest practices of the Indian agents. Perhaps, sir, I used too strong language yesterday when I spoke of the Indian Bureau as constituting little better than a nest of thieves. But I do not understand that the gentleman who represents the Indian Committee differs with me on that point. The original bill was introduced for the purpose of breaking up a system that entitles us to characterize it in that way.

When I speak of this matter, I want to be understood as not referring particularly to the management of Indian affairs here in Washington, but to all the ramifications of wrong, injustice, oppression, and fraud which run through the various Indian agencies and employes of the Government in any way having charge of or dealing with the Indians.

Now, sir, what is the mode of correction which is proposed by the bill of the Committee on Indian Affairs? It is proposed to appoint five boards of inspection for five inspection districts, these boards to consist each of three men, to be appointed by the President. One of each board is to be an officer detailed from the Army; so far admitting the justice of our claim that the Army should be represented in this matter. Another member of each board is to be selected directly by the President. The third member of each board is to be selected from those recommended by the churches of this country for the purposes or if they fail to make such recommendations the President is to select the third member as in the case of the other civilians, directly without the intervention of the church.

Now, the first objection to this plan is that it is too cumbersome a piece of machinery. There are to be five inspection boards, consisting of three inspectors each, and comprising fifteen members in all, who are to be scattered all over the country and to be charged with investigating and reporting upon the frauds practiced in relation to Indian affairs, so that they may be guarded against.

Another objection is the mixture of the various interests in the plan, which interests, if not antagonistic to each other, certainly will hardly tend to promote harmonious action. You are to have the politician, the priest, and the warrior upon each board of inspectors. I suppose the politician is to wink at the contracts to be made for cheating the Indians; the priest is to pray for the Indian who is to be cheated, and the warrior is to kill him if he does not behave himself. [Laughter.]

However that may be, I take it for granted that the churches in the selection of persons to be recommended to the President will ordinarily recommend those of their own cloth. This is the first instance, I believe, in which any legislation has been attempted in this country to bring the church and State so completely together. A man's eligibility for appointment to one of these places is to depend upon his getting the indorsement of some of the churches of this country. As a matter of course each church will recommend one of its own faith; and equally as a matter of course we shall have a great many candidates made eligible by these recommendations, from among whom the President must make his selections. A squabble will take place, therefore, between the Quaker, the Methodist, the Presbyterian, the Baptist, and the Episcopalian at the very initiation of the attempt to organize one of these boards.

But putting all that out of the question there is another difficulty, the want of economy in this proposed system of inspection. In the first place, these fifteen inspectors are to be appointed. Five of them, it may be said, will not have any salary paid to them in consequence of their performing the duty of inspectors, because they are already officers of the Army, and are to act without additional compensation. But the other two members of each board are to be paid $4,000 each per annum. Then there are to be ten inspectors at salaries of $4,000 each, making $40,000 a year for the inspectors alone. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] has said, and said very properly, that if his scheme be a good one the $40,000 paid for these inspectors will be as nothing compared with the millions which will be saved by it. I concede to that argument all the strength there may be in it. But I meet it by saying that not only is the expense of $40,000 added by the appointment of these inspectors under this system, and which is contrasted with the proposition to turn this whole matter over to the military supervision of the War Department, but all the Indian agents are to be paid as they are now paid, each of them a yearly salary. Now, by committing this matter to the supervision of the War Department you save not only the $40,000 for the inspectors, but all the salaries to be paid to the agents and sub-agents, for all these duties will be performed by officers of the Army, according to my substitute, without any additional compensation whatever.

But I think the gentleman is mistaken, upon the score of economy, in supposing that his plan proposes only $40,000 additional annual expenditure. I think $300 is added to the salary of each Indian agent; they now receive $1,500 a year each, whereas his bill proposes to raise the salary to $1,800 a year each.

Mr. KASSON. And mileage.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir; and mileage. This, however, is in my opinion a matter entirely subordinate and inferior to the great question as to which Department shall have charge of the Indian Bureau, and which Department, if intrusted with it, will probably conduct its affairs with not only most economy, but most security to the Indian, and most protection of both the Indians and the Government from all manner of fraud.

The gentleman says that if the management of Indian affairs be turned over to the military we have no security that men with straps or stars on their shoulders will be any more honest than civilians. Mr. Speaker, we have this security: if we turn this bureau over to the military we turn it over to a class of men who receive no additional compensation for the performance of this duty, who perform it as they perform any other duty to which they may be assigned by the head of the Department or the head of the Army; who perform it, not under official bonds, which are ordinarily, I think, of very little consequence in any case, but under the still stronger security imposed upon them by the fact that their commissions are at stake and a trial by court-martial will be the consequence if they do anything which may fairly be construed into a violation of the law or a disregard of their proper obligations in connection with this duty imposed upon them.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] have expired.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the previous question will not be sustained, that we may have an opportunity to discuss this question fully.

Mr. WINDOM. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HART] ten minutes.

Mr. RAYMOND. With the permission of my colleague, [Mr. HART,] I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] a question. This is a subject of very great importance, and of course it is one on which the House desires all possible information needed for the formation of a correct judgment. I have understood—whether from proper authority or not, I do not know—that a communication has been addressed to the committee of which the gentleman from Ohio is chairman, from the general of the Army or from some of his staff specially qualified to give information and express valuable views on this point. I should be glad if the gentleman from Ohio would inform the House whether this is so or not. If there be such a communication, it would be proper that it should be printed for the examination of the House before action is taken on this bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am very happy to have the opportunity to answer that question. I have here a communication made in the shape of a report to the General-in-Chief of the Army by Colonel Parker of his staff, who was himself an Indian chief, and who is a man of remarkable intelligence and sagacity. His report covers this whole matter, referring not only to the transfer of this bureau to the military department, but also to the plan which should be pursued by the United States for preserving peace with the Indians and making the whole management of their affairs under the control of the United States: just what it ought to be. I had intended to ask that this document should be printed; and I had hoped there would be an opportunity to have it printed before the discussion of this bill. The report is a most able and indeed an exhaustive paper on this subject. It comes to the Committee on Military Affairs from the General-in-Chief and the Secretary of War, with a request that special attention may be given to it. I should be very glad to have it read now.

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot yield sufficient time to have it read. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HART.]

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that I find myself compelled to differ with my colleague on the committee [Mr. WINDOM] in regard to the bill now before the House. I was not present during the consideration of the bill by the committee at this session of Congress; but during the last session it was discussed by the committee; and on a cursory examination of the bill I was disposed to oppose it, although I am in favor of any system which may in any way elevate the condition of the Indians or reform the gross and flagrant abuses which evidently prevail in the conduct of Indian affairs. There is much in the bill I commend, but I regard the measure as entirely too superficial in its character. I do not think it will accomplish the object the committee had in view. The bill provides for a commission of fifteen men to supervise and inspect the whole Indian country, covering territory larger in extent than the rest of the United States. They can by no possibility visit the Indians more than once a year. And when they do visit them what object can be accomplished? They will go about much as an annual board of visitation or board of trustees. They will find the Indians set up in their best bib and tucker by the several Indian agents; and when the visitation is over they will make a fine white-washing report. Then when they are gone the Indian agents will relapse into the system of treatment which is to-day so much condemned.

How much light can such a commission throw upon the matter by an annual visit? They are surrounded by influences which are interested in deceiving them. The Indian is dependent upon the traders, and the traders seal their lips against making complaints to the commission. The commission will go away with their eyes blinded and with no just comprehension of the condition of the Indians they have visited.

I do not like the composition of the commission. It is a most extraordinary manner in which to make up a commission. There are to be five military men, five politicians, and five churchmen. I suppose the five churchmen are put on for the reason, it is taken for granted, that the politicians are little above total depravity, and it is necessary these men should be there to lighten the rest of the mass.

But there is a possibility even those who might be selected from all the churches would condescend to steal. They have to certify the accounts of all the Indian traders. The whole thing rests in their hands. But who are to supervise this commission? No one in any case whatever. It is a position of greater value to a corrupt man than any in this Government. A corrupt man on that commission can make anywhere from fifty to one hundred thousand dollars per annum if he may choose to take advantage of it.

I do not believe because a man is in the Army he cannot be an honorable man. I think we have as much right to look for a gentleman, an honorable man, in the Army, as outside of it. There is this in addition: the safeguards thrown around the officer of the Army are double those of civilians. He is not only subject to military regulations, to the rules and regulations of war which are very stringent in their character, but he is amenable to the law to which any civil appointee is amenable.

How are the churches to select? There are only five commissioners to be selected from forty different denominations. Hardshell Baptists will oppose Congregationalists, and vice versa; Roman Catholics will oppose Protestants, and the Protestants will oppose Roman Catholics. How are they going to get together to make the selection?

What assurance, then, will you have you will get better officers in that way? There is a possibility a man may be a politician and a member of church, though such things may be rare. There is a possibility the men in the Army who may be detailed by the Secretary of War may also be members of church. So far, then, we may do away with the necessity of the churches of the country designating members of this commission. Is it not a reflection upon our character that pure men, upright men, cannot be obtained without having a convention of the churches?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am decidedly in favor of any plan that will look toward a thorough reformation in the Indian department. It is possible that men in the Army when they come to administer the affairs of the Indian department will be guilty of the same corruption we have seen everywhere in that department in the past. This will be a new broom that will sweep clean at least for a while. For the next year it will be an improvement on the present condition of things.

I object to the bill on the ground of economy. Here we have salaries of $4,000 each for these commissioners, and salaries of $1,800 each for I do not know how many agents.

It is a well-known fact, Mr. Speaker, that one half of these disturbances among the Indians are produced by these very Indian agents and employés of the Government, in order that the Indians may be brought here to negotiate new treaties and that new sources of complaint may in that way be brought out. It is notorious that Indians are induced to massacre whites and foment other disturbances for the purpose of having this Government negotiate treaties in order that new annuities may be paid to the Indians, which, as soon as they are paid, are divided among these voracious men. Now we need some measure which will remedy this evil. We need an army, in my opinion, directly in contact with the agents, so that the Indians may see before him the power of the General Government, and may feel that he is in more direct communication with this Government when he finds himself dealing with the various officers of the Government. When he sees the insignia of office, the shoulder strap of the military officer, he will feel that the power of the Government is close at hand.

I trust the House will favor the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] because I believe it will be a reform in the right direction. I would be glad to see some commission appointed or anything done that will ameliorate the condition of the Indian tribes; but I believe the best plan is to transfer the charge of the whole business to the War Department.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Minnesota allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. WINDOM. I want to ascertain first what the House desire to do with the bill. The morning hour has nearly expired. I have been requested by one or two gentlemen to make it a special order. I wish to know whether if that is done it will be likely to be reached.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are four special orders on the Calendar made during the first week in the session and not yet reached, having been interrupted by privileged reports and matters introduced by unanimous consent. There are now two measures pending of the latter character: the bill in relation to the civil service and the bounty bill. After all these were out of the way this would come up, unless some committee authorized to report at any time intervenes, or some motion of privilege, or some of the bills should be brought up now pending on motions to reconsider.

Mr. KASSON. There is hardly a special order before the House of so much consequence to the Treasury as this bill.

The SPEAKER. There is one special order, the bill in regard to removals from office, reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS;] one in relation to the counting of illegal presidential votes, reported by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa;] another in relation to banking, reported by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER,] and one or two others, that have all been pending since the first week of the session, and not yet reached or decided.

Mr. KASSON. I think the importance of this will justify us in making it a special order for an evening session.

Mr. ROSS. I would like to be allowed a short time on this bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I will yield if we go on with it to-day, after the previous question is ordered. In order to test the wishes of the House on this subject I propose to call the previous question now, and if the House prefer to continue the discussion of this question in the morning, of course they will sustain it.

Mr. DONNELLY. Before the previous question is seconded I desire to offer an amendment to the third section of the original bill by adding the following:

And in case of the suspension of an Indian agent, the duties of his office, until the confirmation or rejection of his successor by the Senate, shall be performed by the assistant agent, or in case there shall be no such assistant, then by the chief clerk of such agent; and it shall be the duty of the President to transmit to the Senate, with the nomination of his successor, a statement of the causes of such suspension.

Mr. CHANLER. I desire to offer the following amendment to come in at the close of the one just offered:

That the rights, privileges, and franchises conveyed to the black men within the States and Territories of the United States by established law thereof be, and hereby are, given and secured to all the Indians having the protection of this Government under existing laws.

That all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this section be and are hereby repealed.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, I will say, outside of the question now in debate, that this is a matter of very great importance, and one that ought to be fully investigated before the House, and that the two hours—the one previous to the call of the previous question and the one that follows it—are not sufficient time to make such investigation. I should hope that we could have some evening set apart, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] to debate this question and gather together the information that is within our reach in regard to it.

I will state I am particularly anxious about this matter, for I was a member of the special committee appointed in 1864 to make this investigation, and I will state a large amount of information was gathered by that committee and furnished to the House, and it ought to have been printed by this time. It might help us to some light upon this subject.

I agree that it is a lamentable condition of things that in a nation such as we claim to be a matter of this kind cannot be properly attended to without such a vast amount of stealing as has been spoken of here, and which cannot be denied. And I must say I was thoroughly convinced, after several months' examination in a portion of this Indian Territory, that there has been an amount of stealing that would startle the public mind if fully developed.

I will say in regard to the bill introduced by the Committee on Indian Affairs providing for a change in the administration of this department, or for its transfer to another branch of the Government, that I think the House ought to approve of it and pass it. It has been devised, examined, and got up under the supervision of a special committee, and meets with its approval. We have believed that under all the circumstances this was the only way to check the vast swindle which has been carried on in this Indian department of the Government for years past.

Either one thing or the other should be done by Congress. Either it ought to pass this bill leaving the Indian department where it now is, but giving some security for the check of this swindling, or else let the whole system pass into other hands. I am not prepared to say that this change will be for the better. I should be inclined to favor the passage of the bill without any change. But I would like to hear from those who are in favor of this policy a little more and to obtain some insight into it. That is the reason why I am in favor of fixing some time for more debate, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] With the permission of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] I will move a reconsideration of the vote by which the main question was ordered, and then move to make this bill a special order.

Mr. WINDOM. I cannot agree to that. It will never be reached.

Mr. HIGBY. Then I will not make the motion. I will leave it to the chairman. But one hour is worth nothing in the investigation of a question like this.

Mr. SCHENCK. With the permission of the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] I will state that for one, having charge of this subject, I have been taken somewhat by surprise. I ought to have known better, but I was under the impression that the bill would go over after the previous question was seconded until to-morrow. And I have a very great desire that a paper upon this subject from Colonel Parker, which contains more and— with due deference to every gentleman who has spoken, including myself—is better stated than it has been stated by any of us, shall be printed and laid before us for consideration. I hope, therefore, that the motion to reconsider whatever disposition may be afterward made of the subject, whether it comes up to-morrow morning or some evening is fixed for its consideration—will prevail; so that we may get this information, as well as the information referred to by the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY,] who was on the committee appointed to examine this subject. This will aid us in arriving at a correct conclusion.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to make one word of explanation. I stated distinctly, when I called the previous question, that I did it for the purpose of testing the wishes of the House upon this subject; that if they desired to continue this discussion during the morning hour, they would of course vote down the call for the previous question. Neither the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] nor any other gentleman arose in his place and objected to the call for the previous question; and the previous question was therefore sustained.

Now, I should much prefer that this subject should be further discussed; but I do not see how it can be done without losing the bill. I am willing to have the vote reconsidered by which the main question was ordered, provided that will leave the bill open to consideration during the morning hour. But I would rather have unanimous consent to have it assigned for a certain evening, when it can be fully discussed.

Mr. HIGBY. Then I would suggest that we set apart to-morrow evening, and in the mean time the report of Colonel Parker can be printed.

Mr. WINDOM. Do not say to-morrow evening; say this evening.

Mr. HIGBY. I want time to have this report printed.

Mr. WINDOM. Then say Friday evening.

Mr. HIGBY. Very well; I will say Friday evening.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I must object to that, unless it is understood that no vote will be taken upon that evening.

The SPEAKER. The proposition then will be to assign Friday evening for debate on this bill, the vote to be taken the next morning after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. KASSON. I do not think that arrangement will accomplish the result desired. If gentlemen do not come here and listen to the debate upon that evening and hear the facts then to be developed, the arrangement will fail entirely of its purpose.

Mr. HIGBY. Then I will simply move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The effect of that motion, if adopted, will be to leave this bill open for debate during the morning hour of each day; and no committee will be able to report during the morning hour until this bill shall have been disposed of.

The motion of Mr. HIGBY was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that the report of Colonel Parker, together with communications from General Grant and the War Department upon this subject, be printed for the use of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now expired, and this bill will go over till the morning hour of to-morrow.

CODIFYING CUSTOMS LAWS.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to extend the time for codifying the laws relating to customs authorized by the joint resolution approved July 26, 1866; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read at length. It provides for extending the time for codifying the laws relating to customs for a period of three months after the expiration of the present session of Congress.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MICHAEL McCANN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 9th instant, transmitting papers in the case of Michael McCann's claim for the service of the bark Charles Warner; which was referred to the Committee of Claims; and ordered to be printed.

ST. CLAIR FLATS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in reply to a resolution of the House of January 15, 1867, General Cram's report on the St. Clair flats; which, on motion of Mr. TROWBRIDGE, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

TEXAS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in reply to a resolution of the House of January 14, 1867, relative to the condition of affairs in Texas; which was referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEYS OF THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of December 20, 1866, the report of the Chief of Engineers, with General Warren's report of the surveys of the Upper Mississippi and its tributaries; which, on motion of Mr. DONNELLY, was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

DISBURSEMENTS OF NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in compliance with the act of August 26, 1846, a statement of expenditures from the contingent fund during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

DISBURSEMENTS OF STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting, in compliance with the act of August 25, 1842, a statement of disbursements from the contingent fund during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS asked and obtained leave of absence till next Friday.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I now move to proceed to business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. STEVENS. I would inquire of the gentleman if there is any particular bill upon the Speaker's table which he desires to reach. I want to get through the appropriation bills in Committee of the Whole. If the gentleman wants to reach any particular bill I hope he will confine his motion to that bill.

Mr. INGERSOLL. There are several bills there which require action now, but there is one bill in particular I desire to reach, amending the registry law of the District of Columbia.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] is in order at any time at the conclusion of the morning hour, notwithstanding a special order may have been assigned for that time, but the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] takes the precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, because it is a motion to suspend the rule under which he is entitled to make the motion.

Mr. STEVENS. Before the question is put on my motion to go into Committee of the Whole I desire to move that all general debate upon the consular and diplomatic bill, the Military Academy bill, and the fortification bill terminate in ten minutes after their consideration is begun in the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being taken upon the motion of Mr. STEVENS that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the regular appropriation bill, there were—ayes 46, noes 31; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER, under the rules, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. STEVENS and INGERSOLL.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 67, noes 30.

So the motion was agreed to.

CONSULAR, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 904, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes.

The pending question was upon the amendment of Mr. STEVENS as amended on motion of Mr. HALE, reading as follows:

In line eleven, strike out the word "Rome;" and at the end of line fifteen insert the following:

Provided, That no moneys hereby or otherwise appropriated shall be paid for the support of the United States legation at Rome, or for the future expenses of any such legation.

Mr. DODGE. I have received several communications in regard to the action of the Government at Rome.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. DODGE. I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I have received this morning from a friend who is spending the winter in Rome a letter which I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read:

The Clerk read as follows:

ROME, January 4, 1867.

For six years and more the Scotch Presbyterians have had a station here. Indeed they have two: one the Free Church, the other the Church of Scotland. The chaplains have held service every Sabbath in their own apartments with a few of their countrymen, rarely more than thirty or forty being present. No sign or notice is allowed to be put up on the house to designate it as the place of worship. The stranger finds it advertised at his hotel, and coming to the number, prows up the dark, stone stairways to some very upper chamber; and there, as secretly as the early Christians in the catacombs of Rome or in the dens and caves of the earth, he finds a few like-minded, who pray and hear the Word. These services disturb no one and the authorities do not notice them. They affect to ignore their existence altogether. On Saturday, December 29, 1866, the chaplains of these two missions were served with the following warning, issued by the British consul. I copy it verbatim from the original now before me:

BRITISH CONSULATE AT ROME,
December 29, 1866.

SIR: It is my official duty to inform you that Monsignore Randi, Governor of Rome, has just communicated to me that you are holding illegal religious meetings in your house, which you must know are prohibited by the Roman law, and that you have thus placed yourself in the power of the Inquisition, both for arrest and imprisonment. But as the Monsignore permits me to give you this notice I would seriously advise that you at once put an end to these innovations, and that you visit Monsignore Randi at Monte Citorio and assure him that you will never again repeat these illegal acts. I hope in this way you may possibly suspend your exile which is now hanging over you.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,
JOSEPH SEVERN, British Consul.

To REV. JAMES LEWIS.

January 5, 1867.

Worse than our worst fears, the blow has been struck, and Presbyterians are ordered to desist from public worship in the Papal dominions!

Yesterday Mr. Odo Russell, as the acting representative of the British Government, had an interview with Cardinal Antonelli, the Prime Minister of the Pope. Mr. Russell expressed his surprise on being informed that an order had been issued requiring the Scottish Presbyterians to desist from the worship they have been holding in the private houses of their pastors. He asked the Cardinal if he had been aware that these meetings had been held for six years past, without objection being made by any one, and if there was any special reason why they were now so summarily suppressed. The Cardinal intimated in reply that the Government had for many years past been under restraint; but now that foreign protection was removed, they would administer it according to their own views of duty; that one English chapel was open, and that was enough for the English in Rome.

Mr. Russell said that the Cardinal must be aware that the suppression of Presbyterian worship would produce a great excitement in Britain, and the action of the Pontifical Government would be loudly condemned. This suggestion, however, produced no effect, and Mr. Russell remarked that the Americans are allowed to have a place of worship. To this the Cardinal answered that the Government would attend to that also. Finding argument and remonstrance vain, Mr. Russell retired and reported the result of his interview. The two places of worship are, therefore, peremptorily closed. There is, therefore, no place in Rome or in the Papal dominions, where Presbyterians are permitted to meet for divine worship.

Paul could preach two whole years in his own house in Pagan Rome. But Papal Rome forbids the Protestant follower of the Apostle to worship God with his friends in his own hired house. Pagan Rome was more tolerant in Paul's day than Papal Rome is ours.

IRENEUS.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DODGE. I am not through. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I renew the amendment and yield the floor to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DODGE. I take the floor and ask the Clerk to read a letter I have received this morning, which will give the House a better view than I can myself.

The Clerk read as follows:

"We are curious to see the issue of this affair. If the report be confirmed; if the Pope has issued such an order, and if our minister submits to it, then is our country disgraced. Why should we suffer ourselves thus to be turned out of Rome? It has come to a pretty pass if the minister of the United States of America cannot have worship in his own private house. Next he will be forbidden to say his prayers inside the city walls! To all such interference with private liberty there is but one answer—a firm and dignified remonstrance. If that fail, then let our minister pack up his trunks and turn his back on Rome. It would be no great loss either to Rome or to his own country. Our embassy to the Pope is a ridiculous absurdity. What do we want of a minister to Rome? England has none and gets along as well as we with our potty embassy. There might have been some excuse for it a few years ago, when the Papal States were quite a respectable Power. But since the late revolutions those States have shrunk away almost to nothing, and the little remainder is just ready to be swallowed by the kingdom of Italy. To keep up an embassy at such a shadow of a court is a farce. We have no more need of a minister to the Pope of Rome than the Khan of Tartary. Let him pack his trunks and come away, and if there is any need of diplomatic interference we are very sure that our excellent minister at Florence, Mr. George P. Marsh, will interfere promptly and to some effect. "But if he remains, we trust our Government will insist inflexibly on his right to have Protestant worship in his own house. A little firmness here will have an excellent effect. It is time that the Pope heard a voice from this side of the Atlantic which may bring him to his senses, like the warning of stern old Oliver Cromwell, who put an end to Papal persecution by a message that 'if favor were not shown to the people of God, the thunder of British cannon should be heard in the castle of St. Angelo.'"

Mr. HALE. Upon whose authority does the gentlemen depend for his statements?

Mr. DODGE. Dr. Prime, a friend of mine, who is spending the winter in Rome. This is directly from him.

Mr. HALE. I supposed it to be an anonymous communication.

Mr. DODGE. In addition I simply wish to say, as we are all in favor of economy and restricting our expenses, I hope this item will be stricken out.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that Rome has no minister resident here. She does not condescend to send one here, and I do not know any reason why we should send one there.

Mr. KASSON. I withdraw the amendment for the purpose of making another proposition, although I have not had time to submit it to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I move to add:

No money hereby or otherwise appropriated shall be paid for the support of the American legation at Rome.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will say "any American legation at Rome" instead of "the American legation at Rome" I will accept it.

Mr. KASSON. I do not object to that.

Mr. BANKS. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. If the Committee on Appropriations do not wish to make an appropriation for the minister at Rome I would not resist the action they propose perhaps; but I do object to the House acting on the information which has been presented here. We have been notified by the Secretary of State that the Government has no official information from our minister at Rome upon the subject presented to the House. The letter read at the Clerk's desk relates to the positions of Englishmen at Rome, not to that of American citizens; and we are under no obligations to take up their complaints and right their wrongs.

If we propose to sever our diplomatic relations with Rome altogether, we ought to have some facts to justify our action. If there are any such complaints of American citizens, and the committee proposes for that, I make no objection. But I submit to gentlemen that we ought to have something from our officers more substantial than these newspaper reports before we by legislative act deprive American citizens and the American Government of a representative at the Court of Rome.

The suggestion, which is a very natural one perhaps, one which may weigh with gentlemen, made in the paper which has been read here, that the Roman States are weak, is undoubtedly very true; but, sir, the Italian Government, which is ultimately to control those States in all secular matters, does not find in this weakness a sufficient reason for withdrawing her diplomatic representatives. It still maintains its diplomatic relations with the Roman Government. That Rome has no minister in the United States is true, but that is an omission to which we ought not to object. In the diplomatic relations existing between independent nations, originated chiefly in Catholic countries, they concede to the minister of the Roman Government precedence in all matters. If, therefore, Rome should send a minister here, he would be entitled to precedence over other ministers representing all other Governments. Our people would certainly object to it, and therefore we have no reason to complain if Rome does not send a minister to us.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman allow me to say that I understand that is simply a rule of etiquette and nothing more?

Mr. BANKS. It is the rule wherever Rome is represented, and it is sometimes unrepresented in Protestant countries for that reason. In Catholic countries it is less objectionable than it would be here.

Mr. KASSON. They put it on the score of the supremacy of the church.

Mr. BANKS. I do not object if gentlemen desire to omit the appropriation for the representative at Rome; but I trust the House will not take that decisive action proposed in the amendment moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and repeated in a different form by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] putting our action in exactly the same words that we have applied to a representative of this Government who, we think, has committed an offense against the people and the Government he represents. I would not have our action expressed in that form. If we do not like to make an appropriation for the diplomatic representative of our country at Rome, let us wait until we have some official information as to the facts affecting the rights of American citizens, and then take such action as the dignity of the Government may demand.

Mr. STEVENS. If I understood the letter correctly, all Presbyterian worship within the walls of Rome is prohibited. Now, sir, there is a letter here from Dr. Adams which has not been read, which states that Mr. King has hired a chapel outside of the walls of Rome, according to the order of the Pope.

Mr. BANKS. Dr. Adams says that if the statements be true, then the American minister has not done his duty. But it does not appear that they are true. The letter read at the desk refers to the interests of British subjects.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to add at the end of the proviso moved by the gentleman from Iowa the words "after the 30th day of June, 1867." In my judgment we ought not to have had a ministerial representative at the Court of Rome for the last ten years. There is no possible reason why we should have one there. It is a useless expenditure, merely to provide a place for some one who wants the position. If there were any important matters of business requiring one there I should be the last to object; but under the circumstances as now presented, with the present territory of the Pope confined to the city of Rome, I certainly think that a mere consul is all we require. I deem the present an opportune moment for withholding any appropriation that calls for the continuance of a minister at that place, and I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to oppose the amendment. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that this proposition should again be pressed this morning, in the absence, as has been stated by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of all official information on the subject. It strikes me that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Dodge,] who has had read at the desk a letter and an extract from a newspaper, is exceedingly anxious to become a champion on this particular question. Now, the letter which he has had read at the desk is a letter referring entirely to English Protestant citizens residing at Rome; and I think the Government of Great Britain will be fully competent to take care of its own interests at that Court without the assistance of the able gentleman from New York, [Mr. Dodge.]

We, so far as we are concerned, have received no official intelligence whatever from our minister at Rome in relation to this question. And it does seem to me this committee is showing a disposition to be rather swift to find some difficulties and objection to the action of our minister at Rome and the conduct of the Papal Government. I submit that the course most consistent with the dignity of this Government and of the American people is to wait until we receive official information as to the action of the Government at Rome and of our own minister. That information has been asked for, but has not yet come to hand. We do not know, as a matter of fact, whether there has been an order issued to the American minister requesting that Protestant churches be removed outside the limits of the city of Rome. We have no reliable information on the subject. Although while I should regret that there should exist any cause in the minds of the authorities of Rome deemed by them sufficient to induce such an order, yet we all know and must admit that we have no right to regulate the internal concerns of the Government at Rome. It is true, we have the right to withdraw our minister from that Court or from any other Court when, in the opinion of our Government, it should be done; but this attempt to do it, in this indirect manner, by cutting off the appropriation to pay the salary of the minister, without a single word of official information, seems to me to be going a great distance in order to attack the Papal Government, and to do an act, to say the least, distasteful to the great body of Catholics in this country.

This Government is not a Protestant Government, neither is it a Catholic Government. No particular religion is recognized or established by the Constitution; all are free before the law and the Constitution. But it is not so in every Government. It is not so in Great Britain. It is not so in Russia. It is not so in many other Governments. We desire that every person should be left free to worship the Almighty according to the dictates of his own conscience. And the first great example of this religious toleration in this country was set by the Catholics of Maryland as early as 1649, when they declared this great principle by statute. But this is a question with which this House to-day has nothing to do. Most fortunate for the people of this country Congress has no control over the question of religious belief. But as to this proposed amendment, I repeat we have no reliable information as to the existence of the order complained of or of the reasons which induced it, if really it has been made as reported by the newspapers.

Mr. MORRILL. Is there any more reason for our having a minister at Rome than for our having one at Patagonia?

Mr. FINCK. I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes to which I am limited in this debate, to discuss the necessity of having a minister at Rome. What I object to now is the manner gentlemen propose to take for getting rid of the minister at that Court. But I will say in answer to the gentleman that there is just as much necessity for having a minister at Rome to-day as there was when he was first appointed.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was upon Mr. MORRILL's amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I will modify my amendment, so as to make it read "after the close of the present year."

Mr. MORRILL. All I desire is that this minister shall not be required to return home at once; but I will agree to the modification.

Mr. BIDWELL. I move pro forma to amend the amendment by striking out the letter "e" at the end of the word Rome, and inserting instead the letter "a;" so that it will read "Roma."

Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances I do not think we ought to be hasty in removing the American legation at Rome. I am in favor of extending the influence and authority of this Government every way in every locality where it can be done with advantage to the country. The American people now go to almost all parts of the globe; but there is no place which Americans visit more than Rome. Every one who goes to Europe makes it a point to visit that city on account of its great historical interest and the associations that attach to it.

Now, whether or not Rome is represented in this country, I believe that the United States ought to be adequately represented at Rome, not on account of any respect which we owe to the Papal Government, but for the purpose of extending protection to those of our own citizens who visit that city. And as we have no official information upon this subject, I hope we will not withdraw the support to the American legation there.

Mr. MORRILL. I would ask the gentleman if a consul would not be as fully competent to give protection to our citizens in Rome as a minister is?

Mr. BIDWELL. If that be the case, then we should send a consul and not a minister to the Courts of St. James and at Paris. But I think a minister has a power and a dignity that do not attach to a consul. I was in Rome during the past summer; and although I did not, for want of time, call upon the American minister there, yet when I passed by the residence and saw the American flag waving over it, and knew that there was an American minister there, I felt a degree of security and a degree of pride in the power of my country that I should not have felt if we had had no legation there. I hope, therefore, that we will not take the action proposed in this matter, for I think there is no necessity for it.

Mr. HILL obtained the floor.

Mr. BANKS. Will the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILL] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise, for the purpose of closing debate.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HILL. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] for a few moments.

Mr. BANKS. I desire to state a reason why this mission to Rome should not now be discontinued. The reasons given for the discontinuance urged by those who favor the proposition might have been assigned as well five years ago as to-day. The reason why we should not at this moment discontinue our mission to Rome is that the Papal Government is in peril, and also it has rendered to this Government essential service in regard to a most important matter.

Upon the first suggestion through our minister the Roman Government expressed entire willingness to give up a person who is alleged to have been concerned in the conspiracy to assassinate President Lincoln, and to give him up without imposing any condition whatever upon us. There is not probably another Government in all Europe which would have so acted under the same circumstances. We had no extradition treaty with the Roman States; we had made no formal demand for the surrender of the criminal; but the Roman authorities acceded to the simple request of our minister, without imposing any condition whatever. But when application was made to the Italian Government by our minister, Mr. Marsh, for the surrender of the assassin, the authorities stated distinctly that they would not surrender him except upon the condition that he should not be subjected to capital punishment if found guilty.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

Mr. HILL. I cannot yield further, but will resume the floor. As I came in after a temporary absence from the Hall, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DODGE] was occupying the floor and having some correspondence read by the Clerk. From all that I have been able to learn, I gather that the only reason for now terminating the existing relations between this Government and Rome, the only ground upon which it is sought to terminate those relations, is on account of some religious difficulties. It seems to me that is a new ground upon which to take action of this character in relation to any foreign nation. Each nation, of course, regulates all these matters of religion for itself. Whether or not there are sufficient grounds for terminating the existing relations between this Government and Rome, or abolishing the office of minister at Rome, it seems to me that it is improper to do it upon the ground which has been assigned here and in this indirect way.

The complaint is that a certain church has not been permitted to exercise its ordinary religious worship within the city of Rome. Now, I am in favor of the utmost freedom of religious worship, but I do insist that it is not in accordance with the principles, theory, or practice of this Government hitherto to interfere in this indirect way any more than to interfere more directly with the religious practices of another Government. If Rome has in any way violated the rights of American citizens, or has committed any indignity upon American citizens, then inflict the proper punishment upon her for her act. But if it is only a regulation of religious worship which she has established, and to which all are alike subject, I insist that it is not in accordance with our principles or our practice to take any action upon the subject; therefore I must oppose the amendment at least upon the ground upon which it is placed here.

If it is to be placed upon some other ground, if, as suggested by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] there is no occasion for a minister at Rome, and a consul will do as well, then let our action be based upon that ground, so that no erroneous impression in regard to the matter will go abroad.

Mr. BIDWELL. I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CHANLER. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that this whole subject has assumed somewhat of a religious character, and that the question of church and state has been drawn into this debate. I am sorry too that I have been referred to as having in any way attempted to characterize this Government as being specially for one side or the other in religious matters. All I mean to say on that head is, that inasmuch as our Government is based upon the people, and as the statistical returns show a majority of our population to entertain the Protestant faith, in that light only do I mean to assert that this is a Protestant Government. So far as my personal views are concerned I adhere to no doctrine which would favor a union of church and State, and I have no purpose whatever to introduce religious questions into a political discussion.

But, sir, this is a practical question, and as such it has been treated with force and appropriateness by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRILL,] who has said that this position of minister at Rome is but an ornamental post of no advantage to the people of this country. That argument, sir, in common with a whole line of argument introduced by those who are trying to stop our appropriations for the mission at Rome, applies with equal force to nearly the whole list of diplomatic positions; and I am in favor of abolishing a large majority, if not all, of these diplomatic posts, which are absorbing to an immense amount the proceeds of the people's labor without affording them any return.

I believe, sir, that a well-organized consular system based upon the commercial interests of our country will be better administered, and more consistent with our form of government. I recognize in the system of diplomatic appointment a subtle and indirect subserviency to the European form of government, which, from its monarchical character, is altogether unsuited to be a model for the enlightened Government of a free Republic. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. BANKS] has in his remarks this morning given us the key to that whole system. The Court of Rome refuses to send an ambassador here—why? Because that ambassador would not hold his position here with that dignity which, under the rules and precedents of European diplomacy, is accorded to the representative of the Church of Rome in all countries where the Catholic religion is predominant. That is the secret of the European system, governed as it is, by the strictest rules of diplomatic etiquette; and it will be found in the history of our diplomatic relations that in order to meet those obstacles of etiquette we have absolutely been obliged to change the order of our organization in diplomatic affairs and waive if not surrender the principles of our Government.

Sir, I desire that our country shall withdraw from participation in the system of European diplomacy. We should have nothing whatever to do with it. Our principle is that of the common interest of our people in governmental affairs. I wonder, however, that in assailing the Pontiff of the Church of Rome gentlemen have not applied the same line of argument to the sovereign to whom we send on large salaries the supple-kneed representatives of this Government—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRILL. I desire merely to remind the House of what I believe is the fact, that the Pope is the only foreign Power that formally recognized the southern confederacy.

Several MEMBERS. That is true.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from Vermont will allow me to say that he is mistaken in that statement.

Mr. MORRILL. What other Power gave that confederacy recognition?

Mr. BANKS. I do not say that any other Power did; but I deny that the Pope did so. The facts are these: Jeff. Davis wrote to the Pope, introducing to him some persons; and the Pope made a reply in which he addressed Davis by the same title by which he had subscribed himself. I will not be positive; but I think there is no act on record which shows that the Roman Government recognized the southern confederacy in any other way than this.

Mr. GRINNELL. Did he not express sympathy for the rebel government?

Mr. BANKS. I think not. My belief is the correspondence will show that he merely expressed a desire for peace.

Mr. STEVENS. What title did he address him by?

Mr. BANKS. The same as he signed himself.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BANKS. I ask that the correspondence of Mr. King with the Papal Government in reference to the surrender of Surratt be read.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing this debate. The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill of the House No. 904, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled Senate bill No. 69, to provide for the payment of pensions; when the Speaker signed the same.

CONSULAR, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that all debate on the pending section of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill in the Committee of the Whole, together with all the amendments thereto, be closed in five minutes after the consideration of the same shall be resumed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering House bill No. 904, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.)

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, as I am responsible for this debate in having moved the amendment yesterday, it may perhaps be proper for me to submit one or two remarks before the vote is taken. I wish to say that in moving the amendment I was not influenced by the intolerance of the Papal Government, although it might add force to the argument in favor of the discontinuance of our present mission to that Court. The same objection might be taken to any further continuance of our diplomatic relations with Peru on account of the refusal of funeral rites to a deceased British minister.

It was on the score of the political insignificance of the Papal Government that I moved the amendment. I never could understand the reason for this mission. There might have been some ground for it when the Pope exercised temporal jurisdiction over all of the Roman States, but he has not any such jurisdiction now, being "sealed up," as I believe he is, in the city of Rome by the kingdom of Italy. And if he is confined to the city of Rome our relations there now are purely spiritual and not diplomatic; not political, unless intended for the benefit of a particular church and a particular party. And looking at it in this aspect it would be just as reasonable to send an ambassador to the Court of the Grand Lama of Tibet, who, perhaps, has more devotees than the head of the Court of Rome; or it might be more sensible to send an ambassador to the little republic of San Marino in Italy, which remains as an oasis in that great waste, as I may call it.

I do not know what may be the occupation of our minister at Rome unless it be of a spiritual character. He may turn it, perhaps, into a pastoral life, as I presume he has nothing to do, and he may feel tempted to say with the shepherd in the first Eclogue of Virgil, who waked the sylvan echoes with his pipes:

"Et quæ fuit Roman tibi causa videndi?"

I ask what has this Government to do at Rome? Nothing that I can see.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN stated that under the order of the House the debate was exhausted.

Mr. KASSON's substitute was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment as amended.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes, 51, noes 48.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salary of the interpreter of legation to Japan, $2,500.

Mr. CHANLER. I move to strike that item out. The same line of argument that has been used in regard to the conduct of the Roman Government applies to that of Japan.

Mr. KASSON. I raise the point of order, that debate is closed by order of the House on the entire section.

The CHAIRMAN. By the usage of the committee each paragraph has been heretofore treated as a section, and the Chair will so rule unless the committee direct otherwise.

Mr. KASSON. The chairman of the committee on Appropriations made his motion in the form he did for the express purpose of embracing the whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The custom has been to treat each paragraph as a section.

Mr. CHANLER. My object in rising is to draw the attention of the House to the fact that if they intend to carry out any consistent plan with regard to their diplomatic relations with foreign countries they must select those which are within the pale of a certain system agreeable to the men who seek to govern this country. It appears that the Court of Rome has some system disagreeable to a party connected with this Government; and if the system established in Japan is in accordance with the wishes of these men who are hostile to the Court of Rome why they are welcome to the distinction. If, however, these gentlemen have any principle based upon the system of civilization and of the Christian religion they are bound, in view of the exclusive, barbarous, and unchristian system in Japan, for consistency's sake, to exclude from the pale of American diplomacy the whole Japanese Government. Hence, to hold communication with these outside barbarians, even through an interpreter, seems to me very inconsistent on the part of gentlemen who are so very easily outraged, as the majority on this floor have just shown themselves to be, and I think prayers ought to be offered on their behalf in all the Presbyterian churches in this country.

Sir, the foreign missionary association of that church should take this case in hand. You should be preceded by a Presbyterian minister at Jeddo before your interpreter is allowed to speak to barbarians. You should pass a resolution recognizing and indorsing the Presbyterian church before you pay the salary to an interpreter who may be speaking with that unchristian nation which will not allow you the right of sepulture, whose people will cut your throat if you attempt to trade with them in a certain line, and who will make you commit hari-kari in a worse way than the gentleman on the committee who introduced the amendment in relation to the mission at Rome is doing it. Sir, the meanness and malignancy of that proposition will be made so evident that the question of the possession of the feeling of Christianity will be solved against the mover of it. The spirit of American Christianity is tolerant. I have no objection so far as I am personally concerned to your sending a full mission to Japan. I am very proud of the representative we have there; but I cannot understand how a majority of this House can vote to cut off diplomatic relations with Rome and then vote to continue them with Japan.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to this item in this point of view: it provides for the salary of the interpreter to the legation of Japan; but I do not see that this bill makes any appropriation for this legation itself. If there is any such appropriation it has escaped my notice. Either this ought to be out or the other in.

Mr. KASSON. That, I believe, is provided for; I cannot find it just at present, and I will not detain the House to examine it now.

Mr. BANKS. It is probably provided for in the act of 1856, which originated this legislation.

Mr. MAYNARD. My point is, that this makes no appropriation for that legation, but merely for the interpreter.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CHANLER, it was disagreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I find there is an omission in the bill to provide for the consulate at Quebec. I move, therefore, on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, to insert in line seventy-four, after the words "Prince Edward Island" the word "Quebec."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. In view of the action already taken by the committee abolishing the mission to Rome, I move to insert after the word "Rotterdam," in this clause, the word "Rome;" so that there may be a consul there.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move to insert, at the close of line eighty-one the following:

And the salaries of the consuls at Rome, Quebec, and Spezia shall be respectively $1,500; the salary of the consul at Spezia to commence at the beginning of the current year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. In order to correspond with the amendments already made the appropriation should be $429,000. I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to insert after line ninety-nine the following:

No money appropriated by this act shall be applied to the payment of salary or compensation to any diplomatic representative of any grade, or to any consul or commercial agent of the United States who is not a citizen of the United States, native or duly naturalized; nor shall any consul or commercial agent not a citizen of the United States be authorized to charge or receive fees of any kind for services as such consul or agent.

I think the object of this amendment appears clearly upon its face, and that it needs scarcely a word of explanation.

It may be said in reference to the appointment of aliens to these offices of minor grade—such as consulates and commercial agencies—that they get so little compensation that it is impossible to induce citizens of the United States to reside abroad at the places where the offices are to be held, and to exercise the function of the offices. I hardly suppose that to be the case. But I do know that it is right and proper to do something to correct the abuse which exists in the appointment of irresponsible persons in the countries where they reside to fill these offices.

In the first place these people, who are there to guard American interests and to meet the wants of American citizens abroad are not themselves full of American sympathies, are not supplied with American knowledge, and are not, therefore, competent, really and truly, to represent American interests. I know that there are a great many places, even where Americans reside and might be employed, where persons are appointed to fill official positions who are aliens, and in some instances have never even been in the United States. For instance, there are many who are partners in foreign houses with others who find it convenient to recommend one of their partners for such appointment, because of some commercial advantage to be derived from having one of the concern to represent the Government. There are also persons who are instigated to apply for such places for the reason that they can wear cocked hats and a little gold lace, and strut among their fellow-citizens at home in the enjoyment of certain privileges as representing a powerful Government abroad.

It may be that my amendment is too broad in the classes it embraces; but it seems to me that some corrective needs to be applied. It seems to me to be obvious that the representatives of America abroad ought to be Americans, either by adoption as naturalized citizens or as natives of the country.

An objection has sometimes been made that our representatives abroad do not always understand the language of the country to which they are accredited. That is an objection which every day, under the progress of education, is ceasing to exist, and especially by this provision for consular pupils which now exists. In view of this educational progress among our people, I apprehend that wherever America needs to be represented an American of some sort can be found competent to fill the place.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio whether he has not made his amendment too broad. We have vice consuls, who act temporarily during the absence of the consul, whose emoluments are not such as would justify any man in going abroad from this country. There are also consular agents, whose whole compensation would be insufficient to pay the expenses of a person in going to Europe and returning.

Mr. KASSON. If the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] will allow me, I will propose an amendment which I think my friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will accept: to exclude from the operation of his amendment all those embraced in schedule C; that is to say, let his rule apply to all who receive $1,500 and upward a year.

Mr. MAYNARD. Would it not be well also to exclude vice consuls and consular agents?

Mr. KASSON. I do not understand that they are included in the amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. Very well; I have no objection to that.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] by striking out the following:

Nor shall any consul or commercial agent not a citizen of the United States be authorized to charge or receive fees of any kind for services as such consular agent.

And insert in lieu thereof the words:

Except the consulates and agencies embraced in schedule C.

Mr. SCHENCK. I understand the object of the gentleman representing the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. KASSON] is to get rid of that portion of my amendment which applies this rule to those who are only paid by fees.

Mr. KASSON. And also to those who are allowed the privilege of trading. In some very bad places where Americans will not go, our agents are allowed the privilege of trading.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will modify my amendment, in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] so that it will read:

No money appropriated by this act shall be applied to the payment of salary or compensation to any diplomatic representative of any grade, or to any consul or commercial agent of the United States who is not a citizen of the United States, native or duly naturalized, except the consulates and agencies embraced in schedule C.

I want to try the experiment of being represented abroad by Americans.

Mr. SCHENCK's amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The following clause was read:

For salaries of the marshals for the consular courts in Japan, including that at Nagasaki, and in China, Siam, and Turkey, including loss by exchange thereon, $9,000.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to insert after the clause just read the following:

For the salaries of consuls at the Mahé-Seychelles Islands, and at St. Domingo, which consulates are hereby established and added to schedule B, $1,500 each, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed reading the bill.

The following clause was read:

For expenses under the act to encourage immigration, $20,000.

Mr. CHANLER. I would like to ask for the sake of information the gentleman who is in charge of this bill what is really the object of this appropriation. I understand that the person who was placed in charge of this Immigration Bureau in the State Department has left it to take some position in his native State or in the State of New Jersey. Now, I would like to be informed if that Bureau of Immigration is really in practical operation at this time; where it reaches the immigrant in Europe; and where are its officers on this side of the Atlantic, whereby the immigrant can be expedited to the place to which he would go. So far as I know every State, and nearly every county in every State, has its agents in Europe for the very purpose of encouraging immigration to this country, and they incur large expenses for this purpose. Now, it seems to me to be rather inconsistent and useless to be taxing the people twice over for the same thing, unless some particular benefit arises from this bureau in the State Department. I think it is due to the country that we should vote knowingly upon this matter, and for the purpose of bringing the question to a test I move to strike out the clause relating to the encouragement of immigration.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] does not need to be informed by me that the Bureau of Immigration is established by law and is now in operation, the officers having been appointed by the President under an existing law. The Committee on Appropriations have only recommended the appropriation necessary to carry that law into effect. If you wish to avoid carrying out that law it must be repealed. If the House chooses to repeal it I do not know that I shall have any particular objection to it. But until that is done the gentleman must see that the committee were bound to recommend the appropriation.

Mr. CHANLER. The gentleman misunderstands the drift of my inquiry. My object is not really to strike out this appropriation, but to learn whether the existing law is really being carried out: whether the State Department is really doing its duty in this matter. I understand that the person who was placed in charge of that bureau is not now in his place; that that bureau at this moment really has no head to it. I desire information from the gentleman from Pennsylvania on that point. I was fully aware that this appropriation was in accordance with existing law; therefore what the gentleman has said does not meet my inquiry.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not fully understand the gentleman before, probably because there was so much noise about me here. Whether the Secretary of State has properly carried out this law or not I should of course feel great delicacy in inquiring. I took it for granted that all the officers of this Government were doing their duty, and until some malfeasance is alleged against them I shall presume that every officer of the Government is fulfilling his duty and executing the law.

Mr. CHANLER. I will ask the gentleman in this connection whether it is not the practice of the Committee on Appropriations to send to the different Departments for information with regard to the propriety of the appropriations which are called for. Is it supposed that these gentlemen who send in their estimates are always right? Is not the committee appointed for the purpose of ascertaining whether the facts justify the appropriations asked for by the different Departments?

Mr. STEVENS. All I can say is that it has not been the custom of the Committee on Appropriations to send to the heads of Departments to ascertain whether they are doing their duty. We are without any precedent whatever of that sort. When a Department sends us, as in this case, its estimate, and when we find that estimate to conform to an existing law providing for such an appropriation, we report in favor of the appropriation, unless there be some allegation against the Department. We presume, in the absence of information to the contrary, that they do their duty.

Mr. CHANLER. Then I ask the gentleman with what consistency he moved his amendment striking out the appropriation for the embassy at Rome? Where are his allegations, where is his proof on this subject? If on this question ignoramus is his plea, he is welcome to it.

Mr. STEVENS. I shall not go back to Rome to-day. [Laughter.] We have passed that matter. All I can say is, that where we ourselves know facts which appear to justify us in withholding an appropriation, we suppose it to be our duty to withhold it. We know of no allegation against the administration of this bureau by the Secretary of State; and I am satisfied that the gentleman will not now bring a railing accusation against that officer for the purpose of inculpating the Committee of Appropriations.

Mr. CHANLER. I think that is impossible. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir; I supposed so. Hence this appropriation ought to pass.

Mr. CHANLER. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to strike out the clause from line one hundred and twenty-four to line one hundred and twenty-seven, reading as follows:

For expenses of the commission to run and mark the boundary line between the United States and the British Possessions bounding on Washington Territory, $28,070.

This appropriation seems to me one of those barnacles which are trying to fasten themselves on the Treasury of this Government. If the committee will grant me their attention, I will endeavor to give the history of this matter and the reasons why I think we had better look into it.

It will be recollected that some twenty years ago it was supposed that our title to the whole of Oregon was clear and unquestioned. The doctrine at that day was "54° 40', or fight." But in the summer of 1846 a treaty was negotiated between our Government and that of Great Britain through the agency of our Secretary of State, Mr. Buchanan, and the British minister, Mr. Packenham. The first article of that treaty was in these words:

"From the point on the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude, where the boundary laid down in existing treaties and conventions between the United States and Great Britain terminates, the line of boundary between the Territories of the United States and those of her Britannic Majesty shall be continued westward along the said forty-ninth parallel of north latitude to the middle of the channel which separates the continent from Vancouver's island, and thence southerly through the middle of the said channel and of Fuca's straits to the Pacific ocean: Provided, however, That the navigation of the whole of the said channel and straits south of the forty-ninth parallel of north latitude remain free and open to both parties."

The matter remained in this condition for a period of ten years. In the summer of 1856 Congress passed this law:

"An act to provide for carrying into effect the first article of the treaty between the United States and her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, of the 15th day of June, 1846.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purpose of carrying into effect the first article of the treaty between the United States and her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of the 15th day of June, 1846, there shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commissioner, and chief astronomer and surveyor, to unite with similar officers to be appointed by her Britannic Majesty's Government; and there shall be appointed by the President an assistant astronomer and surveyor:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said commissioner shall have power to appoint a secretary; and the said chief astronomer and surveyor shall have power to appoint a clerk.

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of carrying into effect the said first article of the said treaty, there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums: for the salary of the commissioner, for one year, $3,000; for the salary of the secretary, for one year, $2,000; for the salary of the chief astronomer and surveyor, for one year, $3,000; for the salary of the assistant astronomer and surveyor, $1,800; for the salary of the clerk, for one year, $1,200; for provisions, transportation, and contingencies, $60,000.

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, until otherwise provided for by law, the proceedings of the said commission shall be limited to the demarkation of that part of the said line of boundary which forms the boundary line between Washington Territory and the British Possessions.

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of aiding in the demarkation of the said line, the President be authorized, in his discretion, to direct the employment of such officers, assistants, and vessels, attached to the coast survey of the United States, as he may deem necessary or useful."

Ever since that day we have had in the appropriation bill an item for running this boundary line. I see by the bill at the last session the sum appropriated was $13,110; exact, very nice, and precise, and the only wonder is that a fraction of a dollar was not included. We have in this bill another item for the same thing, which has manifestly been fixed with the same mathematical accuracy. It is for $28,070.

I find the running of this boundary line, not a long one, has called for these appropriations for the last ten years. Why does it take so long to run this boundary line? We do not know what kind of progress is being made. The provision of the act to which I have alluded is "until otherwise provided," and I suppose these commissioners are to continue running that line until we otherwise order. I think, therefore, we had better provide otherwise, and it is with that view I have moved my amendment.

If there be any good reason why we should not strike out this appropriation let us know it. I think it is time we should at least have the facts before the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Our corps of surveyors and engineers are out in Oregon, and have been for the past year, and this is asked to pay the necessary expenses of the Government as required by law. Whether or not it is all required for running this boundary line I do not know. It is a rough country out there.

Mr. MAYNARD. Why I thought we were told that was the most feasible route for a railroad from ocean to ocean?

Mr. STEVENS. The railroad route to which the gentleman refers is somewhat south of this boundary line, in some places two hundred and in others three hundred miles. That it is the most feasible route for a railroad from the waters of the Atlantic to the waters of the Pacific, I say, after careful examination, I have not the least doubt. That it will become the great thoroughfare between the waters of the Atlantic and China I have no doubt whatever.

But, sir, that is not the question now. We are running the line through that country which is now inhabited by Indians. How it is so much has been expended I cannot tell. I do not know how we are running it. There is no report of what has been done.

I am sorry that we did not get "fifty-four degrees and forty minutes." I think it is a shame we did not go up to Vancouver's island; I am sorry we were compelled to split the channel of one of the best harbors in the world. That is one of the errors of the past. It is now for us to make what we have available.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to reduce the sum to $15,000.

I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, so long as we continue to make this appropriation, increasing and doubling it every year, these gentlemen will have employment from now to 1900.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am willing to make it the same as that of last year, $13,110. If the gentleman will modify his amendment in that way I will accept it.

Mr. MORRILL. I will modify it in that way.

Mr. STEVENS. As these are step-children of the Republic, if gentlemen in the center are unwilling to take charge of them I shall not object.

Mr. DENNY. Mr. Chairman, although I do not regard Washington Territory as being much more interested in this question than any other section of the country, as it is the line between the United States and British Possessions, it consequently is a national question. I will, however, say that the work has progressed very well, and that it has been so far well executed. I think this is acknowledged by every one who has any knowledge of it. I certainly think the gentleman from Tennessee is mistaken in his statement, that any Delegate from Washington Territory asserted that this precise line was the most practicable route for the Pacific railroad; but we do assert that very near to it is found the best and most practicable route for a railroad across the continent. I join him in regretting that we did not get all up to the line of fifty-four degrees and forty minutes, and I think every other American citizen who has a personal knowledge of the country will do the same. I am not only sorry that we did not get it, but think most decidedly we ought to have it. I hope that the amount called for by this bill will be allowed.

Mr. MORRILL. I modify my amendment so as to say:

Provided, That when this sum shall be exhausted no further payments shall be made or authorized.

Mr. HILL. This seems to be an attempt to bind future Congresses from further legislation.

Mr. MORRILL. I beg the gentleman to understand that this applies only to the executive department. They are in the habit usually of going on and acting precisely as if they had authority to make expenditures when there has been no appropriation made. If this shall be made, it will merely preclude the executive department from going on and involving the Government in the expense without authority.

Mr. HILL. I am glad of having given the gentleman an opportunity to make the explanation.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will say in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, I am not particular as to the precise form nor as to the amount being a thousand dollars more or less. We have already appropriated for the purpose of running this boundary line $500,000; and certainly the statement made by the Delegate from Washington Territory [Mr. DENNY] has failed to give us any adequate reason why this work should be continued any longer. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, and hope it will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by inserting in line fourteen, page 2, "Japan" after "Paraguay." It is to supply an omission in the printed bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed, and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the bill:

Provided, however, That the missions at New Granada, Bolivia, Ecuador, Venezuela, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Honduras, Paraguay, and Salvador, shall be filled by consular appointment for each of the said States at such point therein as may be deemed most convenient for purposes of intercourse with the said Governments respectively; and no part of the appropriation herein made shall be applied to the payment of any agent or minister of higher grade.

I intended to move to amend by striking out this, but was prevented. I now offer this proposition, embracing as it does no less than ten of these States, called by courtesy republics, but which I hold are under the dominion of anarchy and chaos.

Mr. KASSON. I make the question of order that this amendment proposes to change the provisions of existing law, and therefore needs further legislation to give it effect.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have stated my reasons for moving the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. KASSON. I move that the bill be laid aside, and that the committee take up bill No. 912, the Military Academy appropriation bill.

Mr. SCIENCK. Before that is done I would like to offer an amendment. When we declined to make an appropriation for the mission to Rome it was moved, as from the Committee on Appropriations, to insert a provision for a consul at Rome, upon the ground that there was no consul there. I thought it strange at the time. It seems upon consulting the Blue Book from which this list is copied that there is not only a consul but a vice consul there—Mr. Cushman and Mr. Brown. I therefore would like to understand from the Committee on Appropriations whether the consul and vice consul have been kept at work there drawing pay without any appropriation whatever.

Mr. STEVENS. I presume that this appropriation was accidentally omitted in the estimate, as they do not appear in the estimates upon which we acted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it be in order, I will move to go back to the first section of the bill, in order to strike out the names of the several States included in my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order if objection be made.

Mr. STEVENS. I must object.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

The committee then proceeded to the consideration of bill of the House No. 912, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1868.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with, and the Clerk proceeded to read it by clauses for amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I observe somewhat peculiar phraseology in this bill. It is as follows:

For additional appropriations for which estimates were not made last year.

I desire to ask whether these appropriations, amounting altogether to quite a large sum, one being for $7,500, one for $75,000, and so on, are absolute deficiencies, or whether they are not appropriations which we should consider?

Mr. STEVENS. These are not deficiencies; because last year we declined to make any appropriation for these purposes, although I believe the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy thought that they were necessary. I would ask the chairman of the Military Committee what information he has in regard to them?

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out all of them. There is no pressing reason why we should make these appropriations; and I hope that we shall not go into extravagant appropriations this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot move to strike out all of them, as they have not yet been read.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, then, to strike out what has been read, and which is as follows:

For additional appropriations for which estimates were not made last year:

For enlarging cadet laundry, $5,000.

Mr. SCHENCK. As the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has appealed to me upon this subject and has referred to the fact that these items, or some of them, were brought to the attention of the House at the last session of Congress, I will make a moment's explanation.

Some of these items, but not all of them, are such as were recommended by the Board of Visitors as necessary appropriations for improving the condition of the Academy at West Point. I had the honor to be president of that board, and thus my attention was attracted to the subject as well as by the communications which I received as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. There is an item "for enlarging cadets' laundry, $5,000." Then there is one, "for furniture for soldiers' hospital, an item of only $100." The third is in relation to increasing the supply of water. These, I believe, were all recommended by the Board of Visitors. In relation, too, to the item "for a fire-proof building," it was deemed absolutely necessary for the preservation of the records and other valuable property at the Academy.

Mr. MORRILL. I would ask the gentleman whether this sum of $15,000 will complete the building, or whether this is but an initiatory step to further expense?

Mr. SCHENCK. I am not able to answer the gentleman's question, because I do not know what kind of building they propose to put up, and therefore I have no data on which to determine the amount of appropriation that may be requisite. I speak only of the general necessity of such an appropriation. And the same may be said of the item for a fire-proof building for a chemical laboratory. That was deemed to be essentially necessary.

As to the two remaining items, "for a stable and forage house" and "for a permanent derrick on the wharf," I have no recollection. In regard to the derrick, it relates to an improvement which has been completed since the time of which I have been speaking. The most of these items, therefore, designating them as I have done, I can only answer for as items which, in the opinion of those who examined the Academy and the condition of things there, it was deemed necessary to appropriate for. This is the only explanation I can make to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. MORRILL.] For the rest I must refer him to the War Department, which made the estimates and asked for the appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not understand that there has been any new information before the Committee on Appropriations or before the House. My experience is that when we make appropriations for improvements, the first step is really the one that involves all the cost. Having commenced the improvements we shall become involved in the expenditure of unknown sums for each and every item. Some of these items here which begin with the modest sum of ten or fifteen thousand dollars will very probably in the end cost not less than $100,000. I therefore warn the House against the commencement of these improvements.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. MORRILL; and upon a division there were—ayes 50, noes 24; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KASSON and MORRILL were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 43, noes 54.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed reading the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out the following:

For increasing the supply of water, replacing mains, &c., $15,000.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that these appropriations are for the beginning of large expenditures, which, I think, will involve the Government in an expenditure of not less than five or six hundred thousand dollars to complete them. Now, unless we are prepared to go on and complete these works we should not make these appropriations.

Mr. STEVENS. My friend from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is in the habit of seeing things very largely; and I do not know but it is a very good idea. Just think of the idea of the replacing some old mains to convey water from a spring costing the Government some four or five hundred thousand dollars. I remember the other day we were told by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] that if we passed poor old Ames's bill we would be letting in a flood of claims to the amount of $2,000,000,000. Now, upon a fair estimate, I think it will require only some fifty or a hundred million dollars.

Mr. MORRILL. Did the gentleman look beyond the claims for the county of Lancaster?

Mr. STEVENS. I did not look there at all, for Lancaster has no claims that I know of. I believe there was an appropriation of $500,000 made in Pennsylvania for some purpose; and perhaps the member for Lancaster was too lazy or indifferent to look after his share, and we may have a claim. But this habit of making such large exaggerations to frighten men who have not time to look into the matter I think ought to be checked.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the clause I proposed to strike out by reducing the appropriation from $15,000 to $10,000, merely for the purpose of saying to the committee that the remarks I made do not apply to this item alone, but to the items for an ice-house, for fire-proof buildings, for public offices, and for a chemical laboratory, for breast-high wall of water battery, for stable and forage-house, &c. I desire to have them all stricken out. I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. MORRILL; and upon a division there were—ayes thirty-six; noes not counted. So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For ice-house and additional stove in servants' rooms, $7,500.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out that clause.

Mr. KASSON. I would ask the gentleman if he does not want the servants to have a stove?

Mr. PRICE. One that will cost $7,500?

Mr. KASSON. That is for the ice-house as well as for the stove.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. MORRILL; and upon a division there were—ayes 43, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs STEVENS and HILL were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes thirty-six; noes not counted.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fire-proof building for public offices, $15,000.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out that appropriation. I will merely say that these things have been asked for for some six or eight years past, but they have never before been granted by any committee of this House.

Mr. DRIGGS. The very reason the gentleman assigns for rejecting these items is the very reason why we should vote for them. It is not economy to allow public property to go to waste.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out lines sixty-four and sixty-five, as follows:

For breast-high wall of water battery, $5,000.

On agreeing to the amendment there were—ayes 36, noes 37; no quorum voting.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fire-proof building for chemical laboratory, $25,000.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to strike out the clause just read.

On agreeing to the amendment there were—ayes 47, noes 33; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. STEVENS and MORRILL.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-nine; noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For stable and forage-house, $10,000.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend by striking out the clause just read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by adding the following as new sections:

And be it further enacted, That the cadets of the Military Academy be entitled to the ration now received by the acting midshipmen at the Naval Academy, commencing at the date of the approval of the law authorizing the same.

And be it further enacted, That hereafter the assistant professor of Spanish shall receive the same pay and emoluments allowed to the assistant professors of the Academy.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations what increase of pay this will give to the cadet?

Mr. STEVENS. Simply one ration, the same that is now allowed to the midshipmen in the Naval Academy.

Mr. PIKE. The amendment seems to me a little obscure, and it may be so to other members. I would be glad if the gentleman from Pennsylvania or some member of the Committee on Appropriations would explain it a little more fully. I would like to know just what it means. I suppose it means a little more money in some shape to these cadets.

Mr. KASSON. This amendment is in accordance with the recommendation of the inspector general and the Secretary of War. In their communication they ask for some additional provisions which would involve a direct increase of pay and which the committee declined to report. This is only a proposition to equalize in the matter of rations the cadets at West Point and the midshipmen at the Naval Academy. It is supported by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and is in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of War and the chief officer in charge of the Military Academy. It seems to be but a matter of justice and equality.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is the gentleman quite sure that the midshipmen of the Naval Academy draw rations?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAYNARD. My impression is that unless the law has been very recently changed, of which I am not aware, such is not the fact.

Mr. BLAINE. This amendment provides that the cadets shall be entitled to "the ration now received by the acting midshipmen at the Naval Academy;" so that if the midshipmen do not receive any ration the cadets will receive none.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the provision for an additional ration. I do not wish to vote on this point without a proper understanding of the question. If I understand the proposition correctly—and if I do not the gentleman in charge of the bill will correct me—its effect will be to give to each cadet at West Point something like one hundred dollars additional pay. I believe that is what it means. The question is whether or not we shall pay to the boys there $100 additional. For my part, without some further explanation I am not willing to do it. The ordinary way of raising pay at the other end of the avenue has been by equalizing it. I do not know while I have been in Congress any direct increase of pay has been made. Some one is always paid more than another, and then the other comes in and asks his pay may be equal to the higher pay. Here comes a proposition to allow the cadets at West Point the same as the midshipmen at the Naval Academy. It is the old fashion of equalizing pay.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. What is a midshipman's pay?

Mr. PIKE. Five hundred dollars a year, I think.

Mr. HILL. I think midshipmen have no ration; and I desire to know whether, if so, this will give the cadets at West Point any ration?

Mr. KASSON. This does not deprive any one of any pay. It simply gives the cadets at the Military Academy a ration which they have not now. Midshipmen receive a ration in addition to their pay; and the object of the amendment is to give an actual ration to the cadets to eke out their present meager compensation.

Mr. HILL. I desire to say if this increases the pay of cadets of the Military Academy at West Point one dollar I am opposed to it. I doubt not every member of this House has application upon application piled up upon his table for the position of cadet at the present pay. It is not right to pay them any more. If we are to make additional appropriation, let us do it for the widows and orphans of those who have fallen in battle, and not for those who occupy a position which hundreds and thousands are unsuccessful in obtaining at the present pay.

Mr. PIKE, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think the cadets at West Point receive $500 and no rations, and the midshipmen forty-one dollars a month and a ration.

A MEMBER. Five hundred dollars a year.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then the pay is precisely the same, with the exception that the midshipman gets a ration and the cadet does not. If we pass this amendment it will make them alike in all respects; they will have the same pay and the same rations.

Mr. PIKE. If the midshipman has no ration, would not this be considered as giving them both this ration?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No.

Mr. PIKE. I think the midshipman receives $500 and no ration, but I am not certain about it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Do not the midshipmen have a ration? I think they do. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to answer.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the midshipmen while they are members of the Naval Academy do draw rations. At the time their salary was raised provision was made that when they left the Academy and were waiting for the appointment of ensign they should receive rations. Therefore, this refers to midshipmen who have been members of the Academy and are waiting for their appointments as ensigns. There are no acting midshipmen in the Naval Academy.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentlemen who oppose this amendment succeed in showing anything, it is that it is a most simple one in its character. If the midshipmen at the Naval Academy receive no ration now, neither will the cadets at West Point receive any; but if the one receives it so will the other. It puts the cadet at West Point upon the same footing precisely with the midshipman at Annapolis.

I differ with the gentleman from Massachusetts, and believe the midshipman does get a ration. My impression is that every one in the Navy is allowed rations, beginning with the highest down to the lowest. I submit that the cadets are as much entitled to this ration as the acting midshipman.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. What does the gentleman mean by "acting midshipman"?

Mr. SCHENCK. I mean one appointed to the Naval Academy who goes through the transition state from midshipman to ensign. They have no other name given to them. I would have offered this amendment if I had not been anticipated by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, having had a communication on the subject from the War Department, and having looked into it.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 44; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SCHENCK and PIKE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes 44.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise and report the bills to the House, with the amendments.

Mr. LE BLOND. I hope the gentleman will allow us to have a separate vote on the appropriation for the minister at Rome.

Mr. STEVENS. I will not ask for any vote on the bills in the House to-day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can demand a separate vote on any of the amendments in the House.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the bill of the House No. 904, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes, and had instructed him to report the same to the House, with sundry amendments thereto.

Also, that the committee had had under consideration the bill of the House No. 912, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, and had instructed him to report the same to the House, with sundry amendments thereto.

Mr. STEVENS. I move the previous question on the pending bills.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (H. R. No. 719) to punish certain crimes in relation to the public securities and currency, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House take a recess from now till half past seven o'clock this evening, with the understanding that the bank bill shall then be taken up for consideration.

Mr. POMEROY. I object to the latter part of the motion.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Then I modify it by moving that the evening session be devoted to the business of the House.

The motion was disagreed to.

And then on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ALLEY: A petition from A. E. Larkin, and others, asking for reduction of the tax on cigars.

By Mr. BANKS: The petition of John Forsyth, soldier of the eighth infantry of the United States, for invalid pension.

By Mr. BUNDY: A resolution of the working-men of Portsmouth, in Seio county, Ohio, against any reduction of the present tariff on iron.

By Mr. DARLING: A memorial of citizens of New York, against the impeachment of President Johnson.

By Mr. GROSSBRENNER: The petition of B. K. Spangler, J. H. Waggoner, and others, manufacturers of and dealers in cigars in Cumberland county, Pennsylvania, praying for a modification of the present internal revenue tax upon cigars.

By Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts: A petition of the insurance companies of the city of Boston, praying relief from the tax imposed by the one hundred and fifth section of the internal revenue law.

By Mr. HUMPHREY: The petition of cigar-makers of Buffalo, for reduction of tax on cigars.

By Mr. KERR: The memorial of James W. Webb, Esq., of Orleans, Orange county, Indiana, for certain amendments in the pension laws.

By Mr. KETCHAM: The petition of A. B. Knapp, and 63 others, citizens of Stamford, Dutchess county, New York, for increased protection on American wool.

By Mr. PERHAM: The petition of Lewis A. Horton, for arrears of pension.

By Mr. RAYMOND: A memorial of Murphy, McCurdy & Warden, and a large number of other business men in the city of New York, remonstrating against movements for the impeachment of the President, and urging the necessity of adopting measures to strengthen public confidence, allay excitement, revive the interests of labor and capital, and promote the peace and prosperity of the country.

By Mr. SITGREAVES: The petition of William B. Stewart, and others, of Plainfield, New Jersey, asking for additional protection on flax.

By Mr. SPALDING: A petition of many citizens of Cleveland, Ohio, for the repeal of the law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to retire $4,000,000 per month of the national currency.

By Mr. F. THOMAS: The petition of citizens of Howard county, Maryland, praying an investigation into the acts of President Johnson in countenancing and encouraging Thomas Swann, Governor of Maryland, in attempts to overthrow the loyal authority of that State.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 31, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HON. E. H. WEBSTER.

Mr. DAWES. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution; and I will state that it is the last one of this kind, and is in precisely the words of the resolutions previously adopted:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Hon. E. H. Webster the amount of increased pay of a member of this House provided by law from the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the date of his resignation.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 525, an act supplementary to an act to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, in order to put it on its passage, with an amendment from the Committee on Commerce.

No objection being made the bill was taken up and read. It provides that the act to prevent smuggling approved July 18, 1866, shall be so construed as not to affect any right of suit or prosecution which may have accrued under any prior act of Congress, repealed or supplied by said act previous to July 18, 1866, and that all such suits as have been or shall be commenced under such prior acts for acts committed previous to July 18, 1866, shall be tried and disposed of as if said act of July, 1866, had not been passed.

Mr. ELIOT. The committee have instructed me to move to amend by adding the following sections:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That section twenty-six of the act aforesaid be so amended that the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to make such regulation as shall enable vessels engaged in the coasting trade between ports and places upon Lake Michigan exclusively, and laden with American productions and free merchandise only, to unlade their cargo without previously obtaining a permit to unlade.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That section twenty-five of said act be hereby amended by inserting the word "March" in place of "July" in said section.

Mr. SPALDING. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts why this is confined to Lake Michigan.

Mr. ELIOT. It is confined to Lake Michigan because that is the only lake where there is no foreign country contiguous; and the bill is so framed as to give permits only to those vessels where no smuggling can be committed. It could not be extended to the other lakes without repealing substantially the previous act prohibiting smuggling.

Mr. SPALDING. It has a bearing upon vessels going up through the Welland canal to Lake Michigan.

Mr. ELIOT. It is confined in its operations to vessels that go from port to port on Lake Michigan.

Mr. HALE. I desire to ask the gentleman if the bill saves the rights of the Government for the enforcement of penalties which ensued under the former law in cases where suits have not been commenced.

Mr. ELIOT. That is the object of the first amendment to the Senate bill.

Mr. HALE. I understand that under the former law that was not saved where the suits had not been commenced at the time of the passage of the act of last session.

Mr. ELIOT. That is so exactly.

Mr. HALE. The object of this is to save the forfeiture where the suit had not been commenced the same as if it had been.

Mr. ELIOT. That is so.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ELIOT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A REPORT.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and under the law referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House five thousand extra copies of the report of the Secretary of War in relation to the improvement of the navigation of the Upper Mississippi and its tributaries.

ALMANSON EATON.

On motion of Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Public Lands were discharged from the further consideration of bill of the House No. 387, for the relief of Almonson Eaton, receiver of public moneys for the district of lands subject to sale at Stevens's Point, Wisconsin; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. ALLISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was so referred; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LUCAS COUNTY, IOWA.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Lucas county, Iowa; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HALE. I now insist on the regular order of business.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic services of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1868, the pending question being upon the amendments reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. Those amendments upon which separate votes are not demanded will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. LE BLOND demanded a separate vote on the amendments in regard to the missions to Portugal and Rome.

The other amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment in reference to the mission to Portugal.

Mr. LE BLOND demanded the yeas and nays; and called for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The next amendment upon which a separate vote was demanded in relation to the mission to Rome, was in line eleven, to strike out the word "Rome," and to add at the end of line fifteen the following:

And no money hereby or otherwise appropriated shall be paid for the support of an American legation at Rome from or after the 30th day of June, 1867.

Mr. ANCONA. I demand the yeas and nays upon that amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken upon the amendment and there were—yeas 82, noes 18.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is the consideration of amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole to House bill No. 912, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1868, upon which the previous question has been ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. There were two amendments made by the Committee of the Whole upon which I desire separate votes. I refer to the amendments striking out the following clauses:

For fire-proof building for chemical laboratory, $25,000.

For stable and forage house, $10,000.

The first question upon which a separate vote was asked was upon agreeing to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole striking out the appropriation for the chemical laboratory; and being taken, upon a division, there were—yeas 60, noes 38.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next question upon which a separate vote was asked was upon the amendment to strike out the appropriation for stable and forage house.

Mr. STEVENS. I will not insist upon a separate vote upon that amendment; but will let the question be taken upon all the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMNESTY—SUFFRAGE IN TERRITORIES.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I am instructed by the Committee on Enrolled Bills, which committee are authorized to report at any time, to report for consideration at this time, the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the bill to repeal section thirteen of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862, and the bill to regulate the elective franchise in the Territories of the United States, were severally passed by both Houses at the present session of Congress, and have been reported by the Committee on Enrolled Bills to have been presented to the President of the United States, the former on the 9th and the latter on the 12th instant; and whereas the President has failed to notify the House that he has signed the same, and has also failed to return the same to the House of Representatives, in which they originated, with his objections; and whereas by section seven, article one, of the Constitution of the United States the said bills have now become laws; and whereas the same have not been published as laws of the United States:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to inform the House whether the said laws have been filed in his Department.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. This, I think, is the first instance in the history of this Government—

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a point of order. I would inquire of the Chair in what manner this resolution has come before the House.

The SPEAKER. It is reported by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TROWBRIDGE] from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, which is authorized to report at any time.

Mr. FINCK. That means enrolled bills and joint resolutions.

The SPEAKER. On page 89 of the Digest, the gentleman will find the rule which authorizes that committee to report at any time.

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, I submit the question of order that that rule will not allow the Committee on Enrolled Bills to report original resolutions; it only allows them to report enrolled bills and enrolled joint resolutions, not an original resolution upon some other subject. This resolution is in regard to the passage of some law in regard to the Constitution of the United States, and in regard to the duties of the Secretary of State. I object to the resolution as not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

"It shall be in order for the Committee on Enrolled Bills to report at any time."—Rule 101.

The SPEAKER. There is no qualification nor limitation; they are authorized "to report at any time." This resolution is in relation to enrolled bills submitted by them to the President of the United States.

Mr. SPALDING. Have they the right to report an original bill at any time?

The SPEAKER. They have the right "to report at any time." The Chair cannot limit their report on any proper subject any more than any other committee.

Mr. FINCK. I admit that they have the right to report at any time. My point is, that they have no right to report anything but enrolled bills and enrolled joint resolutions.

The SPEAKER. This matter has been referred to that committee by the House. Bills passed by both branches of Congress are submitted, as the rules require, to the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and they report when they submitted them to the President of the United States for his signature. The committee report that they have submitted certain bills to the President, that they have not been returned by the President, nor have they been published officially among the laws.

The Clerk will read from the ninth joint rule of the two Houses.

The Clerk read as follows:

"The said committee shall report the day of presentation to the President; which time shall also be carefully entered on the Journal of each House."—November 13, 1794.

Mr. FINCK. Have not the committee already reported the fact that they did present these bills to the President for his signature?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt that they have so reported, and this resolution appears to grow out of the duties devolved on them. The Chair rules that they have the right to report at any time upon any matter growing out of the business referred to them.

Mr. FINCK. Have I a right to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. Certainly; the gentleman has that right.

Mr. FINCK. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I move that the appeal be laid on the table.

Mr. FINCK. I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a point of order. My point is, whether this resolution, being a call for executive information, does not come within the general rule requiring such resolutions to lie over one day, unless unanimous consent be given for their consideration?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that point would have been a good one if it had been made in time.

Mr. HALE. I made it as soon as I could get the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. TROWBRIDGE] had commenced his speech before the point of order was made by the gentleman on the right, [Mr. FINCK.] By the usage, the point of order suggested by the gentleman from New York must be made when the resolution is read at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman from Michigan will allow me, I wish to inquire whether there is any precedent for this action; whether a resolution of this character is by the practice of the House the ordinary course of giving the House or the country official information as to when a bill has become a law. I suppose that heretofore there must have arisen cases in which bills have become laws by the operation of this very provision of the Constitution; and I should be inclined to think that no further action would be necessary; that in some form it should be taken for granted that the bill had become a law.

The SPEAKER. With the consent of the gentleman from Michigan, the Chair will reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York. This matter has been examined by officers who have been connected with both branches of the Government for a long time, and they cannot find or remember any case in which a bill which has become a law by the declination of the President to give it his signature has not been officially published. The laws mentioned in this resolution have been laws for some time, and it appears have not yet been published.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the resolution, if it is in accordance with the ordinary course.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. If the gentleman will listen to me, perhaps some of his doubts will be removed.

When the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] raised his point of order I was about to state that this is the first instance in the history of our Government in which a bill which has been passed by both Houses of Congress, and has failed to secure the signature of the President or to be returned with his objections, has not been officially published. These two bills, the titles of which are rehearsed in the preamble of the resolution, have passed both Houses of Congress, been signed by their respective Presiding Officers, and by the Committee on Enrolled Bills have been presented to the President of the United States on the 9th and 12th of January respectively. The time during which the President is allowed to retain in his hands a bill which has passed both Houses of Congress has some time since expired; but he has neither returned these bills to the House with his objections, nor has he notified Congress of his approval of the same. Therefore they have become, under the imperative requirement of the Constitution of the United States, laws. But, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State is required to publish the laws which shall have been enacted by Congress. He has published bills which have obtained the approval of the President, and by that approval have become laws, since the time when these two bills became laws in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. But he has not published these two bills.

It seems, then, to the Committee on Enrolled Bills important and essential that these bills shall be filed with the Secretary of State and placed where they may be published as the other laws of the United States are; and as the first step toward placing them in that position the committee recommend the passage of the preamble and resolution which they have reported to this House.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he has found the bills; whether he knows where they are now; whether he has seen them.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. That is the very purpose of the resolution, to find the bills; and if they are not with the Secretary of State, then the Committee propose to follow this action by some proposition requiring the Clerk to make a new enrollment of the bills to be filed in the Department of State, or proposing some other action which after full consultation the committee may deem appropriate. Mr. Speaker, I now call the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I have not heard the resolution, and I should like to have it again read.

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question as we ought to be careful of what steps we take in this matter.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I will yield to the gentleman after the preamble and resolution have been again read.

The Clerk again read the preamble and resolution.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, retaining the floor, before I yield to the gentleman from Ohio. I suggest to him by this resolution we may obtain from the Secretary of State information whether the bills have been filed at his office; and if that be so no further action may be necessary. If not, then the committee will introduce some resolution to supply the deficiency; and under that resolution this whole subject will come before the House properly for discussion.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is only because this is a new question I desire to say anything at all, and that in the nature of inquiry rather than anything else. Here are two laws which have become such by force of constitutional provision through the neglect or by the refusal of the President to take any notice of the action of Congress. Now, sir, all laws upon the statute-book have some authentication. If the law receives the approval of the Executive it is published in the statute-book with the statement of the date when signed and approved. If not approved by the President, but returned with his objections and passed over the veto, it is then published as having been thus passed over the veto by the requisite two-thirds majority of each branch of Congress.

It seems to me this resolution does not go far enough. Suppose the Secretary of State says these laws are enrolled and he will publish them with the other laws, then they will go upon the statute-book without any authentication. They will not be marked as approved by the President, or as having been passed over the President's veto by the requisite two-thirds majority. These two Houses, it seems to me, ought to take some action, by joint resolution or otherwise, to publish these laws with the statutes to show what the facts are, that they have become laws notwithstanding the neglect of the President. Therefore I ask whether this proposes to rest satisfied with the statement, he has inclosed these with other statutes in his keeping at the State Department, and whether it would not be necessary, before publishing them to the people of the United States as statutes, to accompany them by some act of authentication which will verify the facts that the President having retained them without adjournment of Congress beyond the period of ten days and not returning them they have by the Constitution become laws.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. My opinion is the latter alternative is the course that will be taken, and a declaration made when these laws shall take effect. That is in contemplation of the committee. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operations thereof the preamble and resolution were adopted.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently said: There was a question before the House this morning in relation to a resolution reported by the Committee on Enrolled Bills, in regard to the manner of attesting bills which have gone into operation and become laws, but which have not been signed by the President. The Chair since then has looked into the matter, and the Clerk will now report two precedents which occurred during the administration of President Buchanan.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A message was received from the President of the United States, by A. J. Glossbrenner, his Private Secretary, notifying the House that an act for the relief of Hockaday & Liggett having been presented to the President on the 16th of February, 1861, and not having been returned by him within ten days, (Sundays excepted,) it has now become a law under the Constitution of the United States."

"A message was received from the President of the United States, by A. J. Glossbrenner, his Private Secretary, notifying the House that a joint resolution (H. R. No. 62) for the benefit of George H. Giddings, having been presented to the President on the 18th of February, 1861, and not having been returned by him within ten days, (Sundays excepted,) it has now become a law under the Constitution of the United States."

CIVIL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order the consideration of bill of the House No. 889, to regulate the civil service of the United States and promote the efficiency thereof, on which Mr. HALE was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. To accommodate gentlemen who are interested in the business of the morning hour I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed till after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF THE STEAMSHIP ILLINOIS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in response to a House resolution, transmitting papers relative to the purchase of the steamship Illinois; which, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

COMMON COUNCIL OF BALTIMORE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also stated by request he presented the memorial of the common council of Baltimore; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INSPECTION OF INDIAN AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER announced as the first business in order during the morning hour the bill (S. No. 204) entitled "An act to provide for an annual inspection of Indian affairs, and for other purposes," on which Mr. HIGBY was entitled to the floor.

Mr. HIGBY. I supposed the arrangement was to take this matter up to-morrow evening, but I find by the Globe it comes up this morning. I move the bill be left open for debate Friday evening.

Mr. SCHENCK. We can dispose of it this morning.

Mr. HIGBY. I withdraw the motion. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a disposition on the part of a portion of the House, I do not know but a majority of it, that this whole matter in reference to the care and custody of Indians should be transferred to the War Department. In general terms I expressed myself somewhat in doubt yesterday whether it should be continued where it is now, in the hands of the Interior Department. If we will abandon the reservation system entirely, leave the Indians to go wild, as many tribes do now, I think the decidedly better plan would be to transfer this whole subject to the War Department, as it would simply then be a matter of distributing the annuities that are devoted to the Indians, and as the War Department would then be more immediately the guardians of the Indians they would be more obedient to that Department. I think under the circumstances that would be the best plan that could be devised.

But it is a fact, and an important fact, that the reservation system has been introduced very largely, especially in the States and some of the Territories. In my own State—I have to speak more particularly of those portions which I canvassed in 1865—the Indians that have been so extremely troublesome and that have occasioned the Government so much expenditure of money in order to subdue them and bring them to peace, are now upon our reservations and are now living and being supported by the Government under the reservation system. Several thousand Indians in the State are cared for in that way.

I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] who has introduced a substitute proposing to transfer this business to the War Department, to this point. It was said here yesterday that by transferring this to the War Department the expense would be very much lessened; that the officers now in the military department would take all the care of the Indians and superintend all the manual labor, and would not receive any additional compensation therefor, and the Government would thus get rid of employing other superintendents and agents. Now, let me ask the gentleman from Ohio, who will have an opportunity to speak on this subject, to give the House some information upon it. On those reservations in California and Nevada which I have visited, and I presume it is the same elsewhere, the Indians are placed upon some of the best lands in those States, not simply for occupancy and residence, but for cultivation and producing food for their sustenance and support. There has to be a superintendent in the State who has more or less acquaintance with agriculture, and he must give his attention and his supervision, in going from reservation to reservation throughout the State, to these matters as well as to the distribution of the annuities that are voted annually to the Indians.

An agent is also placed in the reservation. There may be five hundred, one thousand, or fifteen hundred Indians on the reservation. The reservation is dealt with as a farm is dealt with, provided these men who have the supervision do their duty. In one reservation in Round valley, California, there were less than a thousand Indians when I visited it, but they had raised in the years 1864 and 1865 with their own hands, assisted by some two or three men who are under pay at the rate of fifty dollars a month, and an agent at $1,800 a year, full supplies of provisions. They raised some four thousand bushels of wheat in 1864. They had a large crop then on the ground. Those who were examined on the reservation report that in everything it was carried on like a farm by a man who understood his business.

Now, sir, these Indians have been producing everything they needed, so that the Government has had to make no purchases of food nor incur any expense for transportation to the reservations. I found on every one that I visited, with one exception, that they were prospering. In the exceptional case the Government came into possession so late in the year that they could not get their crops in in season. I was told by the agent there that they would have nearly or quite enough to last them through the year. But in all the other reservations there was abundance raised by the Indians for their own support; that the laborers would simply want the agents to superintend and care for them, and they would raise abundance for themselves, and those who are employed by the Government to look after them.

It is not so favorable in the State of Nevada, because the reservations there had not been cared for. But all the information that I could obtain went to the point that with proper care, in the first place furnishing them with tools and seeds, and in the second place receiving a proper administration of Indian affairs, the Indians were ready to go to work and produce all they would need for their own support. In my own State it so happened that in the year 1865 the administration of the Indian department was in a very flattering condition. It was in a far better condition than would have been found to be the case in other portions of the Union. It happened to be in a far better condition than it had been during former years. As I remarked yesterday, in some of those years while the Government was making large appropriations and was exhibiting great benevolence there was no beneficence in that benevolence, for the simple reason that the Indians got little or nothing of what the Government was appropriating.

Now, it is for the reason that the Indian system is not properly arranged that this bill has been introduced by the Committee on Indian Affairs, in order to see if we cannot bring such a stringency into the system that it will be more properly carried on and the Indian more fairly dealt with by the agents of the Government. It seems to me that if this whole matter should be turned over to the War Department it will result in an increased expenditure; or at least the same expenditure will be incurred in order to care for the Indians and keep them engaged in agricultural pursuits. The whole testimony which has been taken goes to show that there is no more difficulty in obtaining labor from the Indians than there would be in obtaining labor from so many whites. In every examination that I made on every reservation the testimony was universally the same: that there was no difficulty in obtaining labor from the Indians to raise all that was necessary from the reservation.

The only thing the Indians want to be assured of is that they will not be robbed of what they raise when it is produced from the soil; that is the only assurance they ask. They make good laborers on those conditions. If the Indian can have the grain he raises to make into bread, can have his vegetables to eat, and if there is a surplus can be allowed the benefit of it to obtain clothing and other comforts, that is all he wants; and under that system he becomes a good laboring man. I saw scores of them entirely naked, working in the harvest field as hard as any other laborers would have worked. They were working there with great willingness.

The only trouble was that the Government was charged with not furnishing them with sufficient clothing. Whether the clothing was not furnished by the Government, or if furnished it by some means failed to reach them, I do not know. It was ascertained that in some cases the clothing was furnished by the Government, but never reached the Indians.

Now, if the War Department would relax its stringent rules so that the men in the military can become agriculturists, and look after the Indians with care in that regard; and not only that, but will also look after the mechanical, the moral, and intellectual interests of the Indians; then it would be immaterial to me where the management was placed. All that I want is that the Department which shall have the care of these Indians shall do the best for the Indians. It is for that reason that I am in favor of the bill reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs. I think if that bill should pass it will result in a vast improvement upon the lax system that is now in operation. I think it would be far better for the Government to pass this bill and try it at least for a time. Let us have this supervisory power in the different districts, whose duty it shall be to make annual examinations, who shall have power to remove any man whom they may find there not performing his duty, and who will have opportunities to find out and prevent frauds, if any are being practiced there. That cannot be done under the present system. It seems to me this bill will be a vast improvement upon the system now existing. Almost any change would be for the better.

I am inclined to the opinion that if we do not make some improvement in this system we better give up entirely the reservation system, for it is nothing but a mockery now. It is a notorious fact that with the system pursued in my own State during the years 1865 and 1866 the reservations might be made self-supporting.

This was but a man; it was not the system. We want some one to see that the Indians receive not only all that the Government has appropriated for them, but see also that they have proper care and attentions on their reservations. We must do either one thing or the other. We must either have more stringency in the system, which I think this supervisory board would provide, or we must give up the reservation system entirely. If the control of this department goes into the War Department we must either give up that system, unless we can have some such board as this who will look after the Indian, teach him agriculture, and make him a laborer.

I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to tell me how, under a military jurisdiction, you are going to give the Indians that information in regard to agriculture and the methods by which he shall subsist himself.

I will now yield the floor to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

The SPEAKER. For how long?

Mr. HIGBY. For fifteen minutes, if he wishes all that time; or, sir, I will yield the floor indefinitely.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do not propose to occupy more than ten or fifteen minutes, and will afford an opportunity to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] to move the previous question long before the expiration of my hour.

Mr. Speaker, if I comprehend the argument of the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] against the transfer of this Indian Bureau to the Military Department, it is that we must, in case of such transfer, abandon the whole system of Indian reservations and all attempts to introduce among them the habits of civilized life by teaching them to cultivate the soil and making them, in some degree, self-sustaining.

Now, sir, I see no such difficulty in the way. If the gentleman will look at the bill he will see that while we propose to transfer this whole matter to the War Department, we provide that there shall be detailed officers of the Army to act as superintendents, agents, and sub-agents. The duty of such officers, thus acting as agents and sub-agents, will be precisely what they are now as provided by law. It is so provided in the bill.

Now, what is the difficulty the gentleman foresees? He says that these military gentlemen who will become agents and sub-agents will not have a knowledge of agriculture, and therefore will be unable to direct and instruct the Indians in the cultivation of their reservations.

Why, sir, in all human probability, they will have as much knowledge of agriculture as the men who now fill these places have. I can say for myself that I have secured the appointment of two Indian agents, and one of them was a physician and the other a lawyer. The men who get these places are those who have sufficient political influence to secure an appointment worth $1,500 a year; or, as it will be under this bill, $1,800. But these agents and sub-agents have under them farmers and blacksmiths to aid them on the reservation; and that system will go on under the War Department just as it does under the Department of the Interior. The bureau will be conducted under the existing law authorizing the employment of the men needed to aid the superintendent, whose duties, after all, will be only supervisory. That, I think, disposes of the whole objection made by the gentleman from California, and, as it seems to me, the gentleman must see that no such difficulty can exist. The gentleman is laboring under a misunderstanding in supposing that we propose to wipe out the present provisions of law. We only propose that military officers shall take supervisory control of these matters, retaining all the laws for Indian reservations just as they now are.

Again, the gentleman says that if you adopt the system proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs there will be by these commissioners a regular inspection at each of these agencies. Well, now the gentleman must certainly admit that if you put this whole matter under military rule the officers detailed to perform these duties will be all the time under rigid inspection. An inspector general of the Army would be sent to each post and garrison, and they will necessarily keep up a strict inspection of the conduct of those officers who may be detailed to perform duty in connection with the Indians. We shall secure, in short, from the head of the Army down, that rigid inspection, accountability, and responsibility on the part of the persons so employed which, it seems to me, we cannot have under any civil administration of this branch of the public service.

It is an old and homely proverb that "the proof of the pudding is in the eating." Now, sir, we did not have these difficulties to anything like the same extent when this whole matter was under the charge of the War Department. There were abuses then; there was maladministration then; but I aver as a general fact, shown by the history of Indian affairs in this country, that abuses never arrived at anything like the same height to which they have grown since the management of these affairs was transferred to the Department of the Interior and has become purely a matter of civil administration. What is the condition of things now? The Committee on Indian Affairs, by the very introduction of this bill, wisely intend to adopt some scheme to correct abuses which have grown to be enormous; and if we cannot transfer the whole matter to the Military Department, I hope some such bill as that the committee have introduced will prevail. I do not object to the effort of the Committee on Indian Affairs to bring about a reform of these abuses by their bill; but it is because I think the whole management of Indian affairs would be better administered by a complete and radical change, putting the entire system under military rule, that I propose a substitute for the bill of the committee. Their bill is good so far as it goes, and if the administration of Indian affairs is to be left with a civil department, then I trust this bill or some other embracing its general principles will be adopted. But I think a still further, greater, more effective and radical case of crushing abuses may be made by wiping out the whole relation of this bureau of Indian affairs to mere civil administration and putting it under strict military rule, military responsibility, and military accountability.

Now, sir, the general fact is simply this: we have two Departments of the Government having concern with the treatment and care of the Indians: a civil Department—the Department of the Interior—and a military Department. These two Departments cannot in the very nature of things act harmoniously; and what is the consequence? Upon the civil side your Indian agents, acting in conjunction with the traders, breed wars; if they do not directly and designedly encourage them, they do those things which lead to wars; and the military are only called in at the last moment in order to put these wars down. It is far better that those who have the responsibility of fighting the Indians should have thrown upon them the inducement to keep peace with the Indians by managing them well. In this way there would be complete harmony and entire uniformity of interest on this point. Let the responsibility of keeping the peace, as well as restoring it when broken, be thrown upon those whose interest it will be that the peace shall not be broken, because then there devolves upon them the work of restoring it by fighting, which of course they do not desire if it can be avoided.

Upon every score, therefore, of economy, of simplicity, of effectiveness, it seems to me we ought to transfer this bureau. As to the general objection made by the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY,] that this change will not be attended with any economy, surely the gentleman, in making the objection, cannot have considered the subject aright. We pay now a host of officers, agents, sub-agents, &c., from the Commissioner down through the whole category of those employed in attending to the affairs of the Indians. If we transfer this bureau to the control of the War Department we shall get the services of a class of men who are already in the pay of the Government, whose compensation is not to be increased, upon whom all these duties are to be devolved without cost to the Government beyond the expense to which we are already subjected in keeping up the military establishment of the Government. We shall pay no agents; we shall pay no sub-agents; we shall pay no Commissioner; we shall pay nobody except the subordinates actually employed on the reservations; and they are to be employed and paid whether the Indian Bureau should be under civil or military administration. But the long line of intermediate officers, from the Commissioner down until you reach the Indian himself, is to be supplied by the detail of officers from the military service; and then a very large proportion of the present expense would be entirely saved to the Government.

Sir, as we have all promised to be short in this matter, I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] upon whose bill introduced on this subject the report of the Committee on Military Affairs was based, and therefore it is proper he should be heard.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, I think no gentleman of this House can have examined the Indian appropriation bills for the last four or five years without having been alarmed at the constant increase in the appropriations demanded for the maintenance of that department. I think no gentleman who desires to promote economy in the administration of the Government can fail to have his attention aroused to the necessity of some action on the part of Congress with a view to accomplish that result. At the last session of Congress I submitted a table showing the increasing amount of expenditure required for the continuance of our present Indian system. I showed how the estimates had grown from something like one hundred thousand dollars up to nearly four million dollars per annum, according to the estimates submitted to the Committee on Appropriations at the last session of Congress. No other bureau of the Government has made such strides in the amount of expenditure.

It becomes important to us to ask what return the United States and the people of the United States are getting for this enormous expenditure. When that inquiry is made we find instead of peace we are getting more of war, and that every season the whole country is alarmed by Indian attacks and outrages and the fear of a general Indian war. If, then, the present system, which has been attended with a continually increased expenditure, has failed to accomplish the result sought by that expenditure, which is peace and civilization of the Indian tribes, has not the time arrived when Congress should try another system calculated to combine the enterprises connected with the Indians under a single head, instead of the two heads under which they are now managed.

I learn from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that the outrages recently committed by the Indians near Fort Laramie have been attributed to the conflict between the civil and military authorities. He tells me that when the Indians came in large numbers up to the fort for the purpose of having a talk and making a treaty, rations at his request were served out to them from the fort. Well, sir, Lieutenant General Sherman thought it necessary to aggregate a military force there at that time. Consequently the rations to the Indians were stopped. When that was done and these Indians could not be held there during the delays taking place in the administration of the civil branch of the service without food, as the Indians were likely to starve, then the Commissioner of Indian Affairs ordered the cattle in the neighborhood to be bought for their support. In the mean time the Indians were there and nothing was accomplished. Then the military came in again and ordered the stopping of supplies, for military reasons. The Indians were again left unsupported and obliged to maintain themselves in some way or starve, and so came outrages, according to that bureau. It is to prevent results like this that it is proposed to place the superintendency of Indian affairs under one head, and that the War Department.

Does any gentleman here say, as I believe it has been said, that by this you will put a stop to the civilization of the Indians? I say, on the contrary, you will promote that civilization, and I think I could, with time enough, satisfy the House it must result inevitably from change in our Indian system. Does it civilize the Indian who hates a "forked tongue" to send an agent to him who makes a promise in the name of the "Great Father" to give a certain annuity in money and goods, and then when the time comes appropriates the money and most of the goods to his own use? Does it civilize the Indian to teach him dishonesty? Does it civilize him to give him instead of plows small steel mirrors? Does it civilize the Indian when he wants a good blanket to give him a string of beads? Does it civilize the Indians to send agents among them, as in the case of one in 1861 and 1862, who demanded that an Indian chief should take a fraction of the goods he was allowed under treaty and give a receipt in full? That chief, (an Ogalalla Sioux, I think,) indignant at the outrage and fraud attempted upon him, left the fort in disgust, and a messenger was sent after him with the message that the military would be ordered to arrest and shoot him if he did not give a full receipt.

He did so; he refused every particle, even the small package that was tendered, and left in just indignation against the fraud sought to be perpetrated in the name of the United States Government, and there came soon after an Indian war, as it always does come.

Do gentlemen say that they cannot better be protected under the War Department? Here is the testimony of Rev. Mr. Maxfield, a missionary among the Pawnees, a very short extract of which I will read for the purpose of showing what they think upon this subject. And let me pause here to make my acknowledgment not only on behalf of myself, but of the country, to the diligence of the newspaper correspondents of this House, who have sought for and obtained certain reports that were made by the investigating committees sent out nearly two years ago to examine into these matters. I find some passages from one of these reports, none of which have been presented to this House so far as I know, published in the Cincinnati Gazette. I would like to read them all, but I will content myself with a single extract.

Mr. HIGBY. One word. I am quite as much surprised as the gentleman himself that those reports were not distributed. I do not know why they were not.

Mr. KASSON. That is just what we all do not know. But, sir, they disclose facts that should go before the country. This missionary, among other things, says this:

"My opinion is, in regard to Indian affairs and the present system, that they are miserable failures. Millions of money have been spent, thousands of lives sacrificed, and yet that the Government has signally failed either to civilize the Indians or secure the safety of the frontiers is patent to all; it can never be done under the present system. No wholesome fear of the Government has been impressed on their minds. Deal with them as with other men and we have nothing to fear. As long as the Government continues to buy their friendship so long will it be held in contempt."

Under this system we are continually being called upon to appropriate annuities and presents to these Indians. If they have not all the blankets they want it is the boast of the Indians that all they have to do is to go down on the Platte and kill a few whites and there will be a proposition made to have a talk with them in order to make peace, and with the talk comes as usual the distribution of more presents. Thus the whole authority and practice of the United States is justly brought into contempt under the present management.

And I wish to say that we must be rid of the whole treaty system in regard to the Indians, and treat them as wards of the Government. We must have an Indian code. We must have a system sufficiently flexible to meet the various emergencies of tribes, civilized and half-civilized, within our jurisdiction. We must take care of them, and not treat them as foreigners. Treating them as foreign nations gives them the right as such to make war. If an Indian agent breaks a treaty, according to the principles of international law they have a right to make war upon us to obtain their remedy. In this the Indian is more logical than the white. Now, we must get rid of this system of treaties with these Indians within our jurisdiction and treat them as wards of the United States, and have a proper code of laws for their government. But for the present we must do what we can to relieve the present system from all the outrages that arise under it both to whites and to Indians.

Now, sir, what does the Indian himself think of this system. I will read an extract from the testimony of an officer of the Indian race, who is on the staff of General Grant, given in the paper laid on our table this morning. He says, after urging the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the control of the War Department:

"Most of Indian treaties contain stipulations for the payment annually to Indians of annuities, either in money or goods, or both, and agents are appointed to make these payments whenever Government furnishes them the means. I know of no reason why officers of the Army could not make all these payments as well as civilians. The expense of agencies would be saved, and I think the Indians would be more honestly dealt by. An officer's honor and interest are at stake, and impel him to discharge his duty honestly and faithfully, while civil agents have none of those incentives, the ruling passion with them being generally to avoid all trouble and responsibility, and to make as much money as possible out of their offices."

Now, sir, every man, I think, who has been out in the Indian country knows this to be true. We have scarcely ever had a civilian among these wild tribes who could secure their respect as military men, who understand them, always secure it. We have rarely had any complaints of Indian agents when they were military men; but I have known Indian tribes to refuse to treat with civilians, and to ask their Great Father to send them a captain to deal with them, because they find that the word of a civilian is not so much to be depended upon.

Now, sir, the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK], from the Military Committee, is unanimously reported to the House by his committee. It is the bill which last session I reported from the Appropriation Committee. It is supported by a part of the Indian Committee. The subject requires prompt and early action on the part of Congress to relieve the Government from the rapidly increasing expenditures of this branch of the public service and from the various wrongs arising from the present system.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I would like to ask the gentleman when and where an Indian tribe which has made a treaty with the Government with Indian agents has violated its treaty obligations. I have heard common charges of this kind made against them, but I will say that the charges were all upon Indian agents and traders.

Mr. KASSON. Let me speak from the record, and so far as Dakota is concerned I refer the gentleman to the appendix to the report of the Indian Commissioner. I will read from Mr. Nesmith's report.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. KASSON. Let us see what the record says:

"Three of these questions were as follows:

"14th. Ought money annuities to Indians be discontinued as far as consistent with treaty obligations?"

"15th. What proportion actually reaches the hands of the Indians?"

"16th. What proportion is received by the trader for goods and supplies already advanced?"

"To these, with others, numerous replies were made, among which were the following:

"Colonel John F. Sprague, of the seventh infantry, who has spent over twenty years of his military life among the Indians, thus writes:

"Question 14. Ought money annuities to Indians to be discontinued as far as consistent with treaty obligations?"

"Answer. Money annuities should be discontinued to the Indians.

"Question. What proportion actually reaches the Indians?"

"Answer. Very little, if any.

"Question 16. What proportion is received by the trader for goods and supplies already advanced?"

"Answer. The whole, if he can wrest it from the Indian. During the period previous to paying the annuity liquor is often sold to Indians and entered upon his account as calico, shirts, blankets, strouding, beads, &c.

"Brigadier General James H. Carlton, commanding the department of New Mexico, replies:

"Question 14. Money annuities should be discontinued as far as practicable.

"Question 15. A very small proportion.

"Question 16. A very large proportion.

"Question 17. What proportion is expended for intoxicating drinks or in gambling?"

"Answer. Nearly or quite all that the Indian gets over and above what he owes, and what is literally grabbed from him, at 'the payment,' by the trader."

"J. Harlan, United States Indian agent for the Cherokee nation, writes:

"Of the amount paid to the Indians nominally by the Government I think it would be safe to say more than ninety-nine per cent. was actually paid to the traders and less than one per cent. to the Indians. I only saw seven dollars paid to an Indian. When an Indian's name was called a trader stated his claim; the Indian said, 'Uhi!' Whether that was yes or no I could not say; but the money was paid to the trader."

"Question 16. In the only payment I ever saw made the proportion was as I stated in the preceding answer. It was all claimed, and nobody disputed it, for goods and supplies already advanced."

The testimony of all honest men who have been out in the Indian country and who know anything about the manner in which our Indian business is conducted is that the present system of Indian traders and agents and sub-agents is wrong. There is a volume of testimony upon this subject taken by a committee of this House which for some reason has been kept back from Congress.

Sir, we cannot, without injustice and dishonor to the United States, allow this system to longer continue; and when a remedy is proposed, which is the only practical remedy, one supported by the men best acquainted with Indian affairs, supported by General Pope, who has spent years upon the plains among the Indians, and who declares this measure to be a necessity, and by other officers of the Army high in the public confidence, I submit that it is time for Congress to consider and adopt it.

Mr. HIGBY. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] if he thinks we cannot have a system in the civil service which will take care of the Indians.

Mr. KASSON. I give up the present system.

Mr. HIGBY. I agree with the gentleman in regard to the present system, but I go for a more stringent system.

Mr. KASSON. The system proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs merely changes the present system in a way to lead to greater expenditures. It proposes to have upon each board a military man, a priest, and a politician, three different interests being represented. I notice that by that bill you actually compel the military men to come before these boards and testify and act under their direction. You thereby increase this very conflict upon the plains between the military and the civil authorities. And I think those boards will satisfy themselves very soon that they can do nothing without the aid of the military. Wherever they go, over the plains or through the mountains, you must send the military with them. Why not, then, put the management of Indian affairs under the control of the War Department of the Government? In that way it will all be united under one head, and if you choose he can send out civilian inspectors. He can order military reports by telegraph over half the continent in a week's time. Under the present system you could not and did not get a report before the House for two years after you sent out a special commission for the purpose.

I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] for the time he has yielded to me. I did not intend, when I commenced, to take so much time as I have.

Mr. HIGBY. How much time, Mr. Speaker, have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eleven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HIGBY. I will yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS.]

Mr. ROSS. Being a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, I desire to occupy more time than three minutes, and I therefore decline the offer of the gentleman from California, [Mr. HIGBY.]

Mr. HIGBY. I now yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DARLING.]

Mr. DARLING. I suppose that time will be all I shall desire to occupy. I desire to say, as a Representative of the great State of New York, that I thank the distinguished Representative from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] for introducing this subject as he has done. I think the time has come when there should be a change in the policy of the Government in reference to the management of our Indian affairs. And I can see no other way out of the difficulties that surround us in this matter than to transfer this bureau to the War Department. By so doing we will secure the discipline and efficiency of that arm of the service, and secure the fidelity which results from that system and that discipline. We will secure friends for the Indians and punishment for those who inflict upon them the wrongs which for a long series of years have induced them to commit atrocities upon the unoffending whites upon our borders. It seems to me that the only idea which has controlled the Government has been to get rid of the irregularities and troubles which have resulted from the intercourse between the Indians and the whites, by driving the Indians still further into the wilderness.

The nomadic as well as the permanent tribes have been subject to this process as the advancing tide of civilization and emigration has overtaken them. I am glad to see the opportunity now offered for the American Congress to do justice in this matter, by taking completely the control of our Indian affairs from the bureau where it is alleged these abuses have so long existed and transferring it at once and without delay to the War Department.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HIGBY. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN.]

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I only desire to say that I have been long of the opinion that any change in the management of our Indian affairs must of necessity be a change for the better. The present system of appointing Indian agents is essentially vicious. These appointments are conferred as rewards for political and partisan services. Selected from the States the appointees have in most cases very little experience in Indian affairs and very little knowledge of the Indian character. Going among the tribes many of these men, as appears from authentic evidence, are governed by the mere motive of making all that is possible during the short time that they can expect to hold their offices. The result of this system is that plundering and fraud are common in the management of our Indian affairs. The wrongs which the Indians suffer drive them into armed conflict with the whites, and then the military force of the country is turned upon them to ravage and destroy.

We need some permanent and efficient system for the management of our Indian affairs. It was urged yesterday by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] that men can be selected from civil life of as high a character as any military officers. Yet I submit that, under the prevailing system of giving appointments as rewards for political and partisan services, we are not likely to obtain suitable men. On the other hand, the accountability of the military officer to the War Department must work a beneficial change in the management of Indian affairs if we adopt the plan advocated by the chairman of the Military Committee. I trust that his proposition will meet the favor of the House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HIGBY. I yield three minutes to my colleague, [Mr. BIDWELL.]

Mr. BIDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that this question is being agitated by this House. It is my fortune to have been intimately acquainted with the condition of the Indians west of the Rocky mountains for the last twenty-five years, and I can say that the disposition manifested by the Government toward those Indian tribes has it seems to me had in view the welfare of the Indians. Congress I believe has had the best intentions in making appropriations for the maintenance of those Indians. I believe that in a great majority of cases the agents themselves have done their utmost to benefit the Indians under their charge. I know from personal experience that it has been the intention of the Indian Bureau to make appointments and spend money in such a manner as to benefit to the greatest possible degree the Indians.

But, sir, it is a lamentable fact that all the efforts which have been made and are being made are not adequate to accomplish what is designed. Some change is absolutely necessary; and I, for one, see no better mode of working the needed reform than by transferring this whole business to the War Department. While I say that I believe this to be the best plan, I do not intend to impugn the action or the motives of any agent or any Department of the Government; for I have already stated that I believe the officers of the Government have acted in good faith. The present system, however, is radically wrong. A change is demanded, and I believe that a military officer is better fitted to superintend an Indian reservation than a civilian. I will tell you why—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HIGBY. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. WINDOM. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] is entitled to the floor to close the debate.

Mr. WINDOM. I yield five minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. HENDERSON.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I feel unwilling to trouble the House with any remarks at the present time; but as a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs I deem it my duty to express my views in reference to the question now under consideration.

I could not, sir, but be surprised to hear the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] make the declaration that the expenses of the Indian department have been increasing for years. It is the most natural thing which could possibly be imagined, for every year the Government of the United States is grasping large portions of the Indian territory. We absorb the lands of the Indians, and every year large numbers of Indians are brought under the care of the Government. Just so long as the Government continues to grasp Indian lands we may expect an increase of expenditure in the Indian department.

It is not my purpose to speak in favor of the present system. I am in favor of a change. I think the plan reported from the Indian Committees is best for the protection of the Indians and for economy in Government expenditures.

I object to turning the charge of the Indians over to the War Department. Experience has proved that the Indians corrupt the military and the military corrupt the Indians. I will not stop to advance proof of that fact; but I repeat that the Indians corrupt the military and the military corrupt the Indians. They work mutual corruption on each other, and the less they have to do with each other the better.

It is true that this Government can pursue toward the Indians the policy of extermination and extinction; and let me say if you want to hasten their extinction you can take no surer mode than by putting them entirely into the hands of the military. I doubt not when you do that your progress will be rapid. If, on the contrary, the Indians are placed under the charge of civilians, their morals will be cultivated, and they will be led through a knowledge of the Christian religion to civilization and peace. The bill under consideration looks to that end; and for that reason, believing it is the best, I will support it. It has been framed in the interest and welfare of the red children of the forest, and I hope it will be passed.

Mr. WINDOM. I now yield twenty minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS,] and when he has concluded, I now give notice I can yield no further.

Mr. ROSS. Mr. Speaker, of the various questions presented to this House none is more entitled to our consideration than the one now pending in relation to these poor wild men of our forests and plains. We should inaugurate a policy of justice and humanity toward them.

And first I desire to call attention to one significant fact concerning our Indian affairs. In 1865 a commission, consisting of four Senators and five members of the House, was appointed, with directions to visit the Indian country and gather as much information as possible of their condition, &c. The fact to which I wish to attract attention is, that although this commission, in consequence of the vast extent over which the investigation was to take place, was divided into three parts, each to take a different direction, yet the nine individuals who did this work unanimously approve and recommend the passage of the measure reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I will call attention to another significant fact, that the committee in the Senate having charge of Indian affairs have sent this bill to this House with the indorsement of that body; and the Committee on Indian Affairs in this House also recommend its passage. The indorsement of these three committees should commend it to the favorable consideration of the House.

I do not pretend there is perfection in the present Indian system. I believe it is wrong from the bottom to the top, and needs a radical reformation; but I am not disposed to go in the direction indicated by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I understand the first objection urged by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is that this bill is a union of church and State. I am satisfied I would be as much opposed to a union of church and State as any gentleman upon this floor. Is there anything like a union of church and State in asking for recommendation from religious societies in the country of civilians for appointment to office? Are these great religious societies to be ignored? My judgment is they can make as suitable recommendations as the Committee on Military Affairs. The gentleman from Ohio says he has had appointed two friends as Indian agents upon his recommendation.

We have had a little experience in this country of military superintendency of the Indians. It became my duty as a member of that commission to visit Bosque Rodondo, in New Mexico, an Indian reservation, where from nine thousand to ten thousand were forcibly held by military authority. They had been forcibly taken from their mountain homes in Arizona Territory, their corn and orchards destroyed and villages burned; driven away from their homes, men, women, and children, in the most inclement season of the year. After this wanton and cruel destruction of their homes and means of subsistence they fled to the mountain fastnesses, and were hunted down like beasts of prey, and compelled at the point of the bayonet to travel hundreds of miles in mid-winter, with snow on the ground, to New Mexico, many perishing by the way from the inclemency of the weather, hunger, and exhaustion.

The seven to ten thousand Indians held by military authority on this reservation in New Mexico have been costing the Government over one hundred thousand dollars a month independent of the expense of the military at the post. I defy gentlemen to controvert the evidence which is furnished unmistakably upon this point. The evidence may be found in the War Department.

And, sir, look at the inhumanity of the manner in which these Indians are treated! I do not desire to say anything against General Carlton or his subordinate officers, who have charge of the Indians. I regard them as gentlemen. But the defect is inherent in the system itself and cannot be remedied. I would be glad if you would look into the report of the Indian agent for New Mexico and see the demoralization that is growing out of this connection between the military and the Indians in this country. The evidence shows that it costs twenty-nine and a half cents a ration for these Indians, when individuals in that country offer to furnish them for fifteen cents. This is a part of the system of governing these Indians by military authority.

They are put upon reservations for the purpose of working the lands. Sir, the system has proved a failure. Why? Because the white man cannot raise anything there. These Indians have been driven from their hunting grounds to that portion of the country where they cannot subsist either by hunting or agriculture. Let gentlemen go out and look at the reservations in the West that have been left for the Indian tribes, and they will find that they are those portions which the white men will not occupy. This reservation is located on a small stream of water called the Pacos, without any timber for firewood or the erection of buildings within fifteen or twenty miles; and when the water gets low in the summer time it is so brackish with alkali, as the evidence shows, that it causes disease and death among them, and the report shows that the mortality among them is very great. Their only chance for fuel is to go out in the inclement weather and dig mesquite roots out of the ground and pack them in on their backs. This is your humane method of governing the Indians by military authority!

Gentlemen tell us it is going to cost us nothing for officers and agents to manage Indian affairs if we transfer this business over to the War Department, for the reason that the officers and men are already in the service. Why, sir, I apprehend that the distinguished gentleman at the head of the Military Committee [Mr. SCHENCK] has found himself with more military officers on his hands than he knows what to do with, and would like to shove them into the civil service to make places for them. According to his theory you may take the greatest villain, thief, or scoundrel in all the country, and you have only to appoint him into the Army and put shoulder-straps on him and all his guilty stains are washed away, and he becomes as white as the driven snow. Now, sir, I am inclined to think that if a man will steal before he gets into the Army there may be a little propensity in that direction left in him afterward.

I can see no good reason for transferring the Indian Bureau to the Military Department. The evidence collected by the commissioner sent out by Congress shows that nineteen out of twenty of all the difficulties that have arisen between the whites and the Indians have grown out of aggressions upon the part of the white men against the Indians. Why, sir, what was the reason alleged for taking these seven or ten thousand Indians from their native home in Arizona and placing them in New Mexico? It was that they made forays in New Mexico and stole horses, sheep, and cattle. And yet the evidence shows that the New Mexicans had stolen from the Indians two horses, sheep, and cattle where the Indians stole one. Nor is this all: the New Mexicans had taken about five thousand of their women and children and sold them into slavery, where they are held as slaves to-day.

Mr. Speaker, while we are looking into this question we should look at it in a spirit of justice. What have we done to these men of the forest, who have heretofore occupied all this vast region of country? We have driven them westward, westward, westward! We said when we got them beyond the great Father of Waters that there they would have a resting place. But the discovery of gold in California and the Territories has changed our resolution; the tide of emigration has reached almost every part of the western country. The buffalo and game, from which the Indians have heretofore procured a subsistence, are disappearing before the onward and irresistible wave of population, and the aborigines are passing away like autumn leaves.

All the land that is fit for hunting, for mining, or for agriculture was taken possession of by the white man. The Indian reservations are planted away off in some place where life cannot be sustained except it be the owl, the wolf, or the snake. And we ask the Indian to remain there and cultivate the soil as no white man, with all the appliances of civilization, would undertake to do. The country where they are located lacks many of the prerequisites for a habitable country. It lacks soil, it lacks timber, and it lacks water; and if they succeed in overcoming some or all of these difficulties, and they make some improvements, get some small portion of the land under cultivation, then the grasshopper, the caterpillar, and the hail-storm come to destroy their crops.

Now, it is perfectly ridiculous to ask people to live in such a country and obtain a subsistence. Take, for instance, the eight or ten thousand Indians now held by the military in the Territory of New Mexico. Why, sir, you could take all those Indians, bring them into the settlements, and board them at hotels and boarding-houses far cheaper than they are now maintained in New Mexico. I think great injustice has been perpetrated upon the Indians in that Territory. While in New Mexico I had an opportunity to see them and talk with them. They came around the committee, old men and women, with tears streaming down their cheeks, and told us how their children were dying from want of proper sustenance and from being compelled to drink the alkali water there. They told us how they had been treated by the military; that they had been driven from their former homes by the soldiers at the point of the bayonet and forced to go on reservations where they could not possibly raise enough to support them. They said they wanted to go back to their old homes. They asked us, when we returned to Washington, to say to their "Great Father" that they wished to be returned to their old homes, where they would be peaceable and quiet. They said that if that was done they would overlook the great iniquity which had been practiced upon them by the people of New Mexico, in stealing their wives and children and selling them into slavery, and they would guaranty that they would be able to support themselves.

Sir, these Indians did support themselves for one hundred and fifty or two hundred years in Arizona, where they formerly lived. But they have been forced away from there by the military and placed upon reservations where white men would starve to death, and now the Government has to pay some $100,000 per month to subsist the Indians there. The care of the Indians in New Mexico is a fair test of what we will have if the whole management of Indian affairs is placed under the War Department. What may we expect? A man is sent out there from the Military Academy; the young officer wants of course to see his name in print; and how is he to do it? Why, he must "punish the Indians," in western parlance. He starts out upon a war hunt, and kills some old men, women, and children, and thereupon his name is paraded in the papers as that of a great military chieftain. All these Indian difficulties are generally brought on by the inexperienced officers who have charge of affairs out there.

I believe the remedy proposed by the joint committee who visited the Indian territories, in the shape of the bill now before us, is the best measure we can have. I have confidence that the bill will, if passed, prevent the speculation now practiced upon the Indians.

Mr. BIDWELL. The gentleman complains of the treatment of the Indians in New Mexico by the military. Now, I ask him if that is not under the present system, which leaves the management of Indian affairs in the Department of the Interior?

Mr. ROSS. I tried when I was out there to find out by what authority the Indians had been hunted down like wild wolves and placed upon reservations where a white man would starve; but I could not find out. In my judgment it is done by the military without authority of law. There are there in New Mexico ten thousand human beings, the wards of the Government, whom we should look after and protect, but who are now held in absolute slavery there.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] asks us to extend that legislation and to give to officers of the Army and permit officers of the Army to go out upon the plains and lord it over the red man of the forest. Sir, I will never give my sanction to so great an iniquity attempted to be fastened on any people. Many of them are placed upon these reservations against their own will, and I know that there are orders made that if they attempt to escape from the reservations and go back to their native mountain homes they are to be shot down like dogs.

These are facts for the House to consider and deliberate upon in determining whether we shall place these Indians, whom we have robbed of their possessions, under the control of such men. I wish all the members of the House could go out and see the payments made to these Indians. They are the wards of the Government and look to us for support and protection. They have no right to sue or be sued, and when imposed upon what is their remedy? They have none in Congress and none in the courts. They have none and know none but retaliation. And it is the injustice practiced on these Indians by vicious white men on the frontier that brings about all the difficulty and trouble between this Government and the Indians.

We inquired, sir, into these difficulties. We made it our special business to look into them, and our report shows that our presence there, in conjunction with the action of General Pope, stopped a war which would have cost the Government millions of dollars.

There are always some men out there of the Army who are anxious to fight the Indians. They all talk about "chastising the Indians." Speculators and contractors urge the Government to send out troops to fight the Indians that they may reap a rich harvest in contracts for transportation and supplies.

My judgment is that if you would withdraw all the troops from the Territories there would not be one man killed of the ten who are now killed. I cannot in the House relate all the facts that came to my knowledge in reference to the abuse and the treatment of the Indians. It could not be related in language that would be proper here. The facts are all incorporated in the testimony which has been presented to the country in a published volume which all may see.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Speaker, the importance of this measure justifies me in soliciting for a few minutes the serious attention of the House.

I have yielded the floor in almost every instance since this discussion commenced to those who were opposed to the bill, and the House has had the argument presented, I presume, in as strong a light as it can be in favor of a transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department. Frauds have been alleged against the administration of the Indian system as it now exists. We admit the existence of frauds; we admit that there has been mismanagement; and the object of this bill is to prevent their recurrence. We believe that after a careful investigation of this subject we have devised a remedy for these evils. It is agreed on all hands that some change is necessary, and because there has been for years a hue and cry throughout the country against the Indian Bureau, it is therefore thought by many that the only remedy is to transfer the management of Indian affairs to the War Department. I think, Mr. Speaker, that before I conclude my remarks I shall be able to show, from some few specimens of the management of Indian affairs by the War Department, that if we adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio we will vastly increase all the evils of which we now complain. I believe, sir, that the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department will add tenfold to the present expenses of the management of Indian affairs; and I will endeavor to present facts establishing this position.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] seems to be the father of this movement; and by the by I understand that in 1865 he made a trip across the plains, and wandering away from his comrades was chased and terribly frightened by a lone squaw. [Laughter.] He thinks that squaw should be placed under the immediate control of the military authorities; and he hastens here and introduces a bill for that purpose. [Laughter.] The gentleman says that his proposition is approved by all who are best acquainted with Indian affairs. Now, Mr. Speaker, I happen to know something on that point. The bill now reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs passed the Senate nearly a year ago. We were not able to reach it in the House during the last session. The attention of those throughout the country who have interested themselves in Indian affairs has since been turned to it; and I have in my possession numerous letters from gentlemen who have given much attention to this subject, all of whom most thoroughly and cordially approve it. Bishop Whipple, of my own State, than whom there is no man in the country better acquainted with Indian affairs, is most anxious for its passage. A delegation from the Society of Friends has addressed me on the subject urging favorable action upon it. Without stopping to read those letters, for I have not the time, I may say that throughout the entire country you will find scarcely a single individual whose attention has been seriously given to Indian matters who does not believe that this measure presents the best remedy that has been proposed for correcting existing abuses in the administration of Indian affairs.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] both oppose this bill and defend the amendment emanating from the Military Committee on the ground of economy. On that point I wish the attention of the House for a few moments. The gentleman from Iowa says that when we look at the fearful increase in the appropriations for Indian affairs, it is time that we should pause and ascertain whether some remedy cannot be found for the extravagance of the present system. He says that the expenses have increased within a few years until they now reach nearly four million dollars.

The fact, as stated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in a letter to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, is that the appropriations in 1866, instead of being $4,000,000, were $2,468,050 for the entire Indian service. This included all payments under treaty stipulations and the providing for and taking care of three hundred thousand Indians. Mr. Speaker, this is the alleged extravagance of the Indian department.

Mr. KASSON. I understand that a little while ago, during my absence from the House, the gentleman made some personal allusion to myself. I should be glad to know what it was.

Mr. WINDOM. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment.

Now, let us look for a moment at a specimen of the management of Indian affairs by the War Department. There are six thousand Indians in New Mexico on the Bosque Rodondo, who are under the entire management and control of the War Department; and documents now before me show that the expenditures for those six thousand Indians were $1,500,000 in one single year. That is what it cost the War Department to take care of those six thousand Indians; while this terribly extravagant Indian Bureau takes care of three hundred thousand Indians for less than double that sum. The cost of subsistence of those six thousand Indians in New Mexico was a little less than $700,000, and the cost of transportation for them a little more than $800,000. Documents before me show that the cost of transportation for the $2,468,050 expended by the Indian Bureau is only $127,868. It will be seen, therefore, that in the item of transportation alone, it costs the War Department six times as much for six thousand Indians as it does the Interior Department for three hundred thousand Indians. Yet we are asked with apparent sincerity to transfer the control of Indian affairs to this wonderfully economical War Department in order to save money to the Treasury.

But a little further on that subject. When the gentleman from Ohio was addressing the House yesterday and speaking of the protection given to the Indians by the military, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] asked me how much it cost to kill one Indian; to which I replied about one million dollars. He seemed to think that was a little extravagant, and I agreed to compromise on $500,000 per Indian. Now, after further reflection and investigation, instead of compromising on $500,000 for each Indian killed, I should double my former estimate.

On the 7th of June last I had the honor to introduce into this House a resolution calling upon the Secretary of War to inform us what was the cost of the military expeditions for the suppression of Indian hostilities in 1864 and 1865, and I ask the Clerk to read the answer.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, December 3, 1866.

SIR: In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of June 7, 1866, directing the Secretary of War to inform the House what amount of money has been expended for the suppression of Indian hostilities, &c., during the years 1864 and 1865, I have the honor to send herewith reports on the subject from the Quartermaster General, the Commissary General of Subsistence, and the Paymaster General, from which it will be seen that—

The Quartermaster's department expended in 1864.....	$9,110,372 00
1865.....	19,263,850 00
The Subsistence department expended in 1864.....	155,459 74
1865.....	359,788 46
And the pay department expended in 1864.....	508,953 95
1865.....	1,132,512 78

And that the total expenditures in 1864 and 1865 amount to.....$30,530,942 93

Some of the above information having been only recently received, this report could not be made in time for the last session of Congress, but the earliest opportunity is now taken for presenting it.

Your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

39TH CONG. 2D SESS.—No. 57.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. Speaker, you will perceive by this report of the Secretary of War that the Indian military expeditions of 1864 and 1865 cost over thirty million dollars. The expedition in the Northwest under General Sully cost in quartermaster's stores alone $6,636,000. Let me give the result of that expedition, as stated by one well acquainted with the facts:

"General Sully, with ten hundred and sixty-three officers and men and eighteen hundred and sixty-seven horses and mules, during a campaign of several months, having marched more than sixteen hundred miles, did not succeed in killing a single Indian, except probably one Indian killed after the expedition returned to Fort Rice. An express rider claims that he killed one; so that matter is in dispute. The Indian at any rate was admitted to be friendly and foolish. General Sully is an excellent officer; it was not his fault because he did not find the Indians; he could not overtake them; they were too cunning and too fleet for him. His loss of course was not heavy; he did, however, kill about one hundred horses, to prevent them from falling into the hands of the Indians. I have been informed by a general officer in the United States Army, who has had a large experience in Indian affairs, who says it costs nearly two million dollars a year to support a regiment in the Indian country—$2,000,000 to kill one Indian."

The report of the Secretary of War shows that over six million dollars were spent in killing this one Indian; and it is still doubtful whether he is living or dead. [Laughter.]

So much for the question of economy. These are specimens of what the War Department can do. Over thirty million dollars expended in two years, and excluding the massacre of friendly Indians by Colonel Chivington in cold blood, I venture to say it has cost the Government on the average over two million dollars for every Indian killed by the War Department.

Mr. KASSON. When I was absent from the House I understand the gentleman from Minnesota alluded to me, saying that a squaw followed me when I was upon the plains and did not catch me. In his case I suppose the squaw did overtake him. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINDOM. I admit the gentleman can run faster than I can. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. One other point I wish to present, and that is touching the number of Indians killed.

Mr. WINDOM. That settles the squaw question, and I cannot yield further. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. I want to state one fact touching the number of Indians killed in that war. That is one side entirely of the question of what caused the war. The number of Indians killed in the fight north of the Upper Platte and near the Powder river in a single engagement by military report appears to have been much larger, four or five times at least, than the number now stated by the gentleman. I was on the plains at the time the battle took place.

Mr. WINDOM. Was that General Pope's report?

Mr. KASSON. No, sir.

Mr. WINDOM. I did not know but it was one of those battles where ten thousand prisoners were taken.

There is a point made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] to which I wish to allude, namely, that this transfer will be for the benefit of the Indian himself. Let us look at a few facts on that point and see how much the friends of the "poor Indian" propose to do for him by this transfer. As I have said before, we can only take a few instances, because there are but few of them where the military has had entire control, for the purpose of showing what they would do if clothed with full powers. In these few instances we may ascertain what would be the result if the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Ohio should pass.

Take, for instance, the case of the Indians at Bosque Rodondo, to which I have referred. I ask the Clerk to read a short extract from the report of Mr. Norton, the superintendent for New Mexico, as to the manner in which gentlemen of the military profession treat the Indians under their control.

The Clerk read as follows:

Extract from the Annual Report of Superintendent Norton for 1866.

"Of the state of the health and morals of the Navajos you can form some idea from the inclosed report of the surgeon of the hospital; and from the best information I could gather when I visited the Basque the tale is not half told, because they have such an aversion to the hospital that but few of those taken sick will ever go there. What a commentary is this on the humanity, Christianity, and civilization of the white man! what a disgrace to the nation that seven thousand Indians, while held as prisoners of war, are thus treated; that the family circle is invaded and their women, their wives, and daughters, are thus prostituted and diseased by the embraces of licentious soldiery! You will also see by the report of my conference with the chiefs that they complained of being molested by the soldiers. The only remedy for all this unbridled sensuality and licentiousness must come through the Secretary of War, in an order through the proper channels, to the commander of the post."

Mr. WINDOM. I will leave that extract, without comment, to make its own impression upon the House and the country.

But there is one other case to which I will refer, and that is the management by the War Department of Indian affairs in Colorado Territory. I send to the desk to be read the deposition of James D. Connor, lieutenant of the first infantry New Mexico volunteers, taken by the special committee of investigation. I have erased from this report certain portions describing the action of white soldiers, because they are too atrocious and revolting to be read in the hearing of this House; too horrid even to be spread on paper.

The Clerk read as follows:

FORT LYON, COLORADO TERRITORY,
January 16, 1865.

Personally appeared before me, Lieutenant James D. Connor, first New Mexico volunteer infantry, who, after being duly sworn says: "that on the 28th day of November, 1864, I was ordered by Major Scott J. Anthony to accompany him on an expedition (Indian) as his battalion adjutant; the object of that expedition was to be a thorough campaign against hostile Indians, as I was led to understand. I referred to the fact of there being a friendly camp of Indians in the immediate neighborhood, and remonstrated against simply attacking that camp, as I was aware that they were resting there in fancied security under promises held out to them of safety from Major E. W. Wynkoop, former commander of the post of Fort Lyon, as well as by Major S. J. Anthony, then in command. Our battalion was attached to the command of Colonel J. M. Chivington, and left Fort Lyon on the night of the 28th of November, 1864; about daybreak on the morning of the 29th of November we came in sight of the camp of the friendly Indians aforementioned, and were ordered by Colonel Chivington to attack the same, which was accordingly done. The command of Colonel Chivington was composed of about one thousand men; the village of the Indians consisted of from one hundred to one hundred and thirty lodges, and as far as I am able to judge of from five hundred to six hundred souls, the majority of which were women and children; in going over the battle ground the next day I did not see a body of man, woman or child but was scalped, and in many instances their bodies were mutilated in the most horrible manner."

"I heard another man say that he had cut the fingers off an Indian to get the rings on the hand; according to the best of my knowledge and belief these atrocities that were committed were with knowledge of J. M. Chivington, and I do not know of his taking any measures to prevent them; I heard of one instance of a child a few months old being thrown in the feed-box of a wagon, and after being carried some distance left on the ground to perish."

"All these matters were a subject of general conversation, and could not help being known by Colonel J. M. Chivington."

"JAMES D. CONNOR,
First Lieutenant First Infantry New Mexico Vols."

Mr. BIDWELL. I would like to ask whether the conduct of Colonel Chivington was not rebuked by the War Department at the time?

Mr. WINDOM. I presume, Mr. Speaker, that it was rebuked; but when gentlemen stand here arguing that it is for the benefit of the Indian to turn him over to the hands of men who have shown themselves capable of such brutal conduct, I think it is but fair that some examples of their mode of treatment should be presented to the House.

Here was a band of about five hundred friendly, quiet, and peaceable Indians, encamped with their wives and children, attacked by one thousand United States soldiers, massacred in cold blood, and treated in a manner which would make the very fiends below blush for shame.

I would have preferred not to call the attention of the House to this revolting subject, but I do it as an offset to the charge made against the civil service. If anything can be found in the conduct of the civil authority half as bad as this, I will vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. HIGBY. I have the best authority for stating that before I left San Francisco in the fall of 1865 a lieutenant in command of a squad of men then in the service of the United States in Nevada came across the dead body of a squaw who had upon her breast a living infant, and the lieutenant ordered one of his men to take that child and throw it over a precipice and throw stones upon it so as to destroy it. I have the best authority for making that statement.

Mr. WINDOM. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] referred to the events which occurred near Fort Laramie. I desire at this time to call the attention of the House to some other facts in connection with that post.

"FORT LARAMIE, D. T., December 26, 1866.

"Christmas is come and gone, and we are heartily glad of it. Never during our course of human events have we been blessed with the liberty of viewing so much obscenity, debauchery, and drunkenness. The whole garrison was on a 'bust.' With one or two exceptions, every officer, non-commissioned officer, and private were more or less under the influence of liquor yesterday. The scene beggars description, and even did it admit of minute record pen and ink would rise in revolt at such atrocious application. Last evening the officers resolved to celebrate the event of it being Christmas night, and right merry did they do it, too; in a measure equaling, or rather reenacting the day's glories, and the night was made hideous by many a jest and song of an intoxicated officer and soldier. Fighting was the order of the day, and the unemployed bullies were in all their glory. At all hours of the day we might see some disgraceful brawl going on—no effort on the part of the proper authority to restrain them. In fact, but a reenactment of the New York riot of 1863 on a small scale, and the fact of there being many of that honorable fraternity present (still unhung) rendered the simile semi-perfect.

"And yet, while all this was transpiring, we hear the rumor—which we dare not doubt—of a bloody and sanguinary fray at Reno, resulting in the loss of life of many of our comrades and soldiers. The rumors are conflicting, yet at least fifty men are the victims of the Indian massacre. Yet later reports even exceed this. So soon as full particulars are received I will transmit them to you."

Here, in this far off Indian country, was a garrison sent out to keep peace between the whites and Indians, and while they are on a drunken frolic fifty white men are massacred within a short distance of them. Oh, how rapidly all evils and abuses would disappear if the entire Indian system could only be placed under the control of such men! Sir, I do not doubt that there are many good men among these officers. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] asks whether there was an Indian agent there. There is, I believe, no Indian agent at Fort Laramie. It is one of those places where the gentleman's system is carried out to perfection; there is no Indian agent there to interfere with the operations of the military in any way. There was no conflict of authority either arising out of the presence of an Indian agent at Sand Creek, where Colonel Chivington murdered over one hundred and eighty peaceable Indians, men, women, and children. There would be no conflict of authority at any point where there is an Indian agency if the military authorities did not always interfere in what is not their business.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to ask the gentleman how it is that he can claim that the carrying on of wars against the Indians, cruelly or otherwise, affects the question of the administration of the Indian department? Does the gentleman propose that under his system no troops shall be kept there, and that if there is trouble with the Indians that no troops shall be employed to suppress it.

Mr. WINDOM. It has a great deal to do with it in this connection, to show how the War Department treats the Indians when left unobstructed by Indian agents.

But, sir, I am aware that I labor under great disadvantage in presenting this bill for the reason that there exists a strong prejudice against the Indian department, and I know that it is not wholly unfounded. Gentlemen believe that any change would be for the better, and jump at the conclusion the one proposed by the amendment will accomplish the desired object. I am very sure they are mistaken, and that if the amendment shall become a law it will not only cost the Treasury untold millions but will produce consequences at which humanity will blush.

Now, I ask members of the House to pause and consider well this question before they make so radical a change as is proposed. There will be time enough to adopt this proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] when his committee is called for reports. Have I not shown facts enough concerning the treatment of the Indians by the military authorities to justify me in saying that even if a transfer should be made there will be quite as great necessity as now for a supervisory board, such as proposed by the bill?

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, which is simply to transfer this bureau to the War Department without providing for any supervisory authority. The system proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, as I stated the other day, will cost the Government some forty thousand dollars per annum for the salaries of the members of the boards of inspection. I have attempted to show you something of the expense of Indian wars. Now, if by sending out these boards we can prevent one war in a half a century it will result in a vast saving to the Government. Is it not at least worthy of a trial?

I now ask that a vote be taken upon the bill and pending amendments.

The first question was upon the amendment offered by Mr. DONNELLY to the original bill, to add to section three the following:

And in case of the suspension of any Indian agent the duties of his office until the confirmation or rejection of his successor by the Senate shall be performed by the assistant agent or in case there shall be no such assistant agent then by the chief clerk of such agent; and it shall be the duty of the President to transmit to the Senate with the nomination of his successor a statement of the causes of such suspension.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next question was upon the amendment offered by Mr. CHANLER to the original bill, to add the following section:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the rights, privileges, and franchises conveyed to the black men within the States and Territories of the United States by established law thereof, be, and are hereby, given and secured to all the Indians having the protection of this Government under existing laws; and that all laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this section be, and are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The next question was upon the amendment offered by Mr. SCHENCK, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That from and after the 1st day of July, 1867, the Secretary of War shall exercise the supervisory and appellate powers, and possess the jurisdiction now exercised and possessed by the Secretary of the Interior in relation to all the acts of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and shall sign all requisitions for the advance or payment of money out of the Treasury on estimates or accounts, subject to the same adjustment or control now exercised on similar estimates or accounts by the Auditors and Comptrollers of the Treasury, or either of them.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall be authorized, whenever in his opinion it shall promote the economy and efficiency of the Indian service, to establish convenient departments and districts for the proper administration of the duties now imposed by law on the superintendents of Indian affairs and upon agents and sub-agents, and to substitute for such superintendents and agents officers of the Army of the United States, who shall be designated for that purpose, and who shall then become charged with all the duties now imposed by law upon the superintendents and agents thus superseded, and without additional compensation therefor. The Secretary of War shall also detail an officer, not below the rank of brigadier general, to fill the office and discharge the duties of Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Officers of the Army designated to perform the duties of Commissioner, superintendent, agent, or sub-agent shall not be required to give the bonds now required of civil appointees, but shall be responsible for any neglect or maladministration according to the Rules and Articles of War.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all contracts for transportation connected with the Indian service shall hereafter be made in the same manner and at the same time provided for transportation for the use of the Army.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall be authorized to withhold all special licenses from traders, and, under regulations to be by him prescribed, to provide the times and places at which all traders complying therewith may present themselves for bargain, barter, and exchange with the several Indian tribes, according to the laws of the United States regulating the same.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. SCHENCK. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 73, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Bromwell, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Deming, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hunter, Kasson, Ketchum, Koontz, Kuykendall, Lufkin, George V. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Stigraeves, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, and Stephen F. Wilson—42.

So Mr. SCHENCK's amendment was adopted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to reconsider the vote just taken; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

On the question, Shall the motion to reconsider be laid on the table? there were—ayes 74, noes 68.

Mr. WINDOM. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 77, nays 70, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Bromwell, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Deming, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Stigraeves, Starr, Stilwell, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, and William B. Washburn—44.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the bill, as amended, be laid on the table, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can call the yeas and nays on ordering the bill to be read the third time.

Mr. WINDOM. Very well; I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on ordering the bill, as amended, to be read the third time.

Mr. WINDOM. On that I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 52, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Warner, Whaley, Windom, and Winfield—52.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Arnell, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Boyer, Brandegee, Chanler, Culver, Davis, Defrees, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Goodyear, Grinnell, Hawkins, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Koontz, Latham, Lynch, Marvin, McCullough, Miller, Morris, Myers, Newell, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Stilwell, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, and Woodridge—48.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The bill was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend the title so as to make it read "A bill to transfer the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the War Department;" and on that demand the previous question.

Mr. WINDOM. I move to make it a bill to massacre the Indians and deplete the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 660) entitled "An act for the relief of Captain James Starkey;" whereupon the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 32) to prevent the absence of territorial officers from their official duties; and izing the Secretary of the Treasury to permit the owners of the yacht Mayflower to change the name of the same to that of Silvie.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment an act (H. R. No. 660) for the relief of Captain James Starkey.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that all prior orders be postponed to take up the bill regulating the tenure of civil officers.

Mr. WRIGHT. I object.

EXEMPTION OF PROPERTY IN DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, as the first business upon his table, amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 218, exempting property of debtors in the District of Columbia from levy, attachment, sale, or execution, returned by the Senate, with concurrence in the first and non-concurrence in the second amendment.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved the House recede from its second amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ILLEGAL VOTING IN THE DISTRICT.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, the House took up Senate bill No. 479, to punish illegal voting in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

The first section of the bill provides that any person not duly qualified to vote in the District of Columbia, who, knowing that he is not so qualified, shall vote or offer to vote therein, or who shall procure or attempt to procure himself to be registered therein as a voter, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding six months, and not less than two months; and the second section declares that if any person, being a qualified voter in the District, should knowingly vote or attempt to vote in any other ward or election precinct than that in which he shall be lawfully entitled to vote, or should unlawfully and knowingly vote or attempt to vote more than once, or in more than one ward or election precinct, or should so vote double therein, he should be punished by imprisonment not exceeding six months and not less than two months, and be disqualified from voting thereafter in the District.

The third section provides that there shall be five judges of elections within and for the city of Washington, and three within and for the city of Georgetown, the same to be appointed by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, who shall hold their office for two years and until their successors shall be appointed and qualified, and whose duty it shall be, prior to each election, to prepare a list of the persons qualified to vote in the several wards of said cities in any election; and said judges shall be in open session in their respective cities to receive evidence of the qualification of persons claiming the right to vote in any election therein, and for correcting said lists, on two days, not exceeding five days prior to each election for the choice of city officers, giving prior notice of the time and place of each session in some newspaper.

Section four declares that prior to said election the said judges in the respective cities shall post up a list of voters thus prepared in one or more public places in said cities, and at least ten days prior thereto; and section five further declares that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEVENS. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the fortification appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that. There is a very important bill lying on the Speaker's table which we ought to reach and can reach by proceeding with the order now.

Mr. STEVENS. I think you cannot get through that to-day, and I therefore insist on my motion.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 38, noes 64.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 388, to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

The amendments of the Senate, which were mostly of a verbal character, were concurred in.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES COURTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the consideration of the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 605, to amend an act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, approved September 24, 1789.

The amendment of the Senate was to insert after the word "courts" the words "within their respective jurisdictions."

Mr. COOK. I move that the House concur in the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would ask whether anybody in this House, when he gives his vote on these amendments, knows what he is voting upon? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is not in order. The question is on the motion to concur.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOK, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUNISHMENT OF CRIMES.

The next business in order on the Speaker's table was the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to House bill No. 719, to punish certain crimes in relation to the public securities and currency, and for other purposes.

The amendments were read, being in relation to the terms of imprisonment and the amount of fines.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest whether it would not be better to have these amendments so read that the House may understand the effect and purport of them.

The SPEAKER. They relate to the number of years of imprisonment for counterfeiting, reducing it from fifteen years to ten.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not refer to any particular one, but all of them.

The SPEAKER. They all relate to the same subject.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not deem it necessary to give any more extended explanation of the amendments of the Senate than that which the Chair has already given. They are mainly a reduction of the terms for which the party may be imprisoned, and the amount of fine that may be imposed.

Mr. MAYNARD. May they not be so read with the context that we may see what the words are?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will ask that the Clerk read the first amendment of the Senate, in connection with the context of the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I was declared out of order only a few moments ago for asking what we were voting upon. There is now a bill before the House providing for the infliction of punishment for certain crimes, and am I out of order for asking in what way the Senate have seen fit to amend it?

The SPEAKER: The gentleman is not out of order in asking that, and he was not called to order for that, but for stating that the House was voting without knowing what it was voting upon.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is exactly the case, sir. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read the first amendment of the Senate with the context.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that all the amendments of the Senate be concurred in, unless some gentleman desires a separate vote upon any amendment. I will state that all these amendments are designed to conform the penalties provided by this bill to those now provided by existing law or the crime of counterfeiting.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WINONA AND ST. PETERS RAILROAD.

Bill of the Senate No. 494, for the relief of the Winona and St. Peters Railroad Company, was next taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

RAILROAD FROM SAN FRANCISCO TO HUMBOLDT.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order upon the Speaker's table was the consideration of the bill of the Senate No. 133, granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the waters of the bay of San Francisco to Humboldt bay, in the State of California, which bill was postponed on the last night of the last session, and again postponed on the 18th of December.

Mr. McRUER. I ask for the consideration of that bill at the present time.

Mr. HALE. I think it is a bill that ought to be referred to some committee.

Mr. McRUER. Let me say that, although it is a Senate bill and is now upon the Speaker's table, it has, nevertheless, been considered by the Committee on Public Lands, and I am authorized by that committee to present an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the bill.

It will be recollected by the House that this bill was postponed on the evening before the last day of the last session of Congress. It has been before the Committee on Public Lands for at least six months, and has been carefully considered by them. They have prepared an amendment which is to be submitted as a substitute for the original bill.

I would not, sir, press the bill upon the House for action now, were it not that this is probably the last opportunity that we shall have during the present session to consider it.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman from California permit me to suggest that it is hardly possible that this bill can be passed to-night without some further consideration than the House can now give it? I suggest to him therefore that if he is unwilling to have the bill referred to a committee he allow it to retain its place upon the Speaker's table for the present.

Mr. McRUER. I have no objection to that course.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the bill will remain upon the table. The Chair hears no objection.

TENURE OF CIVIL OFFICE.

The next bill taken from the Speaker's table was bill of the Senate No. 453, regulating the tenure of certain civil offices; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HALE. I desire to put this bill upon its passage as early as reasonably may be. There are several gentlemen, some upon this side of the House and some upon the other, who desire to be heard upon it. It is a subject to the discussion of which the House has already devoted some days upon a similar bill reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] That discussion involved all the questions which are involved in this bill; and I therefore give notice that if it be consistent with the views of the House I should like to bring the House to a vote upon this bill at four o'clock to-morrow afternoon, thus affording an opportunity to some gentlemen to be heard upon it.

I understand, however, that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations desires to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on an appropriation bill, and I have no objection to that course being pursued if this bill will come up to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. It will be the unfinished business to-morrow morning.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, [Mr. POMEROY in the chair,] and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 919, making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868.

By unanimous consent the first reading of the bill was dispensed with, and the Clerk proceeded to read it by clauses for amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend the bill by inserting at the end of line eighteen the following:

For commencement of two additional forts for the defense of Portland harbor, Maine, including the purchase of sites, $150,000.

I desire to state very briefly, if I can get the attention of the committee, that I am instructed to offer this amendment by the Committee on Military Affairs, and that they propose it at the instance of the Secretary of War, who forwarded to that committee a communication from the chief of Engineers, General Humphreys. This item was left out by the Committee on Appropriations, but he gives substantial reasons why the appropriation should be made at this time. I do not desire to debate the matter at any length, and unless some gentleman desires further information I will with this brief statement leave the question to the committee.

Mr. SPALDING. I think we have thrown away money enough on fortifications already; and unless those items come to us in the regular estimates I think we better vote them all down.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—ayes twenty.

Before the noes were counted,

Mr. BLAINE said: I desire, if there is no objection, to make a statement to the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not know there would be any objection to this item, or I would have made a further statement when I had the floor.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to any debate after a division upon the question.

Mr. BLAINE. I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. BLAINE. I now move to amend by inserting the following:

For the commencement of two additional forts for the defense of Portland harbor, Maine, including the purchase of sites, $155,000.

That is $5,000 more than my other amendment proposed to appropriate, and is therefore a different proposition. Upon this amendment I am entitled to the floor, and I will make a statement to the House of the facts of this case as concisely as I can.

The chief of Engineers recommends an appropriation of $150,000 for the purchase of sites and the commencement of two forts in the harbor of Portland, Maine. He says, in a communication to the War Department, under date of January 24, 1867, which I now hold in my hand—

"The largely increased range of modern artillery has had the effect of diminishing the security hitherto afforded by such of our sea-coast works as are situated so near to the objects they are designed to cover that iron-clads may approach near enough to shell those objects without being themselves seriously endangered by the works. It therefore becomes necessary in such cases to establish an exterior line of works which shall hold an enemy's ships at a greater distance, while the present works will serve the indispensable purpose of a second line with which to meet the enemy with a powerful fire in case he should force the new outer barrier, or pass it with a portion of his fleet, while the rest are engaged with the works. This is the condition of things at Portland, where the present line of works, consisting of Forts Preble, Scamell and Gorges, are so near the city and shipping in the harbor, that both the latter may be shelled simultaneously with an attack upon the works."

Mr. Chairman, in the opinion of the Engineer corps, and especially of those who are entrusted with our sea-coast defenses, the city and harbor of Portland are of superlative importance, deserving and demanding the utmost protection that the most thorough fortifications can afford. The city and harbor do not deserve this merely because of the thirty thousand enterprising inhabitants in the one nor the valuable shipping in the other; but because of the immense importance of the position as affecting the defenses of the whole country in the event of a foreign war. Should we ever be so unfortunate as to have a war with England, her first point of attack would be Portland, and with her powerful navy against the fortifications we now have there it would be presumptuous folly to declare that she might not capture it. And I ask gentlemen on this floor if they can measure the magnitude of that loss to us and gain to our enemy. It would at once give to England not only the finest naval station on the North American coast, but would give her the command of the entire line of the Grand Trunk railway. And England in possession of Portland, Quebec, and Montreal, could hold the Grand Trunk railroad against any force we could bring against her, and holding it she would have, both winter and summer, the most expeditious and complete channel of supply to her troops along our northern frontier from Island Pond to Detroit.

Indeed the loss of Portland and the Grand Trunk road would be as heavy a blow to us in a war with England as we inflicted on the rebels when we captured New Orleans and regained control of the Mississippi river. And I assure my friend from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] that in resisting this small appropriation of $150,000 at this time he may be putting in peril that which, if once lost, $150,000,000 would fail to regain. I am not seeking to give the impression that there is now the slightest prospect of war and I trust the day is very remote when we shall have to encounter such a calamity. But we know the old injunction as to our duty "in time of peace," and we know, moreover, that a thorough preparation for war is the surest way to escape it. Impregnable fortifications are least frequently assaulted! These are the views which have governed the engineer department in urging the erection of additional forts at Portland, and with this brief presentation of the leading facts of the case I am willing to submit the question to the judgment of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I object to this appropriation, for the reason that it is for the commencement of a new work. It is not to carry on a fort already commenced there, but it is to commence a new fort there in Portland harbor: an appropriation of $150,000 to commence new forts. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] says that it is necessary to have these outer forts constructed for the purpose of strengthening the forts already built there. He may with equal propriety ask for an appropriation to build still another line of forts outside of those now proposed, in order to strengthen them when they shall have been built. Beside, there are no estimates from the War Department for this expenditure; none at all.

Mr. BLAINE. This item comes to us in a communication from the War Department, signed "Edwin M. Stanton," who, I believe, is still Secretary of War. I hold in my hand his letter transmitting the communication from General Humphreys, chief of Engineers, from which I read an extract at the beginning of my remarks. Mr. Stanton, in his own letter, says:

"These new works recommended by the chief of Engineers are regarded as very important, and have the approval of the War Department."

I ask the gentleman from Ohio if this is not a very distinct and very emphatic recommendation from the proper official quarter?

Mr. SPALDING. I ask that the Committee on Appropriations, which is formed for the purpose, shall have the poor privilege of investigating these matters. The Secretary of the Treasury sent to us his estimates, including those from the War Department, which did not embrace any for this purpose.

Mr. BLAINE. I have already stated that this is a regular estimate made by the War Department. It was sent, as such communications usually are, to the Military Committee, of which I am a member; and it is by express instruction from that committee that I have submitted the pending proposition. The gentleman from Ohio will observe that it comes here through the regular, proper, recognized, and authenticated channel.

Mr. SPALDING. The proposition to make this particular appropriation at this particular period of time is a very extraordinary one. I think we are dealing with the money of the people in a very loose way when we undertake to vote away, at the instance of some one member of this House, $150,000 for a new fortification.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman says this is asked at the instance "of one member of this House." Why, sir, I have this moment detailed the circumstances under which this proposition is now here. It came, I repeat, from the Engineer Bureau, specially indorsed and recommended by the Secretary of War, approved by the Military Committee of this House, and now moved by me in pursuance of instructions from that committee. I hope I need not have to repeat these facts again.

Mr. SPALDING. I say further that, during the last year, we have voted $500,000 probably for this very town of Portland—

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, no.

Mr. SPALDING. And gentlemen should not complain if we require a little time for deliberation before we vote $150,000 more.

Mr. LYNCH. I move to amend the amendment by making the amount $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] that there have been estimates for these works from the War Department; and the gentleman will find them upon page 86 of the book of Departmental Estimates. The estimates sent in by the Department for these very works amount to $150,000. The appropriation for this purpose is not included in the bill reported by the committee; but it is among the estimates from which the bill was made up.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will permit me to say that his statement is correct. A proposed appropriation for this work was included in the estimates; but it is a rule of the Committee on Appropriations, where an entirely new work is proposed, to wait until the appropriate committee of the House has reported in favor of the construction of the work, before acting on such estimates. I understand that the Committee on Military Affairs have considered this subject and are in favor of the construction of these works. I ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to state whether this proposition comes formally from that committee.

Mr. BLAINE. It does come formally from that committee. I offer this amendment by instruction of the committee, as I have already stated more than once; otherwise the motion would have come from my colleague [Mr. LYNCH] who represents the district in which Portland is situated.

Mr. LYNCH. Mr. Chairman, I had no knowledge that any such amendment would be offered. If my colleague had not presented it as a member of the Military Committee I should not have offered it, for the reason that I do not consider military works as matters of merely local importance. In my view the fortifications around the harbor of Portland are not for the benefit merely of that city. When, therefore, propositions of this kind come up here I do not feel especially called on to advocate them as local matters. If they are not matters of national importance appropriations for them should not be made by the national Government.

With regard to the necessity for these new works let me make a single statement. In October, 1861, the Secretary of State, in a communication to the Governor of Maine, asked the coöperation of the State and the loan of its credit toward fortifying the harbors of the State. On account of that communication the Governor of Maine appointed a commission, and that commission conferred with the United States authorities on the subject. A military commission was sent to examine the coast of Maine. It examined, among other points, the old fortifications around Portland, and made plans and estimates for new fortifications. These very works were estimated for at that time, and are upon the plans of the engineer department submitted in 1861. The present proposition is simply to carry out the plans of the engineer department submitted at that time. I desire the Clerk to read an extract from the reply of the Governor of Maine to the communication of the Secretary of State, for it sets forth very clearly the facts of the case.

The Clerk read as follows:

From the State line at Kittery to West Quoddy Head, in a coast line of three hundred miles, there are over one hundred good harbors at which ships are built and manned, with an actual shore-line of more than three thousand miles, following the line of tide-water into navigable bays, inlets, and deep river estuaries. Not one harbor is properly defended, and in only three have attempts at defense been made.

The highest military authorities would undoubtedly concur in the opinion that Portland should be made the great naval depot of the United States on the Atlantic ocean. Its geographical position commands Canada on the north, and the lower Provinces on the east, if properly fortified, as lines of railway, completed or in process of construction, radiate from it to Quebec and Montreal, and to St. John and Halifax. The harbor is one of the finest on the Atlantic ocean or in the world, and can easily be so fortified as to be as impregnable as Gibraltar, and far stronger than Quebec, Sebastopol, or Cherbourg. Halifax harbor, the great British naval depot on the American continent, now occupied by the combined fleets of England and France, closes the outlet of the great gulf lying between Cape Cod and Cape Sable, and unless Portland is defended the whole peninsula east of Lake Champlain is easily subjected to foreign control.

If Great Britain held the harbor of Portland and the line of railway to Montreal and Quebec she would drive American commerce from the ocean and the great lakes. The strategic importance of Portland is shown by reference to any general map of the whole country, and its capabilities for defense are exhibited by the charts of the United States coast survey of 1859.

Portland harbor is an arm of the sea, formed by five outlying islands that shut out the swell of the ocean. The main or great ship channel is only one hundred and seventy rods in width, carrying from eight to ten fathoms at low water, inside Bangs Island. This island is the natural fortress that defends the approach to the harbor; its outside shoreline, extending over one mile in a nearly straight line, rises about eighty feet above the level of the sea. The distance from this outer shore-wall of the island is less than three miles from the densely populated portion of the peninsula on which the city is built. Behind this natural fortress ships-of-war may lie in deep water and shell the city, entirely protected from the guns of Fort Preble, Fort Scammel, or Fort Gorges. In point of fact, the present forts are of very little, if any, value in defending the city from guns of long range used in modern warfare.

Bangs Island contains two hundred and twenty acres. By fortifying this island all possible approach to Portland by water with large ships is cut off. In that event no holding ground or place of anchorage can be found where gunboats can reach the city without coming within range of the guns of its fort or those of Fort Gorges.

By making Bangs Island a fortress, Fort Gorges may be advantageously changed into a water-battery, with only one tier of guns, and the expense of the proposed casemate-battery saved, and thereby Portland would become impregnable by water.

The town itself is situated on a high peninsula, once an island two and a half miles in length and averaging three fourths of a mile in width, around which still sweep the tide-waters of Casco bay, approaching within a few rods from opposite sides. A ditch of a few rods length will change this peninsula into an island, and secure a flow of the tide completely round the city. The land rises more or less abruptly on all sides from the water, reaching an elevation of one hundred and seventy-six feet at the western end, and one hundred and sixty-one feet at the eastern end of the peninsula, so that a redoubt at each end of the city overlooking its moat or ditch, and commanding the approaches by land or across Back bay, will prevent all approach to the city. No land rises so high as that of the peninsula of Portland within ten miles. One tenth of the expense of fortifying Sebastopol or Cherbourg would make Portland one of the strongest fortresses of the world.

As a harbor of refuge that of Portland is unrivaled, and the approach of a storm is foreshadowed by a movement of vessels in that direction. Between five and six hundred sail have been known to enter Portland harbor for shelter in a single night, and six hundred sail can be often counted on a clear morning standing out to sea after an easterly storm.

The first intimation of trouble with any leading foreign Power would be the entrance of a hostile fleet into Portland harbor.

The embarkation of the Prince of Wales on the 20th of October, 1860, illustrated the facility with which five men-of-war, some of them ships of the largest size, may enter or depart from this secure anchorage. The whole British navy can lie as easily in Portland harbor as in a dock at Woolwich.

An enemy in possession of Portland would find it to be the terminus of the longest line of railroad in the world. The Grand Trunk railway of Canada embraces a line of one thousand one hundred and thirty-one miles, of which one thousand and ninety-six are in actual operation. It extends from the Atlantic ocean at Portland to Lake Huron, a distance of seven hundred and ninety-six miles, with a branch to Detroit of fifty-nine miles, a branch to Quebec of ninety-six miles, and to the River du Loup of one hundred and eighteen miles; making, with all its branches, one thousand and ninety-six miles. This line has the capacity to move ten thousand troops between Portland and Quebec or Toronto and Detroit in a single day.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LYNCH. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, I should be sorry if this assumed the character of a local question, and it is well enough to inform the House how this comes before it.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I renew the amendment just withdrawn in order to explain how this comes before the House. Among estimates for works deemed to be essentially necessary by the War Department was included this, with two or three others not put in this bill by the Committee on Appropriations. Seeing this, a communication was sent to the Committee on Military Affairs from the Secretary of War, inclosing a full report from the Engineer Bureau, together with these same matters for the consideration of the committee, and asking the committee if it approved them to incorporate them in this bill by way of amendment. The committee came to the conclusion to recommend this appropriation for Portland, and every one of them, except one, and that the largest item.

This amendment has been moved by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] in pursuance of the consideration of the Committee on Military Affairs, and it is only asking the House to put in what was estimated and asked for by the War Department, and left out by the Committee on Appropriations, as already stated.

It is not a local affair. It lies in the north-east, in Maine; but Ohio, as every other part of the country, is interested in keeping up the defenses at every inlet or outlet within our limits. Every part is interested in keeping up these forts.

Although lying up in New England the Committee on Military Affairs do not consider it a local affair, and have therefore instructed the gentleman from Maine to move this amendment, which will be followed by others.

My colleague asks why at this time, when the country is in a condition of embarrassment on account of the public expenses, these heavy works should be undertaken? My answer is twofold: first, in time of peace we should prepare for war; and second, these changes are rendered of imperative necessity by the changes in modern artillery.

Mr. SPALDING. Is it not questionable whether fortifications, since iron-clad ships have been built, are of any use?

Mr. SCHENCK. We have only to refer to the instance of Fort Sumter. Although the iron-clads battered down the walls and reduced it to a heap of ruins, yet our ships could not get by it. I think they are useful, and may be made more so with the changes rendered necessary by modern offensive warfare on the part of iron-clads. It may be eventually our forts will be fully iron-clad, but I believe no one has arrived at the conviction, at least of those who are competent to judge, that forts can be done away with altogether. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KASSON moved to reduce the appropriation to $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee divided on the amendment, as amended; and there were—ayes 51, noes 28; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEVENS moved the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. POMEROY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill No. 919, making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1868, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. COOK, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DEFREES for the remainder of the week.

NATIONAL BURGLARY INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the National Burglary Insurance Company of the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I move that after to-day the House take a recess from half past four o'clock p. m. till half past seven p. m.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent; a majority can order a recess for to-day.

Several MEMBERS objected.

GOVERNMENT OF VIRGINIA.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that all questions relating to the general subject of reconstruction must be referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. They must.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have a memorial from citizens of Virginia, praying that the present State government be set aside, and that a civil government be organized upon the basis of equality before the law, which I would like to have printed and referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

No objection being made, it was so ordered.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, asked and obtained leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. BARKER, for one week.

Mr. HOTCHKISS asked and obtained indefinite leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. HUBBARD, who had been called home by the death of his father.

TAXATION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. HOTCHKISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to exempt certain public lands from taxation; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

PACIFIC MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. McRUER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to authorize the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and the Sandwich Islands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. CULLOM: The petition of Ellen Curry, widow of James Curry, a private soldier in company F, thirty-ninth regiment Illinois volunteers, now deceased, asking for a pension from the United States.

By Mr. DAVIS: The petition of Messrs. B. A. Wood, H. H. Porter, J. B. Munn, and 24 others, citizens of Onondaga county, New York, praying that Congress will not legislate for reduction of the currency or for an immediate return to specie payments; also, praying that all national banks may not be compelled to redeem their circulating notes in New York.

By Mr. DODGE: The petition of Jackson S. Shultz and others, asking that the leather trade may be placed on the same footing as other staple manufactures.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: The petition of James W. Albert, and 25 others, citizens of Ohio, praying that wines manufactured from the grape may be exempted from internal taxation.

By Mr. ELIOT: The petition of H. R. Snow and J. Young, and others, citizens of Barnstable county, Massachusetts, praying for amendment of act of July 28, 1866, and for relief as manufacturers of salt.

Also, the petition of Benjamin F. Berry, and others, citizens of Barnstable county, Massachusetts, praying for relief as manufacturers of salt.

By Mr. FARNSWORTH: The petition of J. E. Hurlbut, and others, citizens of Chicago, against any further curtailment of national currency.

By Mr. HALE: The petition of V. N. B. Milliotta, of Champlain, New York, late first lieutenant United States volunteers, praying allowance of the three months' extra pay on muster out.

By Mr. HARDING, of Illinois: The petition of Martin Monroe, of Illinois, that bounty paid substitute be refunded.

By Mr. MERCUR: The petition of 89 citizens of Monroeton, Bradford county, Pennsylvania, asking that a pension may be granted to Seth H. Steel.

By Mr. MYERS: The petition of the white beer brewers of Philadelphia, stating that the removal of this species of malt liquors from the brewery for the purpose of bottling causes it to spoil, and asking a modification of the revenue laws in regard to it.

By Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania: The petition of William M. Meredith, Eli K. Price, and others, members of the Philadelphia bar, praying for an increase in the salary of the United States district judge for the eastern district of Pennsylvania.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of citizens of Lebanon, Ohio, praying that there may be no further curtailment of the currency.

Also, the petition of business men and property holders of Washington, for the removal of the railroad nuisance and obstruction of streets and avenues around the Capitol.

Also, the petition of Charles E. Behle, late major twelfth United States colored artillery, praying compensation for military services.

By Mr. VAN HORN, of New York: The petition of 785 citizens of Niagara and Oswego counties, New York, embracing among them merchants, bankers, forwarders, vessel owners, and masters of vessels, asking an appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Olcott, Niagara county, New York.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 31, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. S. H. ANGBER, D. D., of Rockport, Massachusetts.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LANE. I desire to present the petition of Mrs. Margaret A. Russell, praying for compensation for certain lots of sugar taken by our Army at Vicksburg, in July, 1863. I know nothing in reference to this case except the facts stated in the petition. I move its reference to the Committee on Claims.

It was so referred.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of members of the bar of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying for an increase of the salary of the judge of the United States district court for the eastern district of Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORGAN. I present a memorial of surgeons' stewards, paymasters' stewards, and others, who have served in the United States Navy during the rebellion, in which they state that by the laws and regulations existing during the rebellion, and in force at the present time, their services were not credited to the States to which they severally belonged in the quota of men furnished for the suppression of the rebellion; second, that they did not receive the State or Government bounty, not being enlisted; third, they were appointed under the rules of the Navy Department and selected for their several grades by special qualifications for the position occupied, and their term of service was not for a specified time, depending on the exigencies of the service; that the remuneration was at rates long established and before the advance of prices of all the necessities of life and the depreciation of the currency, and is altogether inadequate to the support of themselves and families; that the enlisted men received both State and Government bounty and further received an increase of pay in 1864, while these memorialists equally shared with them the dangers and privations of the naval service and have received neither bounty nor increase of pay. Under these circumstances they ask the consideration of Congress. I ask the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

It was so referred.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented the petition of Joaquin De Palma, praying for compensation for property taken from his family by United States troops under the command of General Sherman at Winnsboro, South Carolina, on the 21st of February, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SHERMAN presented four petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER presented three petitions of citizens of Philadelphia, praying for such an amendment of the Constitution of the United States as will prohibit legislation in any State making a distinction among the citizens thereof on account of color, race, or birth; which were referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

He also presented the petition of Little, Brown & Co., of Boston, praying for an investigation into the contract made under an act of Congress with the Secretary of State in 1845, for the manufacture of stereotype plates for the volumes of the Statutes-at-Large, and for the supply of copies of the same, which contract, it is alleged, is being affected by the proposed codification of the laws; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That Frances Ann McCauley have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate her petition and accompanying papers, praying for compensation for judicial services performed by her late husband, Daniel S. McCauley, as consul general at Tripoli, in the Barbary States, and Alexandria, in Egypt.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 527) to amend the postal laws, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 510) declaring a bridge to be built over the Missouri river at the town of St. Charles, in the State of Missouri, by the North Missouri Railroad Company, a legal structure, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 421) to authorize the construction of a submerged tubular bridge across the Mississippi river at the city of St. Louis, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of Elisha P. Moulton, praying that his claim as an original inventor of iron-clad gunboats may be recognized and rewarded, submitted an adverse report, and moved that the subject be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Grafton Page, praying that a patent issue to him for his invention of a magneto-electric apparatus for administering electricity as a remedy for diseases and for purposes of scientific illustration, submitted an adverse report, and moved that the subject be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, representing that they labor under great disadvantages from the frequent violations of trade-marks, and praying for relief by extending the law of copyright to trade-marks, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Manufactures; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 392) for the relief of the heirs of George Faber, reported adversely thereon, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of John Carter, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 554) granting a pension to John Carter. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 819) for the relief of Richard A. Vervalen and others, submitted an adverse report, and moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; which was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 24) for the relief of Lucretia M. Perry, widow of the late Nathaniel H. Perry, United States Navy, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 58) to extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 555) granting lands to aid in the construction of the Tebo and Neosho railroad and the extension; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PATTERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 556) for the relief of Caroline McGee, of Greene county, Tennessee, widow of Lemuel McGee, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FOWLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 557) for the relief of James Fulton, paymaster United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

On motion of Mr. WILLEY, the bill (S. 389) for the relief of Stephen R. Parkhurst, was recommitted to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

SOLDIERS' ORPHANS' HOME.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate last evening passed the bill (H. R. No. 848) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home," approved

July 25, 1866. I merely desire to have the motion to reconsider entered at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 479) to punish illegal voting in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 912) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1868, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (S. No. 525) supplementary to an act to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, approved July 18, 1866, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had receded from its second amendment to the bill of the Senate (S. No. 208) exempting the property of debtors in the District of Columbia from levy, attachment, or sale on execution.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 605) to amend an act to establish the judicial system of the United States, approved September 29, 1789, and to the bill (H. R. No. 719) to punish certain crimes in relation to the public securities and currency, and for other purposes.

CONDITION OF INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to report to the Senate the condition of the Indians now located in the vicinity of Lake Traverse and Fort Wadsworth, Dakota Territory, at the time of the outbreak in Minnesota in 1862; the part they took in connection with that outbreak; the cause of their being permitted to remain so near the Minnesota frontier when the other surrendered Sioux were sent to the Crow Creek reservation in 1863; whether they have been uniformly friendly in their relations with the whites since the outbreak or otherwise; whether they have any reservation allotted them; and whether they have been the recipients from the Interior Department since the outbreak of any annuities, clothing, provisions, or agricultural implements; and whether their removal from their present location to a point more removed from the Minnesota frontier is contemplated by the Interior Department.

FOREIGN MINISTERS AND PRESIDENT'S POLICY.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, any correspondence between the Department of State and any of the foreign ministers of the United States with reference to the policy of the President toward the States lately in rebellion, and especially any inquiries by the Department of State with regard to the conversation or opinions of such foreign ministers.

DEPUTY MARSHALS, ETC., IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to communicate to the Senate the number and names of the deputy marshals, bailiffs, and criers in the District of Columbia who have received compensation for the year 1866, the rates of compensation and amount paid each.

CLAIMS OF LOYAL EAST TENNESSEANS.

Mr. PATTERSON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be directed to inquire into the justice and expediency of compensating the loyal people of East Tennessee for property taken from them for the use of the Army of the United States, the claims for which property were investigated by a commission appointed by General Burnside, consisting of Messrs. Morrow, Dickinson, and Williams, and also the claims investigated by a commission appointed by General Schofield, consisting of Messrs. Dickens, Pearson, and Williams; and report by bill or otherwise.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOWE. I did not hear it, and I should like to have it read again.

The Secretary read the resolution.

Mr. HOWE. I do not think there can be any objection to the reference of that subject to the committee.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

IMPORTATION OF GOODS WITHOUT INSPECTION.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the provisions of law allowing goods imported from foreign countries to be brought into the interior of the country under seal and without inspection at the usual ports of entry, and to report by bill or otherwise.

TREATY WITH HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

Mr. CONNESS. If it be in order, I now move to take up for consideration the resolution I submitted yesterday, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to the Senate whether, in his opinion, American interests would not be subserved by a treaty of commercial reciprocity with the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no doubt, sir, that the Secretary of the Treasury can furnish the Senate with very valuable information upon this as he could upon almost any other financial or commercial subject; but I am opposed to the adoption of the resolution and cannot vote for it, or at any rate, I am not disposed to allow it to be adopted without entering my protest against it; and for this reason: it carries with it the implication that commercial treaties are within the province of the President of the United States, in conjunction with the Senate, and that we have the power to tie up the trade and commerce of the country without the coöperation of the House of Representatives. We have attempted to do this once, Mr. President, in our history. We established a reciprocity treaty with the British Provinces in North America. We got rid of that treaty fortunately, shortly after the civil war began; but everybody can comprehend fully what would have been the condition of this country if there had not been a clause in that treaty by which it could be brought to a conclusion within ten years from the time it began. Why, sir, I apprehend that the whole trade and commerce of the country would have been entirely deranged at the present time if the treaty in relation to trade with the British Provinces had not contained within itself the power to abrogate it at the expiration of ten years. It is for this reason, and for this reason alone, that I oppose this resolution—not but what I want to have the most close and intimate relations with the Sandwich Islands. With the purpose which the Senator from California has in view ultimately in regard to those islands, I entirely sympathize; but I do not recognize the power of the Senate of the United States and the President to control the legislation of the country through a commercial treaty in relation to our trade regulations with other countries; and as I do not apprehend that we have any such power, I do not want to convey the implication by the adoption of a resolution that we can do any such thing.

Mr. CONNESS. I have listened to a little the strangest argument that has been heard in the Senate, since I have been here at least. A resolution is offered calling upon one of the Departments for information upon a subject of vital interest to a large portion of the American people, and the Senator who has just spoken rises in his place and says, "I object to the passage of the resolution; I object to all commercial treaties for reciprocity; I deny the power of the President and the Senate to tie the hands of the House of Representatives." Now, sir, I humbly submit that the honorable Senator has fired off his great gun too soon, and that he had better wait until there is a treaty presented to him for consideration, and then I shall be very much interested in hearing his arguments. I represent a constituency that are deeply interested and intimately connected in commercial and other intercourse with the Hawaiian Islands. This resolution points to obtaining from the most legitimate and well-informed source of this Government information touching the commercial relations of the two countries. Who can object to obtaining that information? I apprehend nobody, save the honorable Senator.

The resolution was adopted.

MINISTER AT VIENNA.

Mr. SUMNER. I now ask the Senate to be good enough to take up the resolution which was objected to yesterday making a call on the President for a letter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to take up the following resolution; which will be read for information.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be instructed to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interest, a copy of the letter on which the Secretary of State founded his recent inquiries addressed to Mr. Motley, minister of the United States at Vienna, with regard to his reported conversations and opinions, and to furnish the name of the writer of such letter.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope that resolution will not be taken up. I think it is an attempt on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts to magnify into some importance one of the merest trifles that ever happened. I trust that no such trifle will be thrown into the Senate to disturb its deliberations and to consume its time.

Mr. SUMNER. I content myself with simply saying that I hope the resolution will be taken up. I think that when a stab is given at an eminent citizen abroad we ought to know who has dealt the blow. I wish to know the authority for this recent letter of inquiry addressed by the Secretary of State to a distinguished gentleman in our public service. I believe that the country wishes to know who this spy or eavesdropper is, and on what authority the Secretary of State has undertaken to write such a letter as he has written. I feel a personal interest in it and an interest as a Senator, for I think the letter of the Secretary does great dishonor to our country.

Mr. DAVIS. I presume that the distinguished minister of the United States to Austria does not care a straw in relation to this letter which is thus sought to be brought to light. His fame is national and world-wide, and is too solidly founded to be disturbed by any such matter. Motley—the historian who has produced to the world such a picture of the rise of the Dutch republic—it is a name too grand, founded upon too solid worth and ability, and the man who could have conceived and executed such a great historical work is too grand in his intellect, in his soul, to be disturbed by such a trifle, such stuff as that which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts is seeking to make a little political capital of! I trust, sir, that this anonymous letter, like so many of the anonymous letters which that honorable Senator has produced so often before the Senate, will be left to pass into oblivion and to go to the back-houses. I hope the Senate will not consume its valuable time nor permit itself to be interested one moment by the matter of this letter. I trust the motion of the honorable Senator will not prevail.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The resolution being put; there were, on a division—ayes 20, noes 5; no quorum voting.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the honorable Senator from Massachusetts yesterday to state that he had himself received a letter of precisely the import—

Mr. SUMNER. Similar import.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Of similar import to the letter which is referred to in the correspondence which has been furnished to the Senate. I should like to inquire from the honorable Senator from Massachusetts who that letter was from.

Mr. SUMNER. I stated that it was from a person so utterly obscure that it was practically an anonymous letter, and I considered it as such. It was from a person utterly unknown; and yet on that letter the Secretary of State has undertaken to indite the accusations which we have read against an eminent gentleman in the public service.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator fails to answer the precise question I put: who was the author of the letter to the honorable Senator?

Mr. SUMNER. I have already replied that the name was so utterly obscure that it has passed out of my memory.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Although the honorable Senator from Massachusetts is familiar with the names of a great many men, it is not to be presumed that he knows all the citizens of the United States or men abroad who could furnish information of this description; and I ask the honorable Senator if he is to presume that every man whose name he does not know is of necessity an obscure man, whose statements are to be disregarded. It seems to me it is unnecessary to inquire into this matter. Suppose it should appear that this information was communicated by some person whose name was not known to the Senator from Massachusetts, or to any of us, what difference would it make? The correspondence already before the Senate states the fact that a letter of that description was received, and inquiry was made of Mr. Motley whether the statements contained in it were true or not. Perhaps the Secretary of State does not choose to treat a letter of an American citizen abroad, though he did not happen to know his name, as coming from a person so absolutely obscure that he would destroy the letter and forget the name.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, it is well enough to understand exactly what it is that we are proposing to do. The State Department has been called upon to give the Senate information in regard to a correspondence between the Secretary of State and our minister at Vienna. That correspondence has been given. I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts is satisfied that the minister has vindicated his position sufficiently. The letter is of sufficient length for that purpose in reply to so short a note as was addressed to him by the Secretary of State. The question that is made by the Senator from Massachusetts is, whether the man who communicated the information to the President, upon which the Secretary of State thought it his duty to address the minister at Vienna, was a distinguished man or an obscure man. That is the inquiry that he asks the Senate to-day to make. Who can question that the Secretary of State ought to have addressed this note to the minister at Vienna if the information was in fact communicated to the President as stated? Let me call the attention of the Senate to the statement that is made by the Secretary of State in his note to Mr. Motley. Here it is:

"Sir: A citizen of the United States has addressed a letter to the President from Paris, in which he represents that he had traveled extensively in Europe during the last year, in the course of which he had had occasion to see something of our ministers and consuls in various countries; that most of those whom he met were bitterly hostile to the President and his Administration, and expressed that hostility in so open a manner as to astonish Americans, and to leave a very bad impression on Europeans. He adds that you do not pretend to conceal 'your disgust,' as he says you style it, at the President's whole conduct, that you despise American democracy, and loudly proclaim that an English gentleman is the model of human perfection: that the President has deserted his pledges and principles in common with Mr. Seward, who, you say, is hopelessly degraded."

Now, Mr. President, if any minister abroad, if any representative of the Government of the United States at any country, used language such as this, was it not the duty of the Secretary of State to make inquiry about it? If he used language depreciating the Chief Magistrate of this nation in the presence of foreign Powers; that the President had conducted himself so as to produce a "disgust" on the part of his minister abroad; that this minister despised "American democracy," a term not used in regard to political differences, but a comprehensive term, referring rather to the character of our institutions, and that that minister loudly proclaimed that "an English gentleman is the model of human perfection;" that the President had "deserted his pledges and principles in common with Mr. Seward, who is hopelessly degraded"—ought not information coming to the State Department or to the President of such language used by a foreign minister to be inquired into on the part of the State Department? No man will question it. Has any minister—I do not care how eminent he is—a right to go abroad and proclaim that our institutions are a failure; that the principles that underlie those institutions are despised by him; that the President is an object of disgust to him; and that the Secretary of State is hopelessly degraded? Has any minister a right to use such language to European hearers? I deny it, sir. Whatever may be our misfortunes, it is not the business of the representatives of our Government abroad to proclaim those misfortunes or anything that goes to the dishonor of the Government. Then, sir, this ought to be inquired of by the Secretary of State; and the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts cannot, in his place, say that it is the right of a minister abroad to use such language in regard to the high officers of the Government whom he represents abroad, and whose opinions he must reflect there in regard to our foreign intercourse, especially in regard to the American democracy.

Then, sir, it comes down simply to the question whether the person who wrote this letter is a distinguished person or a very obscure person. The Senator says he is so obscure that he cannot now recollect his name. I suppose, then, it comes to this: that information communicated to the Government is not to be acted upon unless it comes through some highly respectable source, as the Senator from Massachusetts would esteem it. I say that such information as this coming from abroad required the attention of the Government, and no man is sufficiently eminent that he can shield himself from a responsibility in regard to an accusation of this sort.

I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to know whether the man who wrote this letter is eminent in the world of letters; whether he is a distinguished man; in other words, whether the President of the United States has opened his ear to an American citizen of obscure position. If he be not an eminent man the President must not hear when he speaks in behalf of the honor of the nation; but if he be an eminent man it is all right. "Eminent" by birth? Is that what is meant? Or "eminent" because of position attained? That is the inquiry we are now to make. The Senator wants to know who wrote the letter, whether he is an eminent man or whether he is an obscure man. Did the President, who ought to represent all the people of this country—not the eminent men alone, but the obscure—allow his ear to be opened to information communicated by some citizen of obscure position? If he did he is to be very much censured here, I suppose. I do not understand that the truth can come to men in high position only from men of eminent position. It is the duty of the President to allow his ears to be open to information from every source.

If the Senator wishes to establish the fact that this person was not entitled to credit, and therefore to censure the Secretary of State because he placed any reliance upon the information, that is another inquiry; but his statement is, that he is rather an obscure man, because he does not know him; he does not recollect his name; and he wants the Senate to inquire who it is that should dare to write to the President in regard to a foreign minister, of such obscure position as that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts does not know him. I expect there are three hundred thousand citizens in Indiana whom the Senator does not know; and if one of those citizens whom the Senator does not know should write to the President in regard to a matter that touches the honor of the country, and the President should allow himself to be influenced by that information, the Senator would say, "Why, here is an eminent man that is attacked by an obscure man, and the President has allowed his ears to be open to this information coming from an obscure citizen of the State of Indiana?" Is that an argument that we are to hear here in the Senate? Sir, in this land the President is to hear all, and not the eminent alone, but the obscure. The rich, the learned, and the eminent can take care of themselves: it is the obscure and the men who have no power in and of themselves, and because of their political association, that the President ought to hear and defend in all their rights.

But now, in the American Senate the position is assumed that the Secretary of State has listened to information from an obscure source, and the Senate is asked to inquire into the degree of the obscurity of this man. Shall he not inquire when he is informed that a representative abroad has said that the President is an object of "disgust?" Shall he not inquire when a representative abroad has said in European ears that the Secretary of State, representing the dignity and honor of this nation in her foreign relations, has "hopelessly degraded" himself? Shall he not inquire when he is informed that an American minister has denounced "American democracy?" He must inquire; he dare not refuse to inquire, however eminent that minister may be; the more eminent the greater the fault.

Then, as I said, it comes down simply to the question whether the Senate shall inquire whether the person who communicated from Paris this information was a person of obscure birth or obscure position in life. If he is not eminent, the Secretary of State is to be censured. If he be eminent and known to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, then it is all right on the part of the Secretary.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there, just to bring the question down to the point? I raise no question whether he is an eminent person or not. The Senator, I think, will do me the justice to believe that I had no such idea as that. I simply wish to know the writer of the letter, and the actual terms of the letter that we may judge of its value and of its character; that we may know whether or not he is a spy, possibly a paid spy, an eavesdropper, possibly a paid eavesdropper; and whether or not he is in any respect entitled to credence. That is what I wish to know; and I think that all who are interested in the good name of this Republic, under whatever party flag they may go, whether under that which the Senator from Indiana honors by his support, or whether under that where I find myself—all equally must desire to have satisfaction on this point. We must desire to know on what authority the Secretary of State has proceeded in this matter; and in making the inquiry, it is of supreme indifference to me whether the person is eminent or not. I do not ask that question. It does not enter into my mind. I only wish to know whether he is entitled to credit, and to that end I wish to see his letter.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then, Mr. President, I think with the present explanation of the Senator, his language yesterday and this morning was very unfortunate. In his criticism upon the Secretary of State, in writing to Mr. Motley upon information from an obscure person, I think that his language was unfortunate. If the Secretary of State got this information, to whom ought he to communicate it? He made no public matter of it; he did not publish it to the country; but he says to Mr. Motley: "Sir, a man has written to the President that you have used this language; did you use it or not?" He gives him an opportunity to explain it, and it never comes before the world until the Senator from Massachusetts brings it out. There was no effort on the part of the Secretary of State to prejudice Mr. Motley or anybody else before the American people; but a letter was addressed to Mr. Motley for explanation in regard to information that has been communicated to the President, information that the President could not shut his ears to, whether it came from an eminent or obscure person. Yesterday the Senator felt himself authorized to say:

"I have the honor to be a friend of Mr. Motley, and therefore it is that I have introduced the resolution. I am also a Senator of the United States, and I deem it important to the public interest that we should know on what authority the Secretary of State has undertaken to address one of our foreign ministers as he has. I received a letter identical in language, so far as I can judge, with that which seems to be set forth by the Secretary of State in his letter, and it was addressed to me from Europe, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations; but it was from a person so entirely obscure that I regarded the letter as nothing but anonymous, and I throw it into the fire. The Secretary of State has made it the basis of inquiries addressed to Mr. Motley, which I will not here characterize."

"Which I will not here characterize." What is there, sir, to characterize? The Secretary of State says to Mr. Motley: "Certain information has come to the President; what explanation have you to make of it? Did you denounce the American democracy? Did you say that the President was an object of disgust? Did you say that the Secretary of State was hopelessly degraded?" Whom should he have addressed except Mr. Motley? He addressed him, gave him this information, and allowed him to make an explanation. Is not Mr. Motley's explanation sufficient? Is it not satisfactory? Does the Senator on this information expect to make a more satisfactory explanation for Mr. Motley than he has made himself? Or does he want to find some obscure man in Paris, a citizen of this country, and attack him? What is the purpose of all this? What does it mean? What does the Senator want it for? This was not made public by the Secretary of State; it is made public by the Senator from Massachusetts. It has not been used by the Secretary of State to the prejudice of Mr. Motley; but Mr. Motley has been allowed an opportunity to explain, and the correspondence laid among the files of the Department until called for by the Senator. Now, what is wrong about this? Should not Mr. Motley be allowed to make his explanation when such charges are presented? If any man makes a charge against me I shall be obliged to the friend who will allow me an opportunity to explain, and shall not say that it is a thing "not to be characterized," to be denounced. I shall not say that, and Mr. Motley cannot say it. If he is asked for an explanation, and he makes it, he must stand there, and, as his friend, the Senator from Massachusetts, cannot say that the Secretary of State did wrong in allowing Mr. Motley an opportunity to explain in regard to so grave a charge. This is all I have to say.

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion to take up the resolution, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered?

Mr. FESSENDEN rose.

Mr. SUMNER. Just let the yeas and nays be taken.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The morning hour has expired, and I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

TARIFF BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the last vote disclosed the want of a quorum. Senators have since come in, and the Chair decides by counting that there is now a quorum present, so that business may proceed. The pending amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was on page 30, section seven, to strike out lines one hundred and twenty-seven, one hundred and twenty-eight, one hundred and twenty-nine, one hundred and thirty, one hundred and thirty-one, and one hundred and thirty-two, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

On chains, trace chains, halter chains, and fence chains, made of wire or rods not less than three eighths of an inch in diameter, two and a half cents per pound; less than three eighths of an inch in diameter and not less than No. 9 wire gauge, six cents per pound; less than No. 9 wire gauge, eight cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have the Senator make an explanation about that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In reference to this amendment, I desire to say that a number of persons in New Jersey and elsewhere engaged in the manufacture of chains became satisfied that the tariff did not afford them sufficient protection, and the commissioner in looking at the price of the material out of which these chains were made became satisfied that there should be an alteration in the bill, and this amendment was, as I understand, prepared by him. It was handed to me by him, and I think it is in his handwriting. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have sent for the commissioner to inquire as to the fact. He will be here in a moment. If he is the author of it and it meets his approbation I do not know that I shall make any particular objection to the amendment. I ask the Senator to withdraw it for a moment, and he can offer it again when the commissioner is in. I believe his colleague has an amendment which he desires to offer, and which can be considered in the mean time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well.

Mr. CATTELL. My colleague has withdrawn his amendment for the present, and I ask leave to offer an amendment on page 32 of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inquire of the other Senator from New Jersey if his amendment is withdrawn?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. For the present.

Mr. CATTELL. I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate more than a moment. The amendment which I wish to offer is on page 32, section seven, line one hundred and seventy-two, to insert the words "one and" after the word "pipe;" so that the clause will read:

On cast iron, steam, gas, or water-pipe, one and three fourths of one cent per pound.

These words were stricken out in committee the other day under a misapprehension. The amendment I propose returns the duty upon this article precisely to what it is under the existing tariff, to precisely what the special commissioner of revenue recommended, to precisely what the Finance Committee reported, and a lower rate than that agreed to by the House.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As the amendment to strike out these words has been adopted, I suppose the object can be reached by a motion to reconsider.

Mr. CATTELL. The motion to strike out was adopted in Committee of the Whole I am told, and therefore it can be amended in the Senate without a reconsideration.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRESWELL. The other day I made a motion to amend the bill on page 63, section nine, line five hundred and forty-six, by striking out "four" and inserting "five." On that motion I failed. I have another now to submit, and that is after the word "four" in that line to insert the words "and one half;" so that it will read:

On chromate and bi-chromate of potassa, four and one half cents per pound.

I hope the Senate will not deem me persistent in urging an increase on this article unreasonably. I am satisfied now, as I was when I made the original motion, that five cents per pound is as small a duty as should be placed upon this article with a view to a proper protection on the home manufacture.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If nobody else objects to this increase I will not.

Mr. CRESWELL. Then I hope the amendment will be adopted, so as to make that duty four and a half cents. It seems to be acceptable to the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I now renew the amendment which I withdrew a few moments since.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall make no objection to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend, by striking out on page 16, line eleven, of section four, all of that clause after the word "specified," and to insert:

Valued at one dollar or less per pound, fifty cents per pound specific, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over one dollar, and less than $1 50 per pound, fifty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, forty per cent. ad valorem; valued at over $1 50 per pound, fifty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, forty-five per cent. ad valorem.

The clause which I move to amend relates to the duty on "broadcloths, cloakings, cassimeres, ladies' cloths, doeskins, tricots, and all other fulled or felted goods or fabrics, woolen shawls, flannels, and all manufactures of wool of every description, made wholly or in part of wool, not herein otherwise specified." This clause covers more than two thirds of the woolen interests of the country. When the arrangement was made with the wool-growers, with whom this special matter originated, and it was agreed that ten cents a pound and ten per cent. ad valorem should be levied on imported wool, the committee said in their report, which is quoted by the commissioner:

Nothing less than a specific duty of fifty-three cents per pound on such manufactures will be sufficient to place the manufacturer in the same position as if he had his raw material free of duty, a protection which he must demand as an imperative necessity for the preservation of his industry.

The House of Representatives cut this down from fifty-three cents specific to fifty, and the bill of the Senate committee reduces that from fifty to forty-five, and the reason given for that reduction, as I understand, is that the dye-stuffs are placed in the free list. I will simply say that the dye-stuffs are a very small part of the cost, a mere trifle, and putting them on the free list does not compensate or begin to compensate for this reduction of five cents. I understand also that the class of goods named in this paragraph are mostly made out of imported wools that cost on an average about fourteen cents per pound. Almost all this wool costs from thirteen to sixteen cents, averaging about fourteen cents per pound, and the duty upon that is about eighty per cent., being ten cents a pound and ten per cent. ad valorem. Suppose the wool average fifteen cents, and it take four pounds of wool to make a pound of cloth. Forty-five cents a pound duty is put upon the manufactured article to offset the increase of duty on the wool, and then there is beside thirty-five per cent. ad valorem, ten per cent. of that will go to pay the internal revenue, leaving just twenty-five per cent.; and that in view of all the cheating through the custom-houses will leave a very small percentage for protection.

I have made in my amendment a classification, according to which I propose to grade the duties. It is that on all these goods the specific duty shall be fifty cents, as the House of Representatives agreed, instead of forty-five cents, and, in addition, on those worth less than a dollar a pound, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem, just the same ad valorem fixed in the bill for this class which furnishes a large amount of the importations of goods with which the mass of the people are clothed; forty per cent. ad valorem on those worth between a dollar and a dollar and a half a pound; and forty-five per cent. ad valorem on those above a dollar and a half a pound, these being the finer classes of broadcloths and cassimeres. The labor entering into the cheaper class of goods is about twenty per cent.; on the more costly goods, the finer classes, the labor is about forty-five per cent. How do you protect labor when you put the same duty on goods of the cost of which labor constitutes twenty per cent. that you put on goods of the cost of which labor constitutes forty-five per cent.? This classification is based on sound principles, and I believe the adoption of this amendment will save two thirds of the woolen manufacturers of the country. I believe further that if the bill passes as it now stands, while the manufacturers of worsteds and carpets will be benefited, the class of manufacturers specified in this paragraph, those who manufacture doeskins, cassimeres, broadcloths, women's dress-goods, will lose hundreds of thousands of dollars, and thousands of men will be discharged from employment in thirty days. On these articles this bill as it stands is from seven to ten per cent. worse for the manufacturers than the present tariff law. About one third of the woolen manufacturers of the country, engaged in manufacturing the articles specified in the paragraph following this one which I move to amend, will be benefited at the expense of the manufacturers of the articles mentioned here, which make up two thirds of the woolen interests of this country.

I hope the Senate will adopt this amendment. We have put the duty on wool at what has been asked; and so in regard to wheat, barley, and I may say everything. We do not have any raw materials now-a-days. On this bill I have not heard of a raw material; but when we get up the internal revenue bill I think we shall find that pretty much every thing is a raw material. This amendment is based on sound principles; it makes a proper discrimination. It protects the skilled labor of the country that goes into the manufacture of the finer classes of goods that are worn by those who can afford to pay this increased duty, and it leaves the cheaper articles where they now are.

Mr. YATES. I had intended this morning to offer an amendment by way of showing my position on this bill generally, and it was in relation to the duty on wool. As I now have the opportunity upon the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to present my views, I am not so particular about the amendment which I intended to propose. I now discover from the amendment which the Senator has moved some clue to the remarks which he made yesterday. If this amendment was offered by him with a view of perfecting the bill and then supporting it, I could entertain a more favorable impression in regard to it; but I imagine that even if we should adopt the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts he would be unwilling to support this bill. It seems to me that he has a sort of prejudice against what we call wool. He said yesterday that this was not a Massachusetts bill. Sir, I say it is not a Massachusetts bill. Were it a Massachusetts bill I certainly should not support it. I support it because it is a United States bill, including Massachusetts as well as Illinois, and every other State in the Union. He said it was not a Massachusetts bill because it not only protected textile fabrics, such as are made by the looms and factories of Massachusetts, but also embraced coal and iron and steel and wool. Sir, we have had tariffs for Massachusetts long enough; in my humble estimation it is time that we had a tariff for Illinois, a tariff for the United States, as well as for Massachusetts. We now find the two honorable Senators from Massachusetts, (whom I have always regarded as high protective tariff men, from whom I may say I have learned the lessons that have led me to adopt the views I entertain upon the subject of protection,) denouncing this bill because it is not a Massachusetts bill. One of the honorable Senators is for cheap coal; the other honorable Senator is for cheap wool. The one honorable Senator does not want protection upon coal, because the people of Massachusetts would then have to pay a duty upon coal, and it would diminish the profits of the manufacturer to that extent. The other honorable Senator does not want any duty on coal, on iron, on steel, or on wool, because that will diminish the profits of the manufacturer to that extent. Sir, if so, I should like to know what becomes of the protective theory? If we have a duty upon wool, and we thereby increase to a large extent the amount of our flocks and herds in the West, thus adding to the general wealth and prosperity, I should like to know what becomes of the old tariff doctrine which we have taught heretofore? Does that duty increase the price of the article to the consumer? Does not the fact that we can have more sheep and more cattle, that our farmers can go more extensively into grazing and can extend the supply, enable them in time to sell cheaper? Is not that as sound as the old tariff doctrine, that we will protect our manufacturing establishments in order to enable the article to be finally spread through the country cheaper to the consumer?

Mr. President, I ask why we shall not protect our coal if we protect our manufacturing establishments; and I ask why we shall not protect our wool, the sheep upon our western forests raised by the farmer there. I have occupied all positions, I believe, in my past life upon this tariff question. I think in my younger days I was for a prohibitory tariff; then I was for a tariff for protection upon the principle of developing the resources of the country and encouraging the industrial interests of the country as against foreign competition, upon the principle of providing home market, upon the principle of giving employment to millions of hands in America instead of in Europe. I had even the dream of Mr. Clay, of Mr. Webster, and of Mr. Collamer, and those men who believed that by a protective tariff we might make this the mightiest nation of the earth, dependent upon no nation for its supplies in peace or in war. I am loath to give up that principle yet. I cannot see now why we may not, with a country so rich in ores, so abundant in its capacities of every kind, dig our own iron out of the earth, and give employment to our own hands and work up that iron, run our own mills, develop our resources. And yet I must confess that while I still maintain the theory of protection, so difficult and so sinuous is legislation upon the subject as even to make me fear the attempt to apply it. Although the theory is right, the application is so difficult; it is so difficult to act so as to produce fairness and impartiality between different sections and interests, as almost to shake my faith in the theory itself. And, sir, when I can see Massachusetts, where the protective system was rocked in its cradle of infancy, object now to protection to wool, or, because protection is given to wool, seek to increase unduly the protection given to manufacturers, I confess that my faith fails me to some extent.

I will say to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that the best argument which has been introduced in favor of this bill is what he considers its weakest point, and that is that it protects not only the fabrics that are manufactured in the factories and by the looms of New England, but because it embraces coal, iron, steel, and wool; it embraces every interest of the country; it is as wide and comprehensive in its scope as the country itself.

The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] said the other day, "When this measure comes before the people it will fail;" and if we refer to the history of our tariffs we must remember that not one as yet has ever met with the approbation and sanction of the American people. Even the tariff of 1828, which cost the highest efforts and energies of Henry Clay, had to go down and be modified by a lower scale of duties in 1833. But, sir, I tell the Senator from Massachusetts now that wool is the strength of this tariff. We have a West now. We have there, for instance, over forty millions of sheep grazing upon those broad prairies and in those beautiful valleys; and they represent two million voters—men who make Presidents and who can make tariffs. Population is crowding now around our lakes and into our broad valleys, upon our beautiful prairies. We have there, as you have in Pennsylvania and in other States, inexhaustible mines of wealth, beds of iron and lead and zinc and copper, and beyond, still further west, silver and gold. We have in the State of Illinois, according to a geological survey and according to experiments actually made, coal enough to make the hearthfires of this country blaze for a thousand centuries; and then we have a rich, fertile, and productive soil of from ten inches to eight feet in depth. Then, sir, as the Pacific railroad stretches out to the far West, emigration is nestling upon its track, villages and cities are springing up, the power and the wealth of the continent are going there, and the time will come when the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] I trust, may from the summit of the Rocky mountains look over upon the land of gold and look back East upon the land which he has passed, with our herdsmen and flocks upon a thousand hills, and then, if he stands by the protective principle to-day, he may say: "How beautiful are thy tents, oh Israel!"

Why, sir, should we not have cheap wool raised in our own country? There is the habitation of the sheep; there are the rich grasses and the sweet grasses, there between the northern boundary of Minnesota and Texas and west of Missouri; there are the hot latitudes, the short winters, the long summers; there sheep are healthy; and while in the United States there is but one sheep to four acres of ground, (in Vermont, for instance, or one to four in Ohio, I believe,) we have not one to forty acres in those northwestern States. The number of sheep can be as many to the acre there as anywhere else; and that will be the result of the adoption of a proper system.

We hear cries of ruin. The honorable Senator [Mr. WILSON] says these looms will stop and these spindles will stop unless this five cents is added to the duty on woolen goods. Sir, I tremble not for any such consequences. I do not expect that there will be a solitary decrease or diminution in the wants, the enjoyments, or the luxuries of New England. I presume Nahant will have its wonted joys and refreshments whether this five cents is added according to this proposition or not. But, sir, there is an interest which is to be affected unless we protect it, and that is the wool interest. That is comparatively new. I do not mean to say that the business of the shepherd is new; but the wool interest as a separate interest has grown up during the last two years in the State of Illinois, and I presume in the State of Iowa within the last four or five years, so that we have five sheep where we had one two years ago. It has become an immense interest; it has been stimulated by the demands of the war. Why, sir, look at one fact, to see how the war has stimulated this interest. In 1859 there were but two hundred and thirty thousand pounds of wool raised in the United States. In the year 1865 there were eighty-seven million pounds; showing how the demands of the war stimulated this interest. I hope I shall be excused for saying here, however, not that this interest is going to be ruined, unless there be a little increase added to the duty upon wool, but that whether this bill passes or not at least half of our wool-growers must be totally ruined, from the fact that during the war, under the stimulus of the demands which were then made, they increased largely their farms and their flocks; and now, the war having ceased and the demand for wool having ceased to a great extent, these farms and flocks become of comparatively small value.

Mr. President, we are in this condition now. Whatever may be our views upon the subject of the tariff, whether we are for a tariff for protection or for a tariff for revenue with incidental protection, we must have a tariff of some kind. We not only have to raise by internal taxation what is necessary to support the Government in its ordinary expenses, but we have to provide for the payment of the interest on our national debt; and when we attempt by a tariff to raise a revenue for that purpose let it not be a Massachusetts tariff, or an Illinois tariff, but a tariff which shall embrace every interest in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from Maine to the Gulf. The honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] predicted that we should go under with this tariff, and other gentlemen who are opposed to it predict that we shall go under; but, sir, in the Northwest the men who will go under upon this tariff will go under because they have not supported it; it is the only tariff which ever yet has been adopted by the American Congress which has given sufficient consideration to the agricultural interest. That is the truth about it—the only one, indeed, which has given any consideration whatever to the agricultural interest.

Now, sir, is it not unfair for Massachusetts, which has grown wealthy and prosperous beneath a tariff policy for the last fifty years, whose merchants have been made princes and whose villages have been made cities, and where prosperity abounds in every direction, owing to your tariff policy, to object to protection being now given to interests in the West which demand it? Why should not these interests also have consideration before the American Congress? I say to the honorable Senator from Indiana that we will meet him upon the question whether this tariff is popular or unpopular. That Senator has not prophesied rightly in times past for the last twenty years; and we shall see whether he is a better prophet now than he has been heretofore.

Mr. President, the amendment which I shall offer, and which I shall take time to explain now, as it bears upon this question, is this: I will move to strike out all of the third section after the words "hereinafter provided" in line six, page 12, and in lieu of the various duties there proposed to insert "shall be twelve cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, ten per cent. ad valorem," as the duty, on all sorts of wool. I shall make this proposition in the first place to simplify the bill. Here are six long pages telling what wool is, the different kinds of wool, first-class wool, second-class wool, and third-class wool, fixing the duty upon these various classes of wool according to price, and then providing that each custom-house officer shall have a sample of these different kinds of wool. When wool is represented as worth twelve cents he has a sample of that kind, and so of all the other kinds, and he is to decide upon these samples whether the wool is to be taxed three cents or ten cents or twelve cents. As specific duty is about twelve cents a pound on the average, perhaps a little over, I propose that we say that upon all unmanufactured wool the duty shall be twelve cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem.

I am not going to insist upon this amendment if the committee have found insurmountable difficulties in fixing one common rate and have therefore resorted to these five or six pages to classify these wools, but I should like such an amendment adopted for this reason: immense frauds have been practiced upon the wool-producer in the custom-house department. Where there are different kinds of wool and the duties upon that wool are different, there is a chance for the grossest frauds, and the grossest frauds have been committed. We know by actual experience and by statistical tables that for the six months ending 1st of December, 1865, of the wools which were imported into the United States, amounting to many million pounds, nearly all were brought in under the low duties of three and six cents, and but fifty pounds were brought in during those six months of the higher-class wools (according to the custom-house returns) such as compete with our common Spanish Merino wool. We find this to be the fact, and I submit it to you now, Mr. President, that if we want fairness we should say that the duty shall be so much on every kind of unmanufactured wool. Then there can be no excuse; the custom-house officer cannot say, "I was deceived as to whether this was first-class wool or second-class wool or the third-class wool." The importers have means and ways of making first-class wool appear second-class and the second-class appear third class by handling them in dirt and disguising them. Even if a man is honest in the custom-house he may be deceived. How many Senators on this floor could tell the difference between what we call combing wool and carding wool? Not six of them could tell the difference. So with custom-house officers, supposing them to be honest; but they are not always honest as we know; they are too often appointed for political considerations, and they are not, I fear, always honest. That the importer may know, that the wool-grower may know, that the country may know that these frauds are not going on, why shall we not in a simple clause, six lines in length, declare that upon all kinds of unmanufactured wool the duty shall be twelve cents per pound and ten per cent. ad valorem?

The answer to that perhaps will be that there is a certain class of wool, very cheap wool, of which our shoddy is made, worth about sixteen cents a pound, upon which the duty is only three cents, and that we cannot raise it in this country. I will admit, for the sake of the argument, that we could not raise one pound of that wool in this country, and yet the whole amount of that inferior article which comes to this country will not begin to compensate for the frauds in the Treasury Department growing out of the impossibility of distinguishing between these different classes of wool. But, sir, we are informed by our agriculturists that this wool can be raised in America, can be raised in our milder latitudes down in the region of Texas if it had the protection which is awarded to other interests in this country.

If eastern gentlemen are interested in cheap coal, if they are interested in cheap wool and cheap iron, surely we are interested in cheap clothing; and now that by convention between yourselves and the wool-growers you have agreed that they shall have in the average ten cents per pound and — cents ad valorem, you come in and propose to increase the duty on cloths. "I do not propose to touch the wool interest, not at all," says the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. No man, perhaps, is more friendly to the West than he; I am sure that there is no man who stands higher in the West than he does; but he says, "If we give you that protection we must have a little more protection upon the manufactured article. In other words, if you take twelve cents per pound upon your wool, we must take five cents of that out of you in the consumption of the manufactured article."

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? I want to ask the honorable Senator if he thinks it right, if he thinks it just, to increase the duty on wool, to make it ten or twelve cents a pound and ten per cent. ad valorem, and then cut the duty down on the article into which it is manufactured from forty to thirty-five per cent., which this bill does?

Mr. YATES. I have answered that question already. I have said that this bill was the result of a joint understanding between the wool manufacturers and wool-growers, and that both, as we understand, were perfectly satisfied with it; and that is a sufficient answer. The whole trouble is this: the Senators do not deny that they are in favor of American protection; oh, no; but this is not a Massachusetts bill; coal and steel and iron are in this bill, and they prefer the present tariff. But as a representative of the West, representing that great interest, agriculture, which as is so often said is the foundation of every other interest, commercial and manufacturing, that interest which has its hundreds of population where you have your twenties or your thirties, I feel it my duty to resist now any further amendment of this bill. I shall not complain of honorable Senators here representing the eastern States who have brought in amendment after amendment to this bill after the report of the chairman of the committee. I was willing to sit here and take the tariff bill as reported, protecting every portion and every interest of the country.

It was easy enough for me to rise in my seat and ask for additional duty upon corn, and upon wheat, and upon horses, and upon swine, and upon beans and potatoes, and upon prairie chickens, if you choose, sir; [laughter;] it was easy enough for me to do that; but this committee, in which I have so much confidence, prepared this bill with reference to every interest, and I was fully and entirely satisfied with it. We shall be forever indebted to the distinguished chairman of the committee and to the able committee itself for providing a bill which is not obnoxious to the exception which has heretofore prevailed against other bills. It is fair to every section of the country, and as such I receive it. The amendment which I propose to offer I do not mean to insist upon. I offer it as a counter-proposition to that which is now introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts; and I hope that from this time out Senators will stop introducing amendments. I say it respectfully. They have a right to offer them, and they are to be the judges of their own action; but if they will continue to introduce amendments for increased duties upon the fabrics of the factories, I will take up the long list, beginning with the highest rate in the farmer's productions, and propose amendment after amendment, and we will pile up this bill until we kill it so dead that there will be no resurrection for it.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Illinois reminds us that there is a West. He need not have reminded us of that; we discovered it some time ago. The Senator would have us understand that they make Presidents and make tariffs. Well, sir, I want the Senator simply to acknowledge that this tariff is of western origin: that this tariff had its birth there.

Mr. GRIMES. Where?

Mr. WILSON. In the brains and pockets of the wool-growers of the West. They have discovered that there is a West, and they have made the woolen manufactures of the country believe that there was a place of power, and that they had better take what they offered or they would fare worse.

Mr. GRIMES. Permit me to inquire whether the Senator is making this statement from himself or is only attempting to repeat the argument of the Senator from Illinois? Does he charge that this tariff came from the West and that the West is responsible for it?

Mr. WILSON. No doubt about it. I never supposed anybody doubted it. That was the point and the simple point that I wished to make when I said it was not a Massachusetts tariff.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire right here when the charge is made to emphatically, in the name of the West, of which I am in part a representative, to deny the statement. It did not emanate from the West.

Mr. WILSON. I quite as emphatically affirm it.

Mr. GRIMES. The West does not want it, and the West will be restive under it.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to say to the Senator from Iowa that the idea of this tariff originated with the wool-growers, was got up by them, pressed by them; that the woolen manufacturers were, I will not say scared into this movement, but I do know that many of them feared that unless they assented to the arrangement something worse would come. What I wanted to say the other day, and say here now, is this: I want gentlemen who live in this mighty West, whose power we all acknowledge, and to whom I suppose we must all bow, to acknowledge their own bantlings, and not put them upon Massachusetts. We choose simply to stand for our own legitimate children. I said it was not a Massachusetts tariff. I did not say that because I wanted a Massachusetts tariff, for I do not want a tariff for Massachusetts, but for the whole country, as I suppose the Senator from Illinois does; but when it is charged upon us that this is a New England measure, I reply that it is not, and I go further: this tariff on two thirds of the manufactures of this country reduces the duties. Here is a reduction from forty to thirty-five per cent., that is five per cent.; you may add five more for the inevitable loss. It is from eight to ten per cent. against us as compared with the existing tariff. So, too, the average duties on cotton goods are reduced. On two thirds of the woolen manufactures of New England and on the aggregate of the cotton manufactures, in spite of all this increase that is made here, there is a positive reduction from the existing law. I think that is a sufficient answer; but I only wished to say that it did not come from us.

I was brought up with this idea about a tariff for a country: that the raw materials which enter into the mechanic arts and into manufactures should be admitted into the country free or at low rates of duty; that in the assessment upon the country of the revenues necessary to carry on the Government there should be discrimination in favor of skilled labor, and that such a policy tended to increase the mechanic arts, increase manufactures, to draw men from agricultural pursuits into these, to diversify labor and lead to the consumption of the products of agriculture, and ultimately to bring down the price of the manufactured article and the product of the various mechanic arts and to develop the power and strength of the country. But, sir, we are departing from that.

Senators speak as though the manufacturers of the country were making great fortunes. That is not the fact now. During the war, it is true, great fortunes were made; but why? We put two million and a half of men into the field, taking them from the productive industries of the country for that purpose. We spent from two to three thousand million dollars in purchasing the products of agriculture and the mechanic arts and manufactures and importations into the country to support the Army. The Government became a great customer. Now we have taken these men from the field: we have destroyed this customer. These men are returning to the various productive industries of the country; consequently the products of agriculture, manufacture, and commerce will be reduced in quantity and reduced in price. In other words, we must go from a state of war to a state of peace. I do not see how under such circumstances the productive industries of the country can be otherwise than somewhat depressed, legislate as you may here. During the last few months a large number of woolen mills have been closed; millions of dollars have been lost in manufactures; and there is to-day stagnation in manufacturing and in the productions of the various mechanical arts throughout the country. This results from so many men returning to work, from the fact that the Government is no longer in the market as a purchaser, and also from the vast volume of our paper money.

In this condition of affairs you propose to readjust the tariff. I have no idea that any adjustment made now will last or ought to last. We shall have a vast increase of the products of the country, and there will be a reduction in prices, and I hope that we are to have a reduction in the vast volume of our paper money and come back to a solid basis.

But, sir, I acknowledge that I ought not to take up the time in speaking on these general points, and I ask pardon of the committee for having done so; but I think this amendment which I have proposed ought to be adopted. While you have increased the duty on woolens, so that they are from seventy to eighty per cent., you have only given thirty-five per cent. nominally on the manufactured article, and when you take out of that the amount necessary to pay the internal revenue taxes, and besides that the percentage necessary to account for undervaluations and the cheatings through the custom-houses, you will find on this class of goods a protection of not more than ten or twelve per cent.; and some of the best men in the country say that it will not be over five or seven per cent.

I hope that on this question I shall have the vote of the Senator from Illinois. I know that he is a fair-minded man, disposed to do justice to the East and the West. He has got an enormous duty put upon wool, and here is a reduction upon woolen goods. By the present tariff the duty is twenty-four cents per pound and forty per cent. ad valorem; it is upon this class of goods by the House bill fifty cents per pound and thirty-five per cent., a reduction of five in the percentage and an increase of twenty-six cents per pound in the specific duty, to make up for the increase on wool.

Mr. YATES. Allow me to say to the Senator that I am not opposed to any fair protection upon the manufactured article. All I say is that this wool interest is a new interest, while the manufacturing establishments of New England are stable and firm. I submit to the honorable Senator the question whether in any large body or to any extent the manufacturers have asked for an increase of duty? Before he answers that I will say, on the other hand, that from every portion of the northwestern States, from Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, and elsewhere, have come petitions stating that their interests will be totally ruined unless protection is afforded; and we know from the nature of the case, from the fact that during the war they so largely increased their possessions, their farms, and the number of sheep upon those farms, there must be loss to them inevitably. The manufacturers, however, are stable and firm. They have had the benefits of protection for the last fifty years; they have wealth, they have associated capital; they have got together in bodies, and they control the great interests of this country, its railroads, its commerce, its manufactures. Does the honorable Senator say they are to be shaken because these duties are not increased? On the other hand this interest is new and has never had the benefit of a tariff.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator asks me if they are to be shaken. I answer unhesitatingly, yes; many of these mills will close immediately on the passage of an act that puts them at this disadvantage. The Senator told us that this was an arrangement between the manufacturers and the wool-growers. Instead of the arrangement being forty-five cents per pound it was fifty-three. The House reduced it to fifty cents, and the Senate committee has reduced it from fifty to forty-five.

Mr. YATES. When I spoke of it being an arrangement I did not mean that there was any formal, concerted understanding. I meant that by the production to the committee of the various views of men engaged in the growing of wool, flax, hemp, and other agricultural productions, and upon letters and other representations from those engaged in manufactures, they adopted and adjusted this tariff upon a reasonable basis, protecting all the interests of the country, North and South, East and West.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, we are dealing, I suppose, with facts in the adjustment of this tariff. The fact is that twenty-five years ago, under the tariff of 1842, a large percentage of our finer woolens was manufactured in the United States. I was then largely interested in a business which required me to purchase those woolens, and more than half of those goods were manufactured in the United States. To-day they are not manufactured here at all. Our manufacturers have been driven from the production of the finer classes of woolen goods. Broadcloths are hardly manufactured in this country at all, and so with some of the finer cassimeres. It is so in all the finer grades, where the proportion of labor is so much greater as compared with the material which is used in their production.

I think that the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts is a reasonable one. I believe it to be for the interest of this Government to have our own people manufacture everything that can be manufactured in this country, and we can manufacture nearly everything. We produce or ought to produce all the grades of wool. There is a quality of wool raised in South America which is of a lower grade than that we now produce or than perhaps it is for our interest to produce. I should be in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Illinois if it were practicable; but it is not. It is true, as he says, that great frauds have been and are now being perpetrated in the grading of wools. Fine wools are covered with burrs and films, and are introduced at a low rate of duty and then cleansed. Frauds are perpetrated in that way.

I hope that the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts will be adopted, and that we shall return to the manufacture of the finer classes of woolen goods. I believe that this slight increase of duty may bring about that result. I shall certainly support the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may be well enough for me perhaps to make a statement with regard to this matter, so that it may be better understood than it is standing alone by itself.

We have adopted in our rates and in our classification the description and rates which were adopted by the House in the bill that came to us. We made some difference, however, in the duty upon cloths manufactured from wool. The House itself did not adopt in full the arrangement as it was agreed upon by the representatives of the wool-growing interest and the manufacturing interest. They adjusted the duties and the rates very carefully; first fixing the duties on wools and giving the various descriptions, and then settling how much it would be necessary to advance the tariff on woolen goods in order to conform thereto and give the necessary protection to the manufacturer. In doing so they found that fifty-three cents per pound was demanded upon these cloths. The necessity for that rate was made out by showing how much wool would be used in a yard, what the duties on it were, and what were the other incidental expenses connected with the manufacture. They made it out that that amount of money would be necessary in order to remunerate the additional expenses they were at; and then they asked thirty-five per cent. ad valorem by way of protection, accounting for ten per cent. of that by what they paid for internal taxation and by taking the foreign valuation into account, leaving them a protection simply of twenty-five per cent. ad valorem against the foreign manufacturer after being repaid that which they were obliged to pay out to make up for what gentlemen talk about so much, the different rates of labor here and abroad, and other considerations involved in protection to American manufactures.

The House of Representatives, nevertheless, cut them down three cents from the rate they asked, and when our committee came to act we cut them down five cents more on the pound; and we did that supposing that would be about the amount that should be taken off to compensate for the duties taken off dye-stuffs. I am satisfied that we made a mistake in that respect; that the duties we took off dye-stuffs would not amount to so much, perhaps only to about two and one half or three per cent. If, therefore, we made the allowance for the diminished duties on dye-stuffs, which were included in the calculation of their expenses, they would still be entitled on their own calculation to fifty cents per pound. They complained that the House cut them down too much in giving them but fifty cents and leaving the duties on dye-stuffs, and that they lost three cents protection in that way. Now, offsetting that against the dye-stuffs, there would still be according to their calculation—in which we could see no error—fifty cents a pound, which they originally demanded. The proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts, therefore, is simply to go back to their original proposition on the lower grades; that is, fifty cents per pound and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem. This is no more than they asked in the first place as the proper compensation for the increased duties upon wool and the other expenses that they were obliged to pay.

This amendment, however, goes a little further and increases the ad valorem on the next higher grade of cloths five per cent. and on a still higher grade five per cent. more, making the percentages respectively thirty-five, forty, and forty-five per cent., according to the increased price of the cloth. I inquired why this was, because ordinarily we do not increase the percentage as the prices raise, but rather the reverse. The answer made was on account of the greatly increased price of the fine wools which they are obliged to use in the manufacture. I suppose the Senator from Rhode Island understands that a great deal better than I do and can explain it if necessary.

This is the simple state of the fact; and I must confess that I was very much impressed by the statement made by the gentleman, at whose request I suppose the honorable Senator from Massachusetts has moved this amendment. He is a man of very great experience and very great intelligence as connected with all this business. He appeared before our committee and said that he did not go into the convention of wool-growers and manufacturers, or that he went in and left it, because he entirely disagreed with them in the conclusions to which he saw they were coming. He thought that the system adopted there was one which, instead of being beneficial, would if carried out be injurious to the manufacturing interest of woolens. He stated, as one reason for this increase, that thirty-five per cent. would be a very small protection, the percentage being relied on for that purpose. He said twenty-five per cent. would be enough if they got it clear; but owing to the frauds in valuations, which seem unavoidable, it would not amount to fifteen per cent. in reality, and that would not protect them, especially in the finer grades of woolen cloths.

His argument made a very strong impression upon me with reference to the whole matter; and the singular circumstance that, although a woolen manufacturer, he appeared not contesting what was done, but giving his views and advising in reference to it, satisfied me that we could not be misled by him in our views in favor of adopting this tariff, which had been arranged by the House of Representatives in conformity with the wishes of these two classes who had held the convention.

I am, therefore, very much disposed to give credit to what he says now, for it is only in conformity with what he said then; and the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts is that if this goes into operation he will be obliged to close his factory, and he does not want to do so on account of the great number of men who are dependent upon him; and hence the necessity for the slight additional percentage on the finer cloths now proposed to be added. This view rather impresses itself upon my mind, and having stated the views of the committee I do not propose to make any further contest about it.

I will state, moreover, that the views of this gentleman are entirely corroborated by the views of an exceedingly intelligent wool manufacturer in my own State, who wrote to my colleague, not in quite so strong terms, but stating that under this tariff as arranged he would be obliged to close his mill; and I believe that his mill and that of the other gentleman referred to are the only mills in the country that have kept on up to the present time. My belief is, as they say, that if the thing stands as it is they cannot manufacture fine woolen cloths at all in this country.

I suppose I may as well state my own opinions on this subject. My own belief is that it would have been better and the policy would have been wiser if the wool-growers could have been satisfied with a lower rate of duty on wool, relying for their great benefit on the support of the manufacturers, the home demand. It is already true that they furnish seventy per cent. of all the wool that is used in the manufacture of woolens in this country according to their own statement, and they do not dispute the fact that we must have more or less of foreign wools to make up the whole supply needed. It struck me that that was a pretty good proportion. I confess that I have hesitated very much to believe that it was the true system to lay very large duties upon the wool itself, instead of relying upon the building up of manufactures as the great protection of the wool-growing interest of the country. That was my opinion then, and I remain of the same opinion, although the committee came to the conclusion that it was best to take the duties on wool as they were fixed by the House of Representatives, and we reported accordingly.

I had another view in regard to it. I did not see and do not see now the necessity of laying such high duties on the second-class wools, even if we lay them upon the first-class precisely as they are demanded by the wool-growers. I do not see the object of placing the same duties upon the second-class wools which are hardly beginning to be produced in this country. I believe the total production in this country of wools of the second class, which go into the manufacture of worsteds falls short of three hundred thousand pounds. It is an interest that is just beginning. My belief was that in the present condition of things in this country this is no time to struggle to bring up new productions and new manufactures. Expensive as living is, and with so many burdens upon the people, we should content ourselves with giving adequate protection to those interests that already exist. If we were to let in these second-class wools at a low rate, which would not interfere with any production of wools now in existence here, the result would be that we should avoid the increased duty upon manufactures from the second-class wools, which are manufactures of worsted, and which grew up under the operation of the reciprocity treaty, those wools being then imported from Canada free to the extent of about six million pounds a year, I think.

Then, in regard to the third class of wools. Nobody demanded a higher duty on those, because they are of a very coarse character and come in competition with none that we raise or want to raise here. And here let me say to the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. YATES] that if we should adopt his level we must necessarily raise the duties enormously upon carpets and carpeting upon which we have raised but very slightly in consequence of the fact that these wools cost so much more now and are so much more difficult to be obtained than they were.

I do not propose to argue the question. The committee adopted a certain series of views on the subject which I have endeavored to carry out in supporting this bill before the Senate, and I shall adhere to them in the votes I give although they may not square exactly with my own belief of what is the true policy of the country. I am satisfied of another thing, and that is a strong argument for adhering to the rates agreed upon, that no tariff can be passed unless the demands of the wool-growers are acceded to. Such is public opinion, natural or manufactured, so strong has it become that on that point it is perfectly irresistible. I would not attempt to set up my feeble opinions in opposition to it, especially upon a matter which I cannot claim to have any particular reason for understanding better than other people.

I shall make no opposition to this amendment. The statements of these gentlemen, connected with my own previous impressions in regard to it, are such as to lead me to the conclusion that the woolen manufacturers will be in extreme danger unless we do somewhat increase the rate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope no change will be made in the tariff on wools and woolens, because the tariff proposed is the result of a long, complicated, and troublesome negotiation between hostile interests, who finally came to a compromise on the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will recollect that we varied from that, and the House varied from it. While we adopted one part of the compromise we did not adopt the other.

Mr. SHERMAN. The representation upon which my friend from Massachusetts acts comes to us from a gentleman who professes to be interested in it. I agree that he is an intelligent man; but he was heard patiently; he had the benefit of a full hearing. He refused to enter this conference, refused to take part in it, because he made a character of broadcloth that he said must have wool from South America, and it was useless for him to take part in it. But at the same time all the leading interests of Massachusetts and all the manufacturing States were ably represented. It was a meeting called by the manufacturers themselves. Any departure from the settlement then made creates complication and trouble.

In regard to the changes made by the committee I will simply say that we took the bill in this respect as it finally passed the House, taking their descriptions and classifications. It is true the Committee on Finance reduced the duty five cents on woolen goods, but that is fully compensated by other reductions made in this bill. The duty on nearly all the drugs, chemicals, and dye-stuffs used in the manufacture of woolen goods is thrown off. The manufacturers themselves compute the duty on the drugs under the old tariff at two and a half cents a pound on woolen goods. Then if fifty cents, as agreed upon by the House, was the proper rate, this would reduce it to forty-seven and a half cents. In addition to that, the Senate have reduced the duty on flocks, which Mr. Slater, the gentleman referred to, tells me is a very important and necessary constituent element in the manufacture of broadcloth, from twelve cents to three cents. Mr. Slater himself tells me that a considerable quantity of this article, called flocks, clippings of wool, is introduced into the manufacture of broadcloth. I have no doubt that the reduction made in the Senate on drugs and chemicals and on flocks will very nearly compensate the five cents a pound taken off the specific duty; at least very near it. The result is that we allowed forty-five cents a pound to compensate the duty on wool, instead of fifty cents, and relieved them from the duty on drugs and gave them some advantage in the flocks.

The only reason I have for voting against this amendment is that I think this subject has been so fully considered by the persons interested, and they have finally agreed upon it in such a shape that any disturbance of the arrangement would only involve us in complications which we cannot settle, not being experts. I would not vote for the proposition of the Senator from Illinois; I would not vote to increase the duty on wool, because all the people I represent, both manufacturers and wool-growers, seem to be entirely satisfied with this arrangement. We manufacture some woolen goods in Ohio, and I heard no complaint of the duties in this bill. I hope they will not be disturbed. To raise this duty to fifty cents a pound, as proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, on the coarser goods, would be to ignore the fact that we have thrown off for the benefit of the woolen manufacturers a very large amount of revenue now levied upon drugs, chemicals, and dye-stuffs. That reduction is equal to two and a half cents a pound according to their own estimate; and if the estimate of the commissioner is reliable, that we consumed one hundred and seventeen million pounds in this country at two and a half cents a pound, it would amount to a very large sum thrown off for their benefit. I think they ought to be satisfied with that.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to modify my amendment slightly, at the suggestion of some Senators to put in this form:

Valued at one dollar and less per pound, forty-five cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

That leaves that just as it is in the bill now; and then to add:

Valued at over one dollar and less than $1.50 per pound, fifty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, forty per cent. ad valorem; valued at over $1.50 per pound, fifty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, forty-five per cent. ad valorem.

I think the Senate ought to consent to this; and now I wish simply to say a word to the Senator from Ohio. The gentleman to whom reference has been made is not the only gentleman of large experience who does not believe this bill to be just. Some of the very ablest men in Massachusetts and in New England earnestly believe that this bill, so far as it concerns two thirds of the woolen manufactures of the country, is not so good as the present tariff. The carpet manufacturers and the worsted manufacturers are abundantly satisfied, and I do not propose to touch them.

Mr. GRIMES. This is rather a refreshing proposition, and I have no doubt it will be adopted, as this is a western measure we are told by the Senator from Massachusetts, promotive entirely of western interests secured by western influence; but I presume this proposition, at least, will be adopted by eastern votes. I do not rise to oppose it particularly, but simply to reply to that part of the Senator's remarks in which he said that the duties upon these woolen goods would only amount to some ten or fifteen per cent. I happen to hold in my hand a table made out by a gentleman who I understand is perfectly familiar and has been for many years with the receipts of foreign goods at the New York custom-house, and he vouches for its accuracy. The special commissioner of revenue has proved the accuracy of some of the results by computations made. This table shows the amount under the bill as it now stands. It will be observed by the Senate that the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts does not decrease any of these classifications, but it leaves the poor cloth to pay precisely the duty fixed by the bill, and declares that the more valuable cloths shall pay a higher rate. It appears by this table that the lowest duty imposed by the bill at present is fifty per cent., and it ranges from that up to one hundred and twenty per cent. In order that it may be known precisely what we are doing, as every Senator has had one of these tables submitted to him, I will send one to the reporter to be printed, so that those who choose to see what we do and to pass on our actions here, may have the opportunity of reading the table.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know what these duties are; I have not computed them, and should not be able to compute them; but these tables are entirely deceptive. While there may be a certain percentage of duty, it is not that percentage of protection. What the Senator from Massachusetts said was that this duty was only so much protection. I stated that the fifty-three cents which the manufacturers demanded as duty upon woollens was merely repayment of what they had to pay out in duties and other expenses upon the materials. That, therefore, is thrown out of the computation of the protection. Then of the thirty-five per cent. ad valorem ten per cent. is to be taken off for what they pay in internal revenue and on account of the difference in the valuation abroad. That leaves the protection twenty-five per cent. In addition to this the Senate committee reduced the specific duty to forty-five cents a pound. I think that the explanations made by the Senator from Ohio show that that is not so great a reduction as the Senator from Massachusetts seemed to suppose. Still I fancy the manufacturers at this rate would get less than twenty-five per cent. protection: how much less I am unable to say, for I have made no calculation.

Mr. GRIMES. I ought to have stated that the Senate has changed the duty on bunting, which is included in the table I sent to the reporter. It has been reduced to some extent; I do not know to what extent, though not a great deal I understand. It was reduced some on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

Mr. SPRAGUE. I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate, but I have examined the proposition suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I must say that the views he has expressed to the Senate are correct in every particular. Of course the duty on the high-priced article does not interfere with or bear heavily on the poorer classes of our people; but it is absolutely necessary that the higher-priced article should be put in a different classification from the coarser article.

The gentleman who has represented this case to me is the son of the original pioneer of cotton manufacturing in the United States, who established it here before anybody else, and he brings to bear upon this subject more practical knowledge, more experience, more devotion to his business perhaps than any man in that business in the United States. There is no doubt but that the business of the production of the finer broadcloths in the United States would go out of existence under the operation of the present bill as it stands. The throwing off the duties upon dye-stuffs which has been referred to is a matter of no consideration whatever; they enter into the cost but very slightly; some logwood and some sumac, and some other things of that kind. Then it must be remembered there are additional taxes on starch and other articles which enter very largely into the production of these goods, which more than compensate for the duties thrown off on the chemicals. I trust the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts will prevail.

Mr. MORRILL. I have listened with a great deal of patience, I trust, during the nine days this bill has been under consideration, with very slight disposition to participate in any way in the discussion; but I think I understand the proposition to which an amendment is now moved, and it seems to me so manifestly unjust to an interest which is, in some sense, peculiar to my own State that I can hardly forbear the expression of the conviction that it would be very unjust if the Senate were not to adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. I understand it to be agreed by the members of the Committee on Finance that the bill as it stands does not give that fair and equal protection to this particular interest, the higher grades of manufactured cloths, that it does to other kindred manufactures. That is a conceded fact. Why not? Nobody suggests, I believe, that this branch of manufactures ought not to be encouraged; nobody suggests that it does not stand upon a footing quite as meritorious, perhaps, as others of a kindred character. Now, what is the reason this should be discriminated against, should not have that proportion of protection that others have?

The honorable Senator from Ohio has suggested the only difficulty in the way of it, and that is that it was arranged by the wool-growers and the manufacturers generally that a certain rate of duty should be laid on the other fabrics; and it would disturb that arrangement. The first answer to that which occurs to me is the fact which has been disclosed here, that it is not pretended that that arrangement is carried out in this bill. The House did not agree to that arrangement, departed from it, and of course we are not bound. But I do not suppose the honorable Senator from Ohio intends to press that here as an argument to oppose the sense of the Senate in its purpose to do justice to this interest; but, I repeat, (and I submit it to challenge the attention of the Senate,) that it is conceded by the Committee on Finance that this particular interest has not that fair proportion of protection which is accorded to other interests. I understand that the proportion of protection is not equal to the proportion which is applied to the other protected manufactures.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I said nothing about that, whether it was equal or not. I said that supposing it to be an arrangement made by two parties, while it was carried out with regard to one, it was not quite carried out with regard to the other.

Mr. MORRILL. I thought the inference was quite irresistible that I should be borne out in the statement I have made on that consideration. I will read from a statement which I suppose is based on the tables here; it professes to be from the tables, and on them the writer comes to this conclusion:

"It will be seen from these tables that the cheaper qualities of cloth are to have a much higher proportion of duty laid upon them than the higher-priced cloths."

That I understand the committee to agree to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no distinction made in their arrangement between one and another.

Mr. MORRILL. The writer goes on:

"Thus woollen coatings, the cost of which is $1 08 a yard, are to be raised twenty-four per cent., while costly fabrics, the gold price of which is $2 40, are raised only eleven per cent."

The testimony is, I believe—I have not heard it controverted here—that this class of manufacturers cannot carry on their business with this discrimination. There is, I believe, but one manufacturer in my own State who makes these high grades of woollen cloths. That is pretty extensive, and is perhaps equal to any in the country. I have a communication from the agent of that establishment. I ought to say that he has not been here and I have not seen here any man from my State representing any interest while this tariff bill has been under consideration or before. This gentleman writes me that so far as his mill is concerned he cannot run it under this tariff bill as it stands. Putting these two facts together, I submit whether the Senate will not see that the justice, fitness, and propriety of the thing is to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, and put the high grades of manufactured woollens on an equal footing with the lower.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish simply to call attention to one point. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely deceptive, I think, though he does not intend it to be so. The amendment proposes to levy on cloths valued at one dollar or less per pound forty-five cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem, and the Senator says this is precisely what the committee reported. So it is; but I ask him how much cloth of any kind is there manufactured that is worth only one dollar a pound? There is not any. I have here the tables prepared by the manufacturers showing that all the cloths they make are worth more than a dollar a pound. Our knowledge of the cost of wool and the number of pounds of it necessary to make a pound of cloth would tell us that. The table before me of the foreign cost as furnished by the manufacturers shows that one yard of the average weight and quality of cassimeres, a coarse product weighing nine and thirty-three hundredths ounces, costs ninety-three and seventy hundredths cents abroad. As a matter of course, if nine and thirty-three hundredths ounces of that cassimere cost ninety-three and seventy hundredths cents a pound of sixteen ounces would cost about a dollar and a half.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How is it on woollen shawls and flannels?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know; but I have no doubt that nine tenths of all the goods included in this clause would be worth more than a dollar a pound. The tables furnished by the manufacturers show it, not only as to cassimeres and broadcloths and doeskins, but pretty much all the articles named in this clause. I do not see blankets in the table, but my experience is that they are worth more than a dollar a pound. Then all the goods will fall in the latter two clauses of the amendment, where the duty is increased five cents a pound and from five to ten per cent. ad valorem. It is a very marked and radical change. If the first clause included the great body of the goods and the latter clauses applied only to a comparatively small amount, like the finer broadcloths, there might be some reason in the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am very much inclined to suspect that the honorable Senator from Ohio has taken a table which is merely applicable to broadcloths and cassimeres—

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator can examine it for himself.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are certainly some articles named in this clause that would come under a dollar a pound, flannels for instance. The object of the amendment is to put the higher duty on the finer articles.

Mr. SHERMAN. The table applies to broadcloths, cloaks, cassimeres, ludios' cloths, doeskins, and tricots. At any rate it covers all the items here down to "doeskins," and I doubt if there is a single article in the clause which is not worth more than a dollar a pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are a considerable number of other articles in the clause besides those in the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; there are others that may come under the first clause of the amendment, but not many.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WILSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. I was requested by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. Brown,] who is confined to his bed by sickness, to say that if present he would vote against this, as against all impositions of higher duties and against the bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sprague, Steward, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Davis, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Lane, Patterson, Ramsey, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Willey, and Yates—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Guthrie, Johnson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, and Williams—18.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to move an amendment, not because the provision is not satisfactory to me as it stands, but as the Senate will see if they listen to my explanation because I have some doubt whether I was entitled to move the amendment which I now propose to strike out as an amendment of the committee. I supposed myself to be so authorized, but on consulting the committee one of the members, with whom I have spoken tells me that I was authorized to move it, and another that he did not understand that it was to be moved on the part of the committee. There being that misunderstanding, and a member of the committee, the Senator from Ohio, being opposed to the proposition which was adopted, I have thought it better to move to strike it out, in order that the matter may be presented to the Senate.

Section twenty-two has reference to a drawback upon iron, copper, cordage, &c., "which shall be wrought into the construction of sailing vessels of the United States." That is the way it originally stood. While going through with the committee's amendments, I moved to insert the words "or steam" after "sailing." We talked the matter over in committee, and the Senator from New York understood me as having the assent of the committee to offer that amendment; but my friend from Ohio did not; and therefore, as I choose to have no question upon that point, I move now to strike out the words "or steam."

Mr. CONNESS. Why not strike out the word "sailing"?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because that was the way it was originally drawn as authorized by the committee. I moved in the Senate to insert the words "or steam" and no objection was made, it being understood to be an amendment of the committee; now there being some question about that fact, in order to set myself right I move to strike out the words "or steam." They were not in the section as it was originally drawn and agreed to by the committee, which was not intended to cover steam vessels but only sailing vessels. The reasons applicable to the two classes are not precisely the same; they are stronger perhaps in the one case than the other.

The general movement grows out of the fact of the depressed condition of our navigation, the building of vessels of all kinds, owing to the heavy burdens imposed in a very great measure by the condition of our trade, and owing more particularly perhaps to the burdens imposed by the internal revenue laws, with which under this bill we cannot meddle, but those taxes are very onerous.

Our sailing vessels come directly in competition with the vessels of New Brunswick, and so much in competition that it is impossible for men to build sailing vessels along our Atlantic coast which enter at all upon the foreign trade with that competition. I presume the expense is just about double, and consequently all our ship-yards are pretty much deserted, and not only our ship-yards for the construction of sailing vessels, but of steam vessels also.

This is a very great injury to us in many particulars, and more especially in the fact that if this condition of things continues the skilled workmen who have given to our ships and ship-building such a high reputation will be scattered and engaged in other pursuits, and we shall lose more than we do now. In the hope and belief that something might be done by this drawback, especially upon sailing vessels, the committee were unanimous in the conclusion that it ought to be given. I consulted the Treasury Department, and found that there would be no difficulty in its execution. Inasmuch as the words "or steam" were inserted under a misapprehension on my own part I move to strike them out in order that the section may be restored to what it was before.

Mr. CONNESS. There may be reasons for striking out these words, but I confess I am not acquainted with any good reasons for doing it; if they do exist, and if the amendment be carried, I shall vote against the whole proposition allowing a drawback on the materials used in the construction of ships. At this day, when by the progress of knowledge applied to the arts, the art of ship-building in particular, the sailing marine of the world is being replaced by steam, it hardly becomes us to make a direct discrimination against steam, which the world in its great struggle presents as one of the greatest triumphs of its skill. The steam marine of our country is to a greater extent now driven from foreign commerce than our sailing marine, and by reason especially of the cheapness with which steamships may be built on the Clyde, in Great Britain. It is an ascertained fact that steamships may be constructed there for from fifty to one hundred per cent. less than they can in America.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They do not become national ships of ours.

Mr. CONNESS. I am aware of that. This being the fact, it explains the greatest cause why we are not found controlling the commerce of the Atlantic ocean. English bottoms, cheaply made, well constructed, too, may engage in a profitable trade with our people, while American ships may not, because in their construction they cost nearly twice as much as the English.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I want the Senator to understand me—

Mr. CONNESS. I do understand the Senator perfectly; but I do not understand why, even as a matter of courtesy, or from what he may deem due to the understanding of any of the members of the committee of which he is the distinguished chairman, he should make a motion of this kind, even though he may vote against it himself.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I stated why I made the motion, and I want the Senator to understand me. I did not know but that it might be thought that from my position as chairman of the committee I had taken advantage of the committee and moved an amendment they did not agree to or authorize me to move. I therefore chose to move to strike out those words which had been inserted, so as to bring the matter before the Senate and let the Senate decide it.

Mr. CONNESS. All I have to say to that is, that it is scarcely possible any Senator could attribute such a motive to the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee. But, sir, I do not wish to pursue this subject if there is no disposition to press the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it due to myself to say that the amendment made to this section was not agreed to by the Committee on Finance. That is admitted on all hands. The Senator from Maine proposed it himself, and I did object to the Senator proposing an amendment as coming from the committee to which the committee did not assent. The Senator from Maine undoubtedly had a right to propose that amendment himself or any other amendment. The only question was, whether it came from the committee. It was adopted by the Senate on the supposition that it was moved on the part of the committee. The Senator from Maine is in favor of it, and he is at perfect liberty to offer it at any time as his individual amendment.

Mr. CONNESS. So far as I am concerned, I will let the discussion of the amendment pass by unless it shall be shown by a vote that the Senate is disposed to adopt it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The section ought to stand as reported by the committee, and then as a matter of course the Senator from California, or the Senator from Maine, or any other Senator, can move to amend it.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the real question? The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to strike out the words "or steam" in the twenty-second section.

Mr. CONNESS. The purpose and effect of the amendment is to strike out the words "or steam," so that if the amendment be adopted the drawback provided for in that section will not be allowed upon any materials that enter into the construction of steamships.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator wishes to go into the merits of the proposition I think I can show him that those words ought to be stricken out, but I take it we ought first to restore the bill to the form the committee desired it to be in, and then any Senator can move to insert the words "or steam." If, however, it is desired now to discuss the merits of the question, I am prepared to do so.

Mr. CONNESS. I prefer that it should be done at this time, because it will govern my vote on other provisions.

Mr. SHERMAN. This section twenty-two proposes to give a drawback on all materials that enter into the construction of all the steam and sailing vessels of the United States, internal and external. The absurdity of such a proposition when applied to steam vessels I will try to demonstrate. Steam vessels are made at Cleveland, Detroit, and other lake ports. They are steam-registered vessels of the United States. If this section stands as it is, every steamboat engaged in lake commerce, which is far greater than our ocean commerce, will be made of iron imported from Liverpool; every single particle of lumber that enters into a steam vessel made at Detroit or Cleveland will be Canadian lumber; every piece of rigging that enters into a steam vessel made at these points will be made of Russian hemp, although iron is rolled at Cleveland and Detroit, although lumber is got out in Michigan, although the copper that bottoms the vessel may be got in the Lake Superior region, and although every element that enters into the construction of a steamboat is an article of American manufacture.

The result of this proposition would be that no steamboat builder would buy any portion of his materials of American manufacture. A proposition so utterly destructive to the revenue as well as to American industry could not be made. We should lose revenue because all these articles will be of foreign manufacture, for if made of American manufactures there would be no drawback. If American lumber was used for the keel and American iron was used for the engine and American hemp was used for the rope, as a matter of course there would be no drawback paid to the builder of the vessel; but if foreign fabrics are used the drawback would be paid. The result would be that every component part of every steamboat in the United States would be made of foreign products.

When this section twenty-two was confined to the sailing vessels of the United States, what is called the registered tonnage of the United States, applied simply to protect a local interest that is said to be under a state of depression, I assented to it. It is said there are no vessels building in Maine. I never make my vote depend upon the place or State or locality where an interest is to be protected. When it was said that this interest was entirely destroyed by the operation of our laws, that these sailing vessels had been brought into competition with sailing vessels made in Canada, and it was impossible under existing laws for our American ship-builders in Maine to build ships to sail in competition with those built in Canada, I could see the force of that argument, and I might be willing to make an exception for their benefit in order to enable them to build American ships in Maine instead of in Canada. But when you apply that principle to steamboats made in the interior of the country it is a very different matter, and it would be an exceedingly dangerous thing. The loss of revenue would amount to millions upon millions. Large numbers of propellers are now being built in the West. The whole carrying trade from Chicago to the eastern market of all the produce of the western country is now carried on in vessels that would be exempt from duty under the operation of this section.

That is the reason I oppose it. The words "or steam" were inserted on the motion of the Senator from Maine because he did not draw the distinction. The committee, as I understand, had not acted upon that, but had confined their action simply to sailing vessels, and it was intended to give a relief, wrong in principle, but justifiable probably by the peculiar circumstances under which we are surrounded, to sailing vessels all along the coast.

Mr. CONNESS. There is very great force in the presentation of the question made by the honorable Senator from Ohio, but it appears to me that it only illustrates the effect of allowing any drawback at all on the construction of any ships. But it will seem very strange to the country indeed, and cannot help striking any mind as strange, that a discrimination at this time should be made as against steam when a change is being made so generally from vessels propelled by sails to vessels propelled by steam.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Cowan, Davis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane, Nesmith, Patterson, Sherman, Sprague, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Yates—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Cragin, Fessenden, Fogg, Harris, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, and Wilson—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cattell, Creswell, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Fowler, Guthrie, Henderson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, and Sainsbury—18.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to move one or two amendments; at least to have the judgment of the Senate upon them. I move on page 4, section one, line seventy, to strike out "six" and insert "seven." The clause now reads:

On ground cocoa or cocoa, on prepared cocoa and chocolate, six cents per pound.

I propose to make it seven cents; and on that I have a very simple statement to make. By the tariff of July 14, 1862, and March 3, 1863, chocolate was seven cents a pound. By the tariff of June 30, 1864, and March 3, 1865, it was also seven cents a pound. It is now proposed by this bill to reduce it to six cents a pound. There is no reason assigned for that reduction; and on looking at the report of the commissioner I find nothing to sustain this change. Therefore, in the absence of any reason in favor of the change I object to it. But I am informed by those who are interested in the subject, who have the most knowledge of it of anybody that I know, that this change will be prejudicial to the American chocolate, and that it will in all probability also fail in any effect on the revenue. You will gain nothing in the way of revenue from it and you will interfere with an existing American interest. Now, in the absence of any reason for this change, I submit that you should hesitate to make it. In making the change, putting the duty down, you depart from the prevailing principle of the bill, and as I submit without any adequate reason. I hope, therefore, that my motion will prevail.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All the articles in that list pretty much are matters that do not come into competition with anything we do in this country until we get down to this very article. The original production is not touched; it is in the list of spices. Now, with regard to the article itself, it comes in at a duty of three cents per pound before it is prepared, and if an addition of three cents more is not enough to prepare a pound of chocolate, cocoa as it is called, I should think it is a mere question of how much you will charge the people who consume it. As to the protection, it is ample. There is no trouble about that at all. The committee thought and the commissioner thought, on an examination of the subject, that six cents a pound was ample for that purpose, and is all the tax that ought to be imposed on those who choose to drink so refreshing and at the same time so cheap and useful an article. This is a mere matter of opinion, a matter in which I take no sort of interest, but at the same time I think six cents is ample protection.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to ask the Senator if there is any reason for the change, which did not exist during those years when it was seven cents?

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the first place we put a very high duty on all the original articles from which these things are made. The duty on those is high; it is not increased; we leave it under the old tariff just as it was. We have not reduced that, because it is a tax very easily collected and is necessary to the revenue; but when the commissioner came to this article he thought, on examination, that six cents, adding three more for the preparation of the chocolate, was ample in the way of revenue and would afford all the revenue we ought to get from the article, and that as the present duty is perhaps more than people would like to pay, although they yield to it very readily, on this very cheap and useful article, as I said before, comparatively speaking, it was well enough to strike off a cent and leave it at six cents. There is no doubt about the protection.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand that there was any evidence on the subject?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The commissioner took evidence from gentlemen in New York on the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. I had the impression that on this subject there was no evidence.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The matter was not examined before the committee, because nobody appeared before us in regard to it. We took the commissioner's statement.

Mr. SUMNER. I had the impression that even before the commissioner there was no evidence on this subject. That is my understanding.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The commissioner says he had.

Mr. SUMNER. His statement is ample; but I do not understand that there was any complaint from any quarter showing that this duty was too high. On the contrary, I am instructed by those who are most familiar with it that the proposed change will be injurious. I make that known to the Senate, and it will be for them to adopt such a conclusion as they see fit. Authority which I recognize as valuable teaches me that. Then I see myself on the face of the bill that here is a departure from the prevailing principle of the bill, so far as it has any principle.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In this list generally there is no question of protection involved.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is simply a question of revenue.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says it is simply a question of revenue. I submit that by this change we shall not increase the revenue.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We thought we would make it a cheaper drink without injuring anybody.

Mr. SUMNER. It will not make it a cheaper drink.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In 1861 under that tariff it was fixed at three cents and six cents a pound. During the war we passed another tariff by which it was up to seven cents, and we thought, on the whole, we might as well go back to the old rate.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well. I have made my statement to the Senate. It will be for them to act. I hope the change will not be made.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I now ask the attention of the Senate to another part of the bill, the provision relative to oil paintings, on page 76. It is as follows:

On oil paintings valued, exclusive of frames, at $100 and less, thirty dollars each painting; valued at over $100, thirty dollars each painting, and, in addition thereto, ten per cent. ad valorem.

It will be remembered that some time ago petitions were presented to the Senate from the artists of the country asking for an additional tax on oil paintings of $100. The committee had those before them, and I understand, after careful consideration, adopted this proposition instead of that which the artists asked. I go with the committee in their conclusion as against the artists. I think that they were wise as far as they went. I think that the desire of the artists went too far; a $100 tax on a picture would have been unreasonable; but now, when I have said that, I am obliged to add that it does not seem to me that the committee have met the case in the best form, and I am going to move a slight change in their proposition. The change which I should propose would be to this effect: that on all oil paintings valued at $200 and less there should be a duty of twenty dollars each painting. I make a change there both in the valuation of the picture and in the duty. I raise the valuation from $100 to $200, and reduce the duty to twenty dollars. Then in the next part of the proposition I reduce the duty to twenty dollars.

I think that the operation of this amendment of mine would be much more favorable to art and to correct taste in the country than that of the committee. Indeed, I am assured by those who are most interested in the subject, who are perfectly familiar with it, that the effect of this amendment of the committee will be to exclude certain European pictures which all persons of taste would be glad to have; that is, it would bear too hard upon them; it imposes too high a duty. To carry out my idea, therefore, I shall move to strike out in line one hundred and forty-eight, section ten, page 76, the word "one" and insert "two," in line one hundred and forty-nine to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty;" in line one hundred and fifty, to strike out "one" and insert "two," and also to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty;" so that the clause will read:

On oil paintings valued, exclusive of frames, at $200 and less, $20 each painting; valued at over two hundred dollars, $20 each painting, and, in addition thereto, ten per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All this is a matter of opinion. I will simply state the views that were entertained by the committee on the subject, and the grounds on which they came to that conclusion. We had before us a gentleman from Philadelphia, a gentleman known to one member of the committee, I believe, of established reputation as a painter, and who represented the association both in New York and in Philadelphia. We had a memorial before us—I think that was from Boston—

Mr. SUMNER. I presented that myself.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Asking for a duty of $100 on each painting. This gentleman came before us as the delegate selected by the artists to represent their wishes, and he stated to us that he thought the proposition to put $100 on each painting was unreasonable; that he thought perhaps it ought to be forty dollars on each painting costing $100 or less, and then increasing at the rate of ten per cent. according to the value. He said that with regard to himself and a large number of other artists in the country the matter made no difference; they sold their pictures at remunerative prices as fast as they could execute them; but he said it was important for the encouragement of young artists in the country, who did not have much encouragement, and who were obliged to fight their way through a great many difficulties, actuated by their love of art, through perhaps years of poverty before they could arrive at that sort of eminence which was at all remunerative. For their protection, he thought, and the artists thought generally, it was necessary to exclude as far as possible these cheap pictures which are painted in Europe, or at any rate to limit their importation; that by putting on this duty we should get some revenue in the first place, and in the next place we should effect that very desirable purpose which would also have the additional effect of preventing the bad results that followed from having so many ill-executed and ordinary paintings, showing no very great proficiency in art, throughout the country; and therefore that the artists, especially the older ones, were desirous, for the benefit of the considerable number of persons who are struggling to make themselves proficient, of having a duty of this description put upon these productions.

After much deliberation, instead of fixing the bounty at forty dollars, which this gentleman thought was about right, we concluded to fix the duty at thirty dollars on all under $100 in value and then to increase at the rate of ten per cent. ad valorem, as the price rose. That is manifestly proper, because these things command a price according to their finish, and these high-priced pictures are purchased ordinarily by persons who can very well afford to pay for them, and to pay the duty on them, too, at the same time.

I have stated the opinion which that delegate from the artists presented to us. We thought it was right, and we were unanimous in the conclusion to which we came, which is embodied in this bill. I suppose the honorable Senator does not pretend to judge of this without information; he undoubtedly has information from some other person; but I am inclined to think that this gentleman who represented the whole body of the artists is quite as likely to be right as the informant of my honorable friend from Massachusetts. My own opinion is—of course I have no feeling or wish about it—that we had better adhere to the conclusion to which the committee came on the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON. How much is it proposed to reduce it?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It now stands at thirty dollars on all not costing over $100. The Senator moves to amend by making the valuation $200 and reducing the duty to twenty dollars, which makes a very material change.

Mr. CATTELL. The chairman of the committee has covered the whole ground on this subject with one single exception I think—if I am in error he will correct me—and that is, that one of the very largest importers of pictures in New York addressed a letter to us assenting to this duty of thirty dollars as being just about the right thing.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I remember that now. It escaped my attention at the moment.

Mr. CATTELL. So that the artists themselves and those who import the pictures are agreed upon this. The duty as proposed by the committee is a very large reduction on what was asked by the representative of the artists; but I think it is just about right.

Mr. SUMNER. I agree entirely in the general remarks of the Senator from Maine. I coincide perfectly in what he sets forth as the object of this proposition. I want to do something to keep bad pictures out of the country, if possible, and also to encourage our artists at home. There we go along together. The simple question is, by what form of proposition shall we practically accomplish that in the best way? Now, if we followed the artists implicitly we should not have the support of the Senator from Maine, for the artists appear here by petition, in which a very large number have united, nearly all the artists of Boston, I think, asking for a duty of $100 on these pictures; but the committee have not accepted that proposition. They put it at thirty dollars, and as I understand they do it on the authority of an artist from Philadelphia, and now the Senator from New Jersey says also on the authority of a dealer in pictures in New York. Well, I cannot say that I speak on the authority of any artist in Philadelphia or any dealer in pictures in New York; but I do speak on an authority which to me is better than both combined; and then I add that I do bring to it such judgment as I have on the question. I claim very little, however, for my own judgment, though it is a topic which has occupied some of my attention for some time; but I have in my hand a letter from a person so circumstanced as to be absolutely unselfish, and also so circumstanced at this moment as to find it his special duty to study this question. I would rather not mention his name, because I do not wish to bring it into contest. Suffice it to say that his authority with me is complete. I requested his opinion on this proposition, and I will read to you his reply:

"SIR: In obedience to your wish I make the following suggestions in relation to the increased tariff on paintings:

1. That there should be a specific duty on paintings of twenty dollars on each picture valued at $200 or less.

2. That an ad valorem duty of ten per cent. should be added on every painting valued at over $200.

The motion that I have made, it will be observed, is in harmony with this suggestion. He then proceeds:

"By this the artists are fully protected against the importation of trash.

"It will increase the revenue largely.

"It will prevent undervaluation at the custom-house.

"Thirty per cent. will keep out all of that excellent class of pictures by Frère, Lambinet, Plassan, Comte Calix, Dowergen, &c."

Mr. FESSENDEN. What does he say will keep those out?

Mr. SUMNER. Thirty per cent. That is what is proposed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The duty on the bill is thirty dollars on all valued at $100 and less; and the works of those artists whom he mentions, if they are eminent in their profession, will not come within that class. They will come much higher. He has made a mistake.

Mr. SUMNER. I think he has made no mistake, because his comment is on the text of the bill with that before him. He proceeds:

"It will admit only, and but a few of those, of Couture, Tissot, Meissonnier, Achenbach, and the like. It will check the growth of the taste for the fine arts. It will nearly destroy the revenue from this source. It will be a most unpopular measure, for the proposition to increase the tariff on works of art has already met with the nearly unanimous condemnation of the press.

"Feeling a deep and entirely unselfish interest in their matter, for one, I trust that you will use your influence, against any measure which, like that proposed, is certain to injure it."

I have introduced this letter because it is a clear statement and from a gentleman in whom I place entire confidence.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator, if he has no objection, in what business this person is so engaged, as he is said to have extraordinary opportunities to form a proper judgment on this question?

Mr. SUMNER. He has for some time been engaged in writing on art as an art critic, a student of art therefore, he, as he says himself, having no selfish interest in the value of pictures, but having a peculiar interest in the growth of taste in our country and in the patronage of good pictures. I have had another letter from still another person situated in the same way; that is, a writer on art, one who has written much, and whose writings for several years I have always read with very great interest whenever he touched artistic questions, and he has written to me in the same vein.

The question being put, there were—ayes two—

Several SENATORS. Give it up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is a further count demanded?

Mr. SUMNER. Let us have the other side.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That will render a call of the yeas and nays necessary. Let us have the yeas and nays in order to get a quorum.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I give it up.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. I am going to make one more effort to remove a tax on knowledge. I move to insert in the free list, on page 99, section eighteen, after line thirty, the following:

Books in foreign languages.

Now, that is a new proposition. I have not presented it before, though in the remarks that I have made I have alluded to it. The Senate therefore have not voted upon it. If they will give me their attention for one minute I will enable them to understand how I regard it.

By the proposed tariff all books in foreign languages are to pay twenty per cent. ad va- lorem. Of course by "books in foreign languages" is meant, as I understand it, not only books in the living languages, but in the dead languages, Latin and Greek, twenty per cent. ad valorem. And why that tax? Not for protection, for no such books are printed in our country. The Senator from New York by me [Mr. MORGAN] whispers to me that it is for revenue. How much revenue will you get out of it? The importations are not very large. The revenue, therefore, would not be much.

But what is the effect of the tax? So far as it has any effect it is to burden this importation of books, to make all who use books in foreign languages pay this tax of twenty per cent. The persons that use most of those books are not able to pay that tax. They are clergymen, scholars, and the students of the country. Beyond that, they are the large, I might almost say, multitudinous population of foreigners now distributed throughout our country. Here are the Germans everywhere, and they still cling, more or less, to their fatherland. They wish to keep up their acquaintance with its literature. Germans everywhere are essentially students, and I might almost say essentially scholars.

I have now on my table two catalogues I have received this very morning. One is entitled "A Philological Catalogue" of works recently published and on sale at a German house. The catalogue is of forty pages of works merely relating to philology. Here are works in the Caucasian language, the Hindoo languages, Chinese, Japanese, Hebrew, Chaldee, Samaritan, &c. Now, why should persons who are engaged in studies which require these works be compelled to pay this tax? When I mention this subject you will see at once that nobody enters into it except the scholars and students of the country, men who cannot afford to pay this additional tax. Here is another catalogue which is entitled, "An Educational Catalogue." That is fifty pages of works relating to education; the larger part of them in the German language; works interesting to every person who can read German and who is engaged in educational pursuits.

I have never heard but one argument in favor of this tax, and that I shall state. It is said that if you take off this tax it will cheapen modern French novels. Suppose it does; modern French novels constitute but a very small part of foreign literature; they are a small part even of the literature of France. Read any catalogue of recent French publications, and you will find that they perhaps are not more than a tenth, or a twentieth of that literature; and if you examine the catalogues of all the modern nations you will find that their proportion is still less. I submit, therefore, that the argument that you are going to make French novels cheaper is of little value when I plead for cheap books that are essential to the scholarship and the studies of our country.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the honorable Senator if he is quite sure that no Latin and Greek books, as he supposes, are published in the United States?

Mr. SUMNER. There are a great many.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would not books published in those languages in foreign countries compete with the publishing houses of the United States if there was no tariff?

Mr. SUMNER. I think not. I think that the Latin and Greek books that are published in the United States are entirely for school-books.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They could send them abroad and have them printed there and import them.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says they could send them abroad, print them there, and then import them; but the Senator forgets that these Latin and Greek books are prepared by our own scholars, the professors in our own colleges. Some of the professors in his own State of Maine have done much at that. There are several of the editions of the Greek writers that have been edited at the colleges in Maine; and they would be published here on the spot where the professors reside, where they could examine the proof-sheets. I do not think that there would be any competition that would trouble them, while, on the other hand, all of those people would be delighted to receive their books free of duty. I submit that it is hard on the professor or the schoolmaster, who has his insignificant salary, and who you may say is troubled with the ambition of scholarship, to compel him to pay your high duties.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to have a vote again on the amendment I offered last evening. I have modified it somewhat at the suggestion of several Senators. It is on page 26, section seven, at the end of line seventeen, to insert:

And any person or corporation may import and use railroad iron at any time within two years upon paying the duties imposed by law, any provision in any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding.

This applies solely to the Southern Pacific railroad, and perhaps one or two other railroads authorized by the United States. The number of miles to be built next year, according to the estimates submitted to us, is from five to six hundred miles on the different branches of this road; some say seven hundred, there being three branches of the road now being constructed, and the one on the Pacific slope, making four branches. The probable number of miles will be about five hundred. I estimate at the rate of about one hundred tons of iron to the mile, sixty pounds to the yard, and that will make the requirements of these roads fifty thousand tons. If this should be imported it will yield us a revenue of over seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

As I stated last night, the mills of this country cannot supply all that is desired. Large quantities are now imported and laid down within fifty miles of the rolling-mills. The present price of railroad iron, delivered on ship-board abroad, is between five and six pounds per ton, or less than thirty dollars. The present price of American iron is eighty-five dollars per ton. The restriction on the Union Pacific railroad compels them to take all their iron from the interior of Pennsylvania and the Atlantic slope, and thence around by Cape Horn to California. So with the branch roads; they are required to carry their iron by railroad transportation from the place of manufacture across the continent, now four hundred miles west of Omaha, while the English railroad iron can be brought up in steam vessels and be landed at Omaha. The difference in cost to the railroad company will be considerable, while the revenue derived from this iron, if imported, will be about three quarters of a million dollars. The rolling-mills will not be materially injured, because they are all kept in full blast, and if a dozen more were constructed they would have enough to do to supply the railroads of the United States with iron.

I think these are the only facts that bear upon it. I always thought the restriction a severe one, but just now it is oppressive. If suspended for two years by that time we may have rolling-mills enough in this country to supply the demand for railroad iron. So far as my State is concerned, we are not at all interested in the matter; the roads are far beyond our reach; but I feel that it is just and right to this road, in which the United States have so large an interest, that this restriction should be removed.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to offer an amendment, on page 89, section fifteen, at the end of line nine, to insert:

Provided, That all animals imported from Europe for breeding purposes only shall be admitted free.

Does the Senator from Maine assent to this amendment?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will ask the Senator what he proposes to do with race horses? They will come in under that head. If you say "for breeding purposes only," how are you going to distinguish?

Mr. SPRAGUE. I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate on this proposition. I believe every Senator will appreciate the importance of it. If we can raise the value of the stock of this country by importing animals from abroad that have received the attention for ages of the ablest and best practical experience of the time and of the world, the advantage to this country will be incalculable. I cannot conceive of anything that would be more to the advantage, to the wealth, and to the prosperity of this country, of its agricultural, its manufacturing, its commercial, and other interests than the adoption, as a general principle, of the introduction free of superior breeds of animals. By so doing you will enhance the value of your live stock incalculably. The importation of superior stock has done wonders in certain sections of this country; and if we can extend it throughout the country the wealth that will be created will be astonishing. I would apply it to any kind of stock. I think that the emulation created by the introduction of the race horse would far more than compensate for the amount lost to the revenue by his introduction free of duty.

The question being put on the amendment, there were—ayes 5, noes 6; no quorum voting.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN]—I suppose he is familiar with the subject—what amount of revenue during the past year has been realized from the importation of live stock. I should like to know how far this proposition will affect the revenue of the country. I suppose not very seriously. The object of the amendment, as I understand it, is to encourage the importation of blooded stock. Certainly that is of very great importance, and if the Government can contribute anything toward that I think it would be very well to do so. I cannot see how Senators who vote annually very large appropriations for the Agricultural Department can question this proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. The duty on the blooded stock imported during the last year amounted to $24,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then it is a very trifling question to the revenue; very trifling, indeed. As I was going on to say, I cannot see why a Senator who votes appropriations for the support of the Agricultural Department, and who voted in former years for the appropriation of land to agricultural colleges in the States, should oppose this proposition. It is a proposition in favor of the agricultural interest, to encourage the cultivation and the raising of fine stock in this country. There is no reason why we should not have stock in this country equal to that found in any country. I think the amendment ought to be adopted. It seems to me it ought not to be questioned.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I can only say in reference to this subject that the expense of importing blooded stock is so great that it requires the combination, as a general thing, of companies before they can bring any superior stock from Europe here. The insurance companies refuse to insure animals of that character, or indeed any animals from that considerable distance, and the importers are obliged to take the whole risk. In the locations in this country where companies have been formed and where this superior blooded stock has been introduced it has increased the value of the stock many hundred per cent., and my desire is that it should not be confined to localities, but that it should extend throughout the whole country. There is a great loss in this importation. Not more than a year or two ago the value of thirty-two horses imported in this way of from $100,000 to $150,000 was lost. Of course all this discourages the importation, discourages the enterprise; and we are obliged to depend upon our natural stock which does not improve upon itself. It needs the introduction of stock that has been brought up by experience, by the application of money and of attention in those countries that have devoted so much time to it.

I should not think it would require the attention of the Senate a moment to accede to this proposition. Stock is free everywhere else. They invite its introduction by all sorts of inducements in every other country, and consider it a matter of vast importance that the stock of one country that has become superior in that country should go into another, and in that way improve the stock of the country into which it is introduced.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall vote for this proposition, because I believe that the introduction of good stock will add to the public resources. I vote for it on precisely the ground on which I have made my various propositions for cheap books. The Senator from Rhode Island voted against the introduction of cheap books.

Mr. SPRAGUE. No, sir.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; he voted against introducing cheap books into the country, through which I hoped to elevate the education of the land.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the connection between the two?

Mr. SPRAGUE. I beg the Senator's pardon; I voted for it.

Mr. SUMNER. I stated the connection. The argument in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island is, that the introduction of this stock will add to the public resources and the public wealth and will raise the standard of the cattle and of horses. The introduction of good books will raise the standard of something higher than cattle or horses, of men. The Senator from Rhode Island, however, voted against that. I listened to his argument in favor of his own proposition. I simply apply it to mine. He did not say one word in favor of introducing his stock free of duty that is not completely applicable to the introduction of books free of duty. I shall vote with him, however.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cragin, Davis, Doolittle, Fogg, Fowler, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Patterson, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Yates—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Conness, Edmunds, Fessenden, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Morgan, Poland, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cattell, Chandler, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Foster, Guthrie, Howard, Kirkwood, Lane, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, and Saulsbury—21.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. On page 35, section seven, line two hundred and forty-one, I move to strike out "six" and to insert "eight;" so that the clause will read:

On files, file blanks, rasps, and floats of every description, not exceeding ten inches in length, twelve cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem; over ten inches in length, eight cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

I desire to say that I have conferred with the chairman of the committee, and also the Commissioner of the Revenue, and they make no objection to this amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I make no objection to it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. On page 31, section seven, line one hundred and fifty-three, I move to strike out "five" and to insert "seven;" so as to read:

On horseshoe nails, all kinds, seven cents per pound. This has also received the assent of the commissioner.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know that everybody in the Senate is bound if the commissioner has agreed with the Senator to raise the price of these articles. We are proceeding here, step by step, and raising the tariff upon all these articles—

Mr. SPRAGUE. I will observe that the tariff is the same as the old bill on this article.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What "old bill?"

Mr. SPRAGUE. The present law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. How many are imported?

Mr. SPRAGUE. You may import a great many under the increased duties on iron and rails, and I have no doubt there will be.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think these numerous amendments that are made may work great injury to persons concerned. To add two cents, making the duty on horseshoe nails seven cents instead of five, is adding a very considerable tax, as it strikes me, to the article, and will make it much more expensive to the consumer. However, I do not speak particularly about this amendment, but about these numerous amendments. If you put all these little amendments together they entirely change the nature and effect of this bill, and the tariff that is imposed upon these various articles amount to very much more than those who have examined the subject suppose to be necessary; but there seems to be a determination to keep adding, piling one tax upon another here, without any particular reason that I can see. Some Senator rises and makes a motion to add two cents or three cents or any sum to the tax already fixed, and it seems to go through without much objection. So far as I am concerned I object to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not care much whether this amendment be adopted or not; but I agree entirely with the honorable Senator from Oregon as to these continued amendments. No horseshoe nails have been imported into this country, and none can be. We shall manufacture them all for ourselves, whether the duty is five or seven cents. There is no importation, no competition—

Mr. CONNESS. They are just as safe from competition as screws.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Exactly; just as safe as any article in the whole tariff. It is merely making the tariff look higher for no possible object in the world. There are none imported, and none will be imported.

Now, I wish to make an appeal to the friends of this bill, if it has any friends in the Senate—I do not know whether it has or not. If they desire to have the tariff passed at this session of Congress they have got to stop this eternal offering of amendments. This is the tenth day that this bill has been under consideration, and the committee took up a little more than one day with their amendments. I do not complain of it, but I ask Senators to consider what has got to be done. We have now got through the month of January and we must adjourn on the 4th of March. This bill must go to the House, must be examined by the Committee of Ways and Means, because they have got to compare it with their contemplated bill affecting the internal revenue. That must be a work of time. They cannot do it in less than a week or ten days, perhaps more. Then it has got to be acted upon in the House, and then come back to the Senate with amendments, and we have got to discuss them, besides all the other business we have got to do. Now, if we keep drizzling along in this way it is impossible that the bill shall become a law at the present session, and I wish the friends of the bill to understand it.

If these amendments were at all material, if the bill could not be corrected in the House, if there is any mistake about it, I would not make these suggestions; but if anything is omitted which gentlemen want, or anything needs correction, it can be done by the House committee. It is important that this bill should get through the Senate, if it is going to get through at all, and that speedily. I know how it works. Every outsider who wants an amendment comes to his Senator or some other Senator and wants him to move this or that, or writes a letter to somebody to make a motion on this or that, and then he does it "on the statement of a most respectable gentleman who understands the subject." Sir, the thing has run into the ground; it has got to be an absolute absurdity; and the country, if they are not laughing at us, ought to be for the course we are pursuing about it. I leave the further consideration of it to those who are opposed to the bill, and I must say for the gentlemen on the other side who belong to the other party they have given us no trouble at all. What we have had has all been within our own ranks, and we have got to take it, be it more or less.

I repeat, sir, it is of no use at all for us to go on in this way. I believe my friend from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] is the only man in the Senate who has not made a motion to amend or made a speech on this subject.

Mr. FOGG. Oh, no; you must except me. Mr. TRUMBULL. There are many others.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to have them pointed out. There may be one or two more. I do not complain of them, but I wish to say to gentlemen we have got to finish this bill some time or other, and I wish to say particularly to the friends of the bill that the only way we can do it is for them to exercise a little forbearance, and tell their friends who call upon them to have amendments made to go to the House, that the bill cannot be kept here any longer. Unless they will do that we cannot pass the bill and make it a law at the present session.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I do not wish to occupy time on this subject; but I do not mean to receive a reprimand—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not mean it for the Senator at all, or anybody in particular. He has been as forbearing as anybody.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I have a duty to discharge, and I intend to discharge it to the best of my ability. I have been waiting here for the last three or four days to get the floor or to retain it on these propositions. Now I know of what I speak. I know all about the making of these horseshoe nails, and I know that the machinery that has been applied to their manufacture has reduced the price of horseshoe nails from fifty cents to twenty cents. It requires a cost of fifty cents to make a pound of horseshoe nails by hand. By the machinery now in operation the consumers of this country are getting their horseshoe nails at twenty cents. The duties are the same as under the present tariff. You have advanced the iron that they import, and which it is necessary for them to import, as it cannot be made in this country, nearly a cent a pound. The waste to get this article into nails is only equivalent, in my judgment, to the amount that you have raised on the iron. So if you want cheap nails you have got to enable these people to carry on their establishments, and to carry them on with imported iron. If you drive them out and let your nails be made by the cheap labor abroad you will be just where you were before and pay forty or fifty cents for your nails. This amendment is to enable you to get and keep cheap nails; and I trust that those who are engaged in agricultural pursuits will see it that way.

Mr. McDUGALL obtained the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator will permit me I wish to move that the Senate take a recess until half past six o'clock.

Several SENATORS. Say seven. Mr. HENDERSON. No; half past six; that is just two hours.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Say seven. We cannot get back here by half past six.

Mr. McDUGALL. All I want to say I shall say in five minutes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us take a recess now and you will have the floor in the evening.

Mr. McDUGALL. I am not going to detain the Senate. I only want to make a remark.

Mr. HENDERSON. Cannot you make your remarks afterward?

Mr. McDUGALL. I prefer doing it now. I shall be through in five minutes.

I approve of the management of this measure by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. It did happen that some years ago the Secretary of War recommended the introduction of camels into this country, and I being then a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House was assigned to report the bill. I did report the bill; and the first thing that was said to me was by a gentleman who designed to do it in jest, "Refer it to Barnum;" and the thing was lost for the moment. Now, probably the Senator who last addressed the Senate does not know what kind of nails are required to enable a camel to get over the Rocky mountains or the Sierra Nevada. He knows what kind of nails are used in the factories of Rhode Island.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until half past six o'clock.

Several SENATORS. Say seven.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to amend the proposition by saying seven o'clock.

Mr. HENDERSON. I accept the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senate will not take any recess. The Senator from Maine has spoken the words of truth and soberness when he has told us that we have got to stick to this bill if we expect to pass it. We have found by experience that if we go away and undertake to come back here in the evening we are very soon without a quorum. I should hope gentlemen might be able to fast a little while for the sake of getting on with this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not undertake to express an opinion or a wish in regard to this matter; but I hope, however, the Senate will either sit straight along now or take a recess, with the understanding that the vote is to be taken to-night upon the bill. ["Agreed, agreed."]

Mr. McDUGALL. Let me ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if the gentlemen of the majority will stay here to maintain a quorum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That remains to be seen.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will stay here.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If we are to take a recess I wish gentlemen to understand that if we come back at seven o'clock we are to stay until we take a vote upon the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senate will meet at half past seven o'clock we will accept the proposition.

Mr. FESSENDEN. A recess until seven o'clock gives two hours and a half, and I should think that is long enough for gentlemen to get their dinners.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Some of us cannot get back at seven.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have not offered one amendment to this bill. The Senator from Maine is aware that I shall put no clogs and I never do put any in the way of measures. I am opposed to the passage of the bill, and I desire to offer five or six, or perhaps eight or ten amendments, but I shall not occupy any of the time of the Senate in discussing them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There will be ample time for that after meeting at seven o'clock.

Mr. HENDERSON. But suppose I cannot get the floor. Friends of the bill have been offering amendments all the time and I have not been able to get the floor yet to offer a single amendment. I shall submit my amendments without discussion, and I will consent to take the vote on the bill to-night if that does not deprive me of the privilege of offering my amendments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think there is any danger of that. The Senator will probably not be interfered with.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to suggest again that we meet again at half past seven o'clock.

Mr. HENDERSON. Seven o'clock is late enough. I insist on the motion that the Senate now take a recess until seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 912) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1868, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 525) supplementary to an act to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes, approved July 18, 1866, were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication of the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of January 26, a copy of Major General J. H. Wilson's report on the capture of Jefferson Davis; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

SIOUX RESERVATION SETTLERS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to take up for consideration House joint resolution No. 126, which I am sure will occasion no debate.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) for the relief of certain settlers on the Sioux reservation, in the State of Minnesota, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize those persons who settled and made improvements upon lands now included in the Sioux reservation in Minnesota, and filed notice of their claims in the proper local land office, before the boundaries of the reservation were definitely surveyed and located, to enter the lands thus settled upon, as in other cases of preemption, upon the payment of $1 25 per acre, under such rules and regulations as may be provided by the Secretary of the Interior.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORGANIZATION OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I ask the Senate to dispose of House bill No. 874, regulating the duties of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, which was up last evening and was put over at the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have had a consultation with him, and I believe he does not design taking any exception to it now. It will take but a few moments I think. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 874) to regulate the duties of the Clerk of the House of Representatives in preparing for the organization of the House, and for other purposes, the question being on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I shall not call for the yeas and nays on the passage of this bill, although I am opposed to its enactment. I suppose, however, there would be no advantage in causing its postponement, as I suppose the majority will pass it whenever a quorum shall be present. I think it is questionable whether a law of this sort ought to be enacted to bind the action of a future Congress. I suppose that a new House of Representatives when it is assembled together can act according to its own pleasure. It cannot be bound by any opinion, even if put into the form of a statute, of a prior Congress. I think, therefore, if this subject were debated upon principle it might well be held open to strong objections upon this ground.

Now, sir, the power of the Clerk of the House of Representatives to call the roll of the members-elect I understand to rest upon usage and upon the acquiescence of the House itself. I do not understand that by a statute of the present Congress you can control a future Congress with reference to the manner in which they shall act in their organization or in the discharge of any other duty which particularly pertains to it as a House. It seems to me at least doubtful. Resting upon acquiescence, the practice of having the Clerk call over the roll of members-elect is a convenient one. But upon former occasions the authority or power of the Clerk against objection has been denied. I remember that it was strongly denied upon one occasion by John Quincy Adams, and that upon another occasion, where the action of the Clerk was excepted to or his authority denied, one of the members-elect was put in the chair for the purpose of organizing the House.

Besides, this bill provides that the Clerk shall put upon the roll the name of no member of the House from any State which was not represented in the prior Congress. Suppose you have a new State admitted into the Union under a public law; the mode of electing members for that State is prescribed by law; members are elected and are present in the House. Under a bill of this kind the votes of those members from a new State would be excluded because the State was not represented in the prior Congress. Perhaps the organization of the House may depend upon the votes of those very members.

Again, it may be supposed that in a particular Congress some State may be unrepresented. There may be some question of contest and no member admitted, and the State thus be unrepresented in the prior Congress.

It seems to me that this bill from the House is a crude measure, one of doubtful propriety, one which ought not to be passed; but, as I said before, as this is one of a series of measures directed to the exclusion of representation from the southern States, as it belongs to a class of legislation which seems to be a favorite one with the House of Representatives, I presume that the majority would enact it if a quorum were present, even upon full debate. For that reason I shall content myself with hinting the reasons or grounds upon which I objected to this bill when it was up last evening, and upon which I shall give a silent vote against it now.

Mr. DAVIS. I call for the yeas and nays on any reading of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has had three readings and the question is on its passage. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I ask that this bill may be laid aside informally for a short time until I can get the action of the Senate on a bill or two which I should like to have disposed of.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no objection. I am willing to defer a vote until the Senate shall be fuller, unless the Senator from Kentucky desires to press a vote at this moment.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir, I adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let the bill be laid aside for the present by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to that course, and the bill is laid aside.

DESTRUCTION OF UNITED STATES NOTES.

Mr. HOWE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 302.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 302) for the relief of the American Mutual Insurance Company of New York was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for issuing to the American Mutual Insurance Company of New York eight United States notes of $1,000 each, not bearing interest, lost or destroyed by the foundering of the steamer Quincy at sea on the 13th of December, 1863; but the company is to execute a bond in the penal sum of $16,000, to be approved by the Solicitor of the Treasury, indemnifying the United States against any loss on account of the issue of the notes.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON STREETS AND AVENUES.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 272, which provides for ornamenting the streets of the city of Washington. It was prepared by the Committee on the District of Columbia last year, but the season slipped by and it was too late. Unless the bill is passed very soon it will be of no use whatever at this season.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 272) authorizing the corporation of Washington to reduce the width and improve the avenues and streets of that city was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill recites that in consequence of the great width of many of the streets and avenues in the city of Washington the cost of paving thereof falls oppressively upon the property fronting thereon; and for the purpose of reducing such expenses and improving the streets and avenues it is provided that full power and authority be conferred upon the corporation of Washington to prescribe and regulate the width and method of improvement of the carriage-ways and footways, and of all that portion of the surface not included in carriage-ways or footways, of all streets or avenues in the city of Washington which exceed in width one hundred feet.

An amendment was proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That power and authority be, and hereby are, conferred upon the corporation of Washington, subject to such limitations and restrictions as Congress may from time to time prescribe, to regulate the width and method of improvement of the carriage-ways and footways, and of all that portion of the surface not included in carriage-ways or footways, of all streets or avenues in the city of Washington which exceed in width one hundred feet, saving and excepting Pennsylvania avenue and that portion of Louisiana avenue between Fourth and Fifth streets west, and such streets and other avenues as are now occupied or by law authorized to be occupied by railroads, according to the following plan, namely: the paved or carriage-way shall be in the center of the street or avenue and forty feet wide between the curbs. The pavements on each side thereof shall be fifteen feet wide. The steps shall not extend more than seven feet beyond the building lines, and the residue of the street or avenue between the points already designated shall be reserved for trees and shrubbery; one row of trees to be planted in the pavements, two feet within the line of the curbs, and another row parallel to the first on the residues aforesaid.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I now call for consideration on the tariff bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business which was pending at the time of the recess is now before the Senate, being the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide for increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] to strike out "five" and insert "seven," in line one hundred and fifty-three of section seven, on page 31; so as to read: "on horseshoe nails, all kinds, seven cents per pound."

Mr. McDougall. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate by any discussion of this subject; but there are some questions that might be considered. I spoke this morning of the nails that were used for a camel. I might say something of the nails that are used in the Alleghenies in Pennsylvania, and of the nails that are used in California. I might say that the camels of which I spoke required more nails than any other animal that travels ever introduced into this country, and the camels require larger nails. The trouble with them is that they have immense humps; they can ascend the mountains, but when they descend, on account of the want of gravity of their hinder parts they are very apt to fall on their heads, and therefore they are not good travelers, although camels are very fine animals. Then there is the California horse; he does not want any nails at all. But I do not understand exactly why there should be a special tax upon nails for horses for the benefit of any particular section of the country. I think this is too near begging, and I believe that no one in the United States of North America should beg.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The amendment is proposed in consequence of the increased duties upon iron. Before the introduction of machinery for the manufacture of horseshoe nails they were made from nail rods by hand, and, as I before stated, it cost to make nails by hand fifty cents a pound. By the introduction of machinery not quite as good nails, but nearly so, can be produced at twenty cents a pound. The parties who have introduced that improvement in this manufacture feel they are in danger of coming in contact with labor at nine or ten cents a day in Russia, Norway, and elsewhere, from which the iron comes to be introduced into these nails. American iron is as yet unsuitable for this purpose. They feel that their business may be injured, and if their business be injured and they driven out in consequence of the introduction of nails from abroad we shall have to go back again to the old prices. Although the Senator from Maine thinks there will be no nails introduced from abroad, he cannot tell what may be introduced in consequence of the increased duties upon iron, and they are afraid that their business will be interrupted. If so the consequence will be that you will go back again to the payment of the old price, which was fifty cents a pound instead of twenty. If the agricultural districts desire to have this arrangement carried into effect, be it so. That is the fact of the case.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The next proposition I desire to submit is one that has been placed in my hands by my colleague, [Mr. ANTHONY,] who is confined to his house. It is not a subject of very great magnitude in the number of men employed, but it is just as much entitled to consideration as if it employed a thousand men and $1,000,000 of capital. It is in relation to cyclets. I move in line forty-six of section ten, on page 72, to strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty-five;" so as to read:

On cyclets of every description sixty-five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope that will not be agreed to. The duty is now thirty-five per cent., and we have raised it to fifty.

Mr. SPRAGUE. In many instances an increase of duty beyond what has been suggested by the Senator from Maine has been asked and has been granted by the Senate. This is not a mammoth interest that comes here and requests an increase that it may go on, but it is an infant interest out of the brain of an ingenious and practical head. A machine has been introduced and is now in operation, which, if permitted to go on, will bring these little things that enter so widely into the consumption of the people to one half the price they have heretofore had them. Give this incipient interest a place to stand on now when all interests are so much in danger, and you will find that in a little while it will not need the protection thus accorded; the provision will soon be a dead letter, for the reason that under this protection our people will be able to go on and produce these articles cheaper than they can be produced abroad where labor and capital are at reduced rates. It is as important that this interest should be cared for as that the largest interest should be; and I trust that the Senate will accord this advance as they have accorded a similar advance in other instances where the question has been discussed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will simply say that the gentleman who is engaged in this business was before the committee and exhibited his cyclets and explained his business to the committee; and after hearing that gentleman and not hearing anything in opposition from any other source, the committee came to the conclusion on his own representations that fifty per cent. was an adequate tariff to impose. I should think that fifty per cent. ad valorem ought to be a sufficient protection to a business of this kind. That was the judgment of the committee after hearing this gentleman, who stated his case fully, and I believe his is the only manufacturing establishment of the kind that has been established in the United States.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I fear, Mr. President, that there may be this evil in the present condition of things: persons who are elected to fill high office and handle the affairs of great States and nations take care of themselves.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The gentleman to whom the Senator from Oregon refers writes thus:

"I fear the committee did not fully understand our situation as competitors of foreign manufacturers of eyelets.

The foreign eyelet as now imported under the thirty-five per cent. ad valorem duty costs the importers an average of about fourteen cents.

The fifteen per cent. additional, making the ad valorem duty on eyelets fifty per cent., will make them cost two and one tenth per cent. additional, making the cost to the importer under the proposed law sixteen and one tenth cents per thousand.

The average cost of the eyelets manufactured by the American Eyelet Company, paying thirty-five per cent. more for stock than its foreign competitors is about eighteen and one half cents per thousand, requiring an additional duty of more than fifteen per cent. to place us on an even footing with our foreign competitors.

"I feel warranted in taking the ground that we, as new beginners in a new business in this country, ought to receive encouragement from the Government by at least being placed on an equal footing with the foreign manufacturer. It would seem that as new beginners, experimenting with new machinery never before used, tested, and perfected, we ought to be protected to a degree that would give us a small margin in our favor, in order that we may not be forced by a combined foreign competition to leave the field for the benefit of European laborers and capitalists.

"I trust that you know enough of the prominent men in our company to be able to satisfy the members of the committee that it is the purpose of this company to manufacture eyelets as a legitimate business, which we cannot do without further protection than what is proposed by the committee under the present state of the market, and with our present facilities."

This is the gentleman who appeared before the committee, and I trust the Senate will accord to him what is asked.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will only say that we took the gentleman's own statements, took his own figures, and made our calculations upon them. I cannot remember the details now, but I know that we came to the conclusion that fifty per cent. would be enough, and we raised the duty from thirty-five per cent. to fifty per cent.

Mr. SPRAGUE. He says here in a postscript, which I did not notice before:

"I refer particularly in the above to small eyelets. The fifty per cent. may be sufficient for the large sizes of Government eyelets; but the small sizes used in shoes, corsets, hoop-skirts, &c., need further protection, which I have no doubt the committee will see when their attention is called to it."

There can be no doubt as to this being the fact.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move to amend by inserting after line two hundred and ninety-three of section seven, on page 37:

Additional specific duty on machinery, namely: On coarse roving machines or slubber spindles, thirty-nine inches long, and upward, $1 50 per spindle.

On fine roving machines or fly-frames for spindles, less than thirty-nine inches long, $1 25 per spindle.

On spinning or throstle-frames, with or without spindles, sixty cents per spindle.

On mules or jacks for spinning yarn, with or without spindles, thirty-five cents per spindle.

On spindles when imported without the machines, to wit: on coarse roving machines or slubber spindles, thirty-nine inches long, and upward, fifty cents per spindle; on fine roving machine or fly-frame spindles, less than thirty-nine inches long, forty cents per spindle; on twister, spinning, or throstle-frame spindles, twelve cents each; on mule and jack spindles, eight cents each; on spooler spindles, ten cents each; on slubber or fly-frame flyers, thirty-five cents each.

It will be remembered that the Senate has increased the duty on machinery in this bill from forty-five to fifty-five per cent. It may be that this amendment which I now move is against the interest of the cotton manufacturers of my own section; it certainly is so apparently, and of course contrary to my own interest. But it is shown in the report of the commissioner that all the machinery required in this country is now being built abroad, except in cases where we have become familiar with certain styles of machines that foreigners have not yet been able to build. Of all other machinery foreigners to-day have the monopoly. I have in my hand a letter which indicates how this foreign machinery is introduced. It is not introduced as completed machinery, but as machinery in parts and portions as unmanufactured, though it is in fact manufactured ready to be put up. I have in my hand a letter from one of the pioneer manufacturers of machinery in this country; I do not believe he has his superior in the world; and by the indulgence of the Senate I will read to them some of his ideas:

"The existing tariff discriminates largely in favor of foreign machine-makers—"

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. DOOLITTLE in the chair.) The Senator from Rhode Island is entitled to the floor: does he yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SPRAGUE. No, sir.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will state his point of order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It is that it is not the privilege of a Senator to read manuscript here unless he quotes it as authority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the Senator from Rhode Island is in order.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I will read the letter:

"The existing tariff discriminates largely in favor of foreign machine-makers, so much so that the majority of the machinery now being ordered is to come from abroad. Our prices here are very low compared with the exorbitant cost of material and the high rate of wages, yet if it were not for the small orders that do not pay to go to Europe for and the superior quality of the American machinery we should have nothing to do. Everything would come from abroad. The present rates of duty, which are mostly specific, amount to fifty-eight per cent. on pig iron, sixty-seven per cent. on refined bar iron, sixty-seven per cent. on spring steel, and thirty-three and one half per cent. on machinery steel. Beside we have to pay five per cent. on the selling price of the finished machine internal tax, and the effect of this tax on wages, &c., will amount to five per cent. more, while the duties of foreign machinery are only thirty-five per cent. The duties on the materials of which any English machine is constructed would come to more money than on the finished machine.

"We therefore have not only the cheap foreign capital and pauper labor to contend with, but unequal duties and our internal taxation. There is a provision in our present tariff, it is true, that machinery which is composed partly of steel shall pay a duty of forty-five per cent., but importers evade this clause by boxing the steel parts, such as spindles, &c., in separate boxes and entering them as a manufacture of steel, while the great bulk of the machines come in as manufactures of iron. Therefore, I think that the duties on machinery should be the same whether made of steel or iron, or steel and iron, or brass and wood. With the present rates of duty on materials, taking our internal taxation into account, the duties on machinery ought to be at least sixty-five per cent. How much you intend to raise the rates on iron, steel, &c., I do not know, but the rates on machinery ought to be in proportion. The raising of the duties on iron, steel, &c., I suppose is for the benefit of those who are connected with the iron and steel interests. This is all well enough, but of what benefit will it be to them if the manufactures of iron are not protected also? Who will buy their iron if all the manufactures that are made of iron come from England? The machine manufacturers of this country ask no favor of John Bull, nor any exclusive privileges from our own Government; all we ask is to be placed on an equal footing so far as duties and taxes are concerned, and to do this I am of the opinion that with your new rates of duty the rate on machinery will have to be raised to one hundred per cent."

It is, Mr. President, a startling fact that the machinery of this country is now being produced abroad; and it is also a startling fact that almost every commodity known to American consumption is also at the present time being produced abroad. I think that during the nine days this bill has been before the Senate Senators have lost sight of, or have shut their eyes to, the exact condition of the country, or the condition in which it was when they left their homes to come here. There has been no revival of business at home since then. Everything is stagnant. The industry, the labor of the country is now unemployed, or about to be thrown out of employment. The reason is very plain, and the results are manifest.

But, sir, it is suggested that the Senate has become tired of the agitation of this question, and of the interest which members have shown concerning this bill. Sir, it would seem to me very strange if Senators did not take an interest and feel anxious in relation to matters connected with the interests of the people. When the whole country is anxious and trembling under the weight of taxation and the heavy burdens imposed upon the people for the last five years, it is to me passing strange that members of this body, representatives of the people, are unwilling to take cognizance of their interests. I am glad that there are in Washington men from the northern States who have come down here to attend to their interests; and but for those men during the past five years where would your country be to-day? If those men had not been willing, had not been able, and had not stood ready to give their support to this Government, what would you have done?

Sir, I know something about the beginning of this war. I know the fear and trembling that existed all over the country. I know who were the men that came up and responded to the call of the Government, and aided you in obtaining and maintaining the stand that enabled you to carry the war to a successful conclusion. Those men are here to-day, and they demand, for the sake of their country, for the sake of their wives and children, for the sake of the communities around them, that the Senate should take an interest in what concerns them; and that which concerns them concerns all the patriotic people who have done so much to vindicate the rights and to establish the principles of free government. For myself, I am unwilling that any interest with which such people are connected should be prostrated or should not receive proper attention. Here is one that now is in the hands of the enemy—the enemy of this people and of this Government; in the hands of a people and a Government who would have turned every one of you over to the tender mercies of the rebels if they had the power. They did make the effort, but were unsuccessful. Will you now put this advantage into the hands of a Power that thus acted, and that in your weakness evinced a desire to prostrate you, and are now really as willing and desirous to prostrate you as they were then? For my part I am unwilling that that condition of things shall be.

I heard with a good deal of regret the remarks of the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee in reference to this bill just before we left here this afternoon. He spoke to the friends of the measure, and told them that they should not heap amendments upon it; that they should not be representing their constituents and the constituents of others, for, as I take it, members here are not only representing the interests of their own State, but the interests of almost every other State. Such has been my position. There are but few of the interests that I have taken charge of here which are located in my own State—not more than one or two. But while there is an enemy in the Opposition, and one who has been prominent in getting up this bill, it does not come with a very good grace from that Senator to remind members who are favorable to this measure in this way. When I suggest that, I mean that the commissioner, who is now more powerful upon this floor than any one else, who occupies a seat here, and receives more attention than any member, desires that this bill should be defeated.

Will it be defeated? If the Senate are willing to follow that lead blindly, as they seem to have shown a disposition to do, they will undoubtedly defeat the bill; but I trust there is more independence, more manhood, more determination, more will on the part of the members of the Senate than to follow any man's lead. At any rate I hope they will not follow any man's lead unless that man has shown that he is entitled to respect and to consideration for the services he has performed, and certainly not the lead of a man who has obtained an uncertain reputation from a book in which we are informed that the experiences of the past are no criteria for the administration of the future. According to that authority you are not, Senators, to look at the management of States and nations that have heretofore existed in judging how you are to act to-day; but you are to act upon new theories and introduce new elements. If that be the course you are to pursue, my judgment is that you will have a very difficult problem to solve.

That the American people will respond to all the additional burdens that may be placed upon them by inconsiderate and thoughtless legislation I do not believe. I do not believe it is possible for them to go on much longer with this pressure. I think they have been burdened almost as much as they can bear, and the slightest additional weight will have a tendency to, and will in fact, crush out the enterprise, the energy, and the prosperity of your people for the next twenty years. You should act with great care and consideration, and not become tired in investigating their interests.

The proposition before the Senate is, as I have said, rather against my personal interest; but I believe the machine-shop is as necessary to all the industrial interests of the country as those interests themselves, and if you sacrifice them you sacrifice all your interests. Here are men that are skilled in the making of machinery, that are educated in the working of iron and steel and copper; they have grown into that education from long years of experience and study. Whether you will permit them to be turned out of employment and give this business altogether into the hands of foreigners is for you to determine. I do not believe that is the sentiment of this body; I do not believe that is the sentiment of the American people; at any rate, I trust not. I am sure it would not be if they could understand the results of such a policy. The results of it are disaster. I know that if all our interests, great and small, are not carefully and tenderly adjusted the consequences will be disastrous to the country, and you will wake up to that sad reality when it is too late.

I hope, sir, that this amendment will prevail. It simply gives protection in the point urged by the gentleman whose letter I have read, so as to prevent the introduction in boxes of portions of the machinery as unmanufactured when it is in reality all ready to be set up. It adds a duty of nearly ten per cent. It specifies spindles and the various articles of cotton machinery separate from the main machine, and gives an additional duty of ten per cent. which is as little as this interest can possibly do with.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, I am very ignorant about many things, and can be informed undoubtedly by the Senator from Rhode Island. Perhaps he can interpret to me what "spindles" mean.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I refer the gentleman to the dictionary.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Which one?

Mr. SPRAGUE. Webster or Worcester: take your choice.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Ah! Then you adjourn the question to the dictionaries!

Mr. SPRAGUE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yea 1, nays 28; as follows:

YEA—Mr. Sprague—1.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Craig, Davis, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Henderson, Howard, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, McDougall, Patterson, Poland, Ramsey, Stewart, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—28.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Cowan, Creswell, Dixon, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wade—28.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I regret, Mr. President, to occupy any of the time of the Senate, and I have occupied as little as possible of it during this investigation, but I desire now very briefly to submit two or three amendments without discussing them. On page 83, line seventeen of section twelve, I move to strike out "ten" and insert "fifteen" so as to make the clause read:

On skivers and roans, pickled or salted, fifteen per cent. ad valorem.

On these skivers here spoken of as salted one half the work is done before they are brought here. In these sheepskins the whole country is interested. Immense quantities of them, I am informed, are now imported.

Mr. FESSENDEN. All I can say is that the committee examined this question very carefully and came to the conclusion that they had fixed the duties about right. If the Senate choose to change them on the statements of interested parties, be it so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose they were fixed on representations.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On the same page, in line twenty-eight of section twelve, I move to strike out "forty" and insert "fifty;" so as to read:

On morocco, enameled, glazed, japanned, varnished, and patent leather, fifty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope not.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On page 73, line eighty-five of section ten, I move after "fur" to insert "and silk;" so as to read, "on fur and silk hats," &c., "fifty per cent. ad valorem."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEWART. On page 28, line seventy of section seven, I move to strike out the words "not including tagger's iron," and also to strike out lines seventy-two and seventy-three, which read:

On tagger's iron, not exceeding fourteen inches in width by twenty inches in length, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

The object of this amendment is to place tagger's iron with the other sheet iron. It is claimed with a good deal of plausibility, and I am convinced that there is something in it, that the bill as it now stands is liable to abuse. It is said that the thickness of tagger's iron not being determined in the bill, the result will be that iron fourteen inches by twenty may be sent here of sufficient size for stove-pipes, and may come into competition with the other species of sheet-iron, tagger's iron being taxed only thirty per cent. ad valorem, much lower than the others. It seems to me the bill as it now stands is liable to abuse.

I am informed that there is very little tagger's iron used in the country, not enough to make it an exception to ordinary iron; there is only a small quantity of it used for umbrellas; and placing in the bill this exception in favor of tagger's iron will render it liable to great abuse.

The whole tariff upon sheet iron, medium quality, appears to be lower in comparison than that placed on sheet lead and sheet copper. It appears to be low in comparison even with wire. After having given this subject some investigation I am satisfied that this amendment ought to prevail. Parties are very desirous that the duty on sheet iron should be increased, but I do not propose to offer that amendment. I think striking out "tagger's iron" here and leaving it in the same situation as the other iron is very reasonable, and ought to be done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will make a very short explanation about this matter. We put it precisely at what it was before. Tagger's iron is not made in this country at all. It is imported in boxes, and is principally used for making buttons and things of that sort. A considerable quantity is imported for that purpose. The question was before the committee, and we examined it very carefully on the statement of a gentleman that there might be some danger of fraud, but on inquiry we found that "tagger's iron" was well understood, and that by specifying the size there would be no danger of its being imported under another name. We decided, therefore, to adhere to the rate the House fixed on it.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOWLER. On page 1, line ten of section one, I move to strike out "five" and insert "three;" so as to read:

On coffee of all kinds, three cents per pound.

This is an amendment that concerns nine tenths of the people of the United States, those classes who are expected to pay all the taxes. Our taxes, not only those under the internal revenue system, but the impost duties, must be finally collected off the labor of the country. The present tax on coffee is five cents a pound, which is about fifty per cent. I think it is very high; but if that rate were necessary for the payment of the interest on the debt of the country I should not object to it. I have supported all the duties that have been levied on different articles, although our people are consumers, because I believe it is necessary to enable us to pay the interest on the debt of the Government; but I do not think it wise or prudent that the Government should collect more revenue than is necessary for the purpose of discharging its obligations. Last year we collected about one hundred and seventy-nine million dollars from customs duties, much more than was necessary for the purpose I have stated. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that for the next fiscal year we shall require over one hundred and thirty-three million dollars to pay the interest on our debt, and for foreign intercourse about thirteen hundred thousand dollars, making about one hundred and thirty-five million dollars in gold. I suppose this tariff will yield as much revenue as the existing one, and the Secretary of the Treasury estimates that the existing one for the present fiscal year will raise $145,000,000; thus making at least $10,000,000 more than is necessary for the gold wants of the Government. This proposed diminution of the tax on coffee will leave the rate per cent. about thirty per cent., and will diminish the revenue about two million dollars; not more than that. I think this reduction can very easily be made without interfering with the wants of the Government; and it will relieve a very large portion of the community who are expected to pay all the taxes, those men who supply the revenues of the Government by their own labor.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Coffee can be made out of rye or wheat. I have used it many a time. I do not think that there is going to be any great privation to the people of any part of this country by reason of the duty on coffee. I have lived in a community that could not afford to pay high prices for coffee, and they roasted wheat and roasted rye and made those substitutes answer the purpose. This tax does not amount to the magnitude of those nails we heard spoken of recently.

Mr. FOWLER. I should like to have the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the amendment by inserting "two and a half" instead of "three."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not in order. The proposition of the Senator from Tennessee being an amendment to an amendment, is not amendable.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am inclined to think that the amendment ought to be adopted, or the duty reduced to two and a half cents a pound. I really cannot tell what amount of revenue will be derived under this bill, nor can any one; but I am inclined to think that under it the revenue will be largely increased beyond the amount received last year. Five cents a pound upon coffee was fifty per cent. on the value of the coffee imported in 1864-65, and between forty-five and fifty per cent. on that imported in 1863-64. It is an article that, although once regarded as a luxury, has now become an absolute necessity to the laboring man, who perhaps uses a larger quantity of it than the wealthy man, who is not compelled to labor for a livelihood. I am satisfied that, so far as the revenue is concerned, this reduction can be safely made; and I am satisfied further that something ought to be done to relieve the people.

Since the bill was reported by the committee the duties have been increased by the Senate; almost every amendment made by the Senate has been to increase duties; I do not know of one solitary decrease. Even the duties on woollens, which were supposed to be very high and against which objections were made on every hand, were increased, and if I am not much mistaken very largely increased, by the amendment adopted this morning on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Wilson.] The duties on iron and other materials were surely high enough before; but every time the duties in this bill have been touched by the Senate it has been to increase them. It really seems to me that a decrease can be made in the duty on coffee; and as on revenue considerations it is admissible, a decrease ought to be made.

It will be seen in regard to the article of tea, if you take the importations of 1863, 1864, and 1865, that the present tariff of twenty-five cents per pound is a tariff of one hundred per cent. Here they is a tariff of one hundred per cent. upon an article that is not a luxury but almost a necessity, an article which everybody uses. If it can be reduced, why not reduce it? There will not probably be any more of it brought into the country in consequence of the reduction; it will require no greater exportation of gold to pay for it. People will use it in the same quantity as before. Now, we of the West are compelled to pay a percentage, not only upon the original cost, but upon the tariff duty, and also a percentage to the importer, to the jobber, and to the retailer. And hence it is that an article of Java coffee, which costs in the foreign market between ten and a half and twelve cents per pound; as is shown by the importers' invoices, costs us from thirty-eight to forty-five cents per pound. It will be a very great relief to reduce these duties, and in my judgment the amendment which is offered ought to be adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will simply state in regard to this question that I suppose every Senator understands the arguments pro and con. with reference to the duties on tea and coffee. The duties are more easily and surely collected on these articles than any others; and I do not know that there has been any complaint on account of them. The importation has been largely increasing for the last two years. Now, the importation of coffee is about one hundred and sixty million pounds, and the estimated duties accruing for this year will be about eight million dollars. This amendment will strike off about four million dollars. It is quite uncertain how this tariff is going to operate, and it is hardly worth while for us to give up these duties that are certain, and may surely be relied on for revenue. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say that I shall vote for this amendment because I believe the revenues can afford the reduction, and I am inclined to think that the consumption would increase so that the reduction in the revenue would not be very great.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalaw, Chandler, Conness, Cra-gin, Davis, Doolittle, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Patterson, Ramsey, Stewart, and Yates—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Cowan, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Howard, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sprague, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Williams, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Creswell, Dixon, Guthrie, Harris, Hendricks, McDougall, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sumner, and Trumbull—18.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. On page 1, line nine of section one, I move to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifteen;" so as to read:

On teas of all kinds, fifteen cents per pound.

I have just stated in regard to teas, that the duty is one hundred per cent., as shown by the importations of several years past. It is an exorbitant duty, largely too much in my judgment, and it can be reduced very well. The importations show that the article costs in the foreign market, upon an average, twenty-five cents per pound. We by sad experience in the West find that it generally costs us from a dollar and a half to two dollars and a half per pound. Senators will see that I am correct in my statement of the foreign value by looking at the tables of importation for the last three or four years. In 1863 and 1864 there were imported into this country 87,229,176 pounds of tea at a valuation of $10,549,880, the duty on which was over nine million dollars. In 1864 and 1865 the importation was 18,595,314 pounds at a valuation of $4,702,856, and the duty was the same, being just about the original cost of the article in the foreign market. The importation was largely reduced in 1864 and 1865. I have not the tables before me for the subsequent year.

Thus it appears that if we were to take off the duty entirely the loss to the revenue would be perhaps $4,500,000. By taking off ten cents a pound, of course the reduction will be in the proportion of twenty-five to fifteen, so that we shall lose by my amendment $1,500,000 of revenue—not exceeding that under any circumstances.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of Senators for a moment to the very extraordinary duties of this bill, not that I am going to occupy their time, because I will not do so, but I wish to state some facts that Senators can see by merely examining the bill. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the extraordinary provisions of this bill which proposes to tax the people of this country one hundred per cent. upon tea, and only from thirty-five to seventy per cent. upon the article of silk. Table salt, which the farmer is compelled to have, which is an absolute necessity, is taxed from one hundred and sixty to two hundred and fifty per cent. under this bill, while the article of silk is taxed from thirty-five to seventy per cent.

The Senator from Maine informs us that it is an easy and simple matter to get revenue from tea and coffee and salt. The Senator from New Jersey stated the other day that we imported last year into the single port of New York $25,000,000 in value of silks. Is it not just as easy to get a large revenue from silk as from tea or coffee or salt? I cannot for my life see the difference in this point of view. The importations of silk into the country are very regular, and so are the importations of foreign carpets. Inasmuch as we are acting in the direction of having high taxes upon woollens, I ask would it not be as well to put an additional tariff of fifty per cent. upon fine carpets, making the duty one hundred per cent. instead of fifty per cent., which is all the bill now imposes upon the finest foreign-made carpets? Would it not be just as well to increase on that article as to insist on keeping the tariff at one hundred per cent. upon an article that is used at this day by almost everybody?

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that this proposition will be adopted. I am perfectly willing to increase the duty upon silks if gentlemen will say so. I will do it at the risk of increasing the profits of the silk manufacturers. Reduce the duty upon the raw material of silk, if you please, and increase it upon the manufactured article. That will be an encouragement to the manufacturers; and if they can profit by it I shall not grumble. But it is a notorious fact that the poorer people of this country, many of those who use salt, tea, and coffee, do not perhaps use twenty dollars' worth of silk during the year. It is the wealthy people, those who are able to pay for it, who use silk. The poorer people do not use this expensive fabric. It is a notorious fact, and it cannot be denied, that the duty upon the very lowest quality of woollen goods in this bill is the highest percentage. Even the ordinary article of carpeting is taxed from seventy to one hundred per cent., while the finest article of carpeting is taxed but fifty per cent. That is true, and is easily demonstrable if any Senator will take the amounts of importation and compare them with the valuation of the articles abroad. Very little will be lost to the revenue, and it will be some relief if this proposition be adopted, as I hope it will be.

Mr. FOWLER. I would like to move an amendment to the amendment if it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the opinion of the Chair that an amendment to the amendment is not now in order, this being an amendment to the original amendment.

Mr. FOWLER. I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri. I believe it is just and equal to the district of country I represent; at any rate, not only the southern but the entire western country. They have little or no interest in the duties that have been incorporated into this bill, and pay them as they would pay a direct tax imposed on them for the support of the Government. Here is a reduction proposed to be made on a certain article that comes in competition with no interest of ours, that injures no branch of industry, that are prime necessities of life; and it is proposed simply to reduce the duty on tea from one hundred per cent. to sixty per cent. This will diminish the revenue about one million eight hundred thousand dollars according to the Treasury report of 1865. We have a margin, according to the Secretary's calculations, as I said before, of about ten million dollars to go on this year, and certainly we can afford to diminish that by $1,800,000.

I take this subject wholly upon its own merits, and do not propose to contrast it with any other duties that have been assessed, because many of my votes for increasing duties were given cheerfully; but when the article of tea is proposed to be taxed as high as sixty per cent. I think that is sufficient. I regret very much that the amendment I moved before was lost. I hope still to get it up in some other form, and have coffee reduced to somewhere within the bounds of reason.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall be as ready as any other Senator to reduce the duty on both the articles mentioned—tea and coffee; and if it were safe to do so I would be ready to vote for it at the present time; but all the arguments that have been presented in favor of the reduction were considered by the Committee on Finance, because the bill as it came from the House of Representatives came with a reduction, and that point was of course considered. I do not, however, think it is safe at the present time. There is to be a very large falling off in the revenue—very large indeed; much greater than is calculated upon; and I think it is much safer to adhere to the bill as reported by the Committee on Finance. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance inform me what is the duty under the existing law, and whether it is the same as you propose to make it now?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The same as in the bill. We have made no change.

Mr. GRIMES called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. The chairman of the Finance Committee says the committee propose the present rate. That is so; but that rate was adopted in the midst of war, at a time when we were necessarily compelled to get money from any source whatever.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We are in the same condition now.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why, sir, the tariff yielded $179,000,000 last year, and has yielded enough to justify an expectation of $200,000,000 this year so far as the year has elapsed; and there is $90,000,000 in the Treasury now in gold.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state one reason that influenced my mind in assenting to the present duty upon tea. Every body admits that a very large amount of revenue must be raised in the United States to meet the demands of the Government. It appears to me that the most direct and economical way of raising that revenue is to impose it upon tea and coffee and articles of that description. Teas are not necessities of life, although they are very commonly used; and an impost tax upon tea will be paid more readily and with less complaint than almost any other tax. The course that should be pursued, as it seems to me, in reference to taxation, is to raise as much as possible by a revenue upon imports and, if practicable, to reduce the amount of internal taxes. Now, if this tariff is left in the condition that it was reported by the committee, when it becomes necessary to consider the tax upon the internal resources of the country that can be so arranged as to accommodate itself to this tariff, and it will be much more satisfactory to the people, in my judgment, to remove the internal tax as far as possible, and continue the present tax upon tea and coffee, because they can pay this tax without feeling the burden as much as they do when they are required to pay the direct taxes that are imposed upon the business of the country. I think it is better, therefore, to retain this duty, and if it is necessary to relieve the people, relieve them by removing internal revenue taxes.

Mr. FOWLER. One remark in reply to that. I cannot see the difference between paying taxes going to market and paying taxes coming from it. I do not see any advantage in taking the internal revenue off and putting the same burdens on to the custom-house. One has to be paid in gold and the other in currency. The customs duty is paid in gold and the Treasury has the opportunity of selling surplus gold and paying somebody for selling gold and getting currency. We have an enormous amount of gold on hand—more than is necessary, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to sell gold and regulate our currency. I prefer reducing the amount of revenue to that which is necessary and no more. I think we shall get much more than is requisite for our purpose. There is no probability there will be such an immense falling off as from $200,000,000 to $145,000,000, the amount estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury as necessary.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, one proposition is certainly undeniable, and that is that there might and ought to be a large reduction of taxation either of duties on foreign imports or of internal taxes. If a proposition to reduce internal taxes would operate as extensively and as impartially upon the people of the United States as a proposition to reduce taxes upon foreign imports it would be as broad as it was long, and it would be as advantageous to reduce upon the one class of taxation as upon the other. But the proposition now is, as it was in the preceding amendment, to reduce taxes upon the importation of articles that are introduced from foreign countries and are not produced by ourselves at all. Is it proper? If we are to begin the system of the reduction of taxes we ought to begin to operate as extensively, as equally, and as impartially upon all the people as possible. In relation to the proposition, then, of the Senator from Tennessee, to reduce the tax upon coffee, what reduction of tax could operate so extensively and so impartially on the people of the United States as that? What other reduction of taxation upon any subject could operate with anything like approximate generality, equality, and impartiality as the reduction of the duty upon teas? These are articles of prime necessity and of universal use, that are not luxuries, that are not even comforts, but that are the necessities of life and essential to the comfort of the great mass of the American people. When there is a proposition to reduce taxes upon such articles what can be a better subject of equal, even, and impartial reduction of taxation to all the people? The idea that it is more simple and more easy to collect upon tea and coffee than it is upon the silks or any articles of internal taxation is preposterous. It is just as easy to collect taxes upon any subject of internal taxation as it is upon tea and coffee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it as easy to collect the tax upon whisky?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly it is, if you reduce that tax to anything like a reasonable amount. Reduce the tax from two dollars to one dollar a gallon upon whisky and you will collect more revenue, and you will not have one tithe of the perjuries, one tithe of the frauds that are now practiced every day. Here are certain essential, stable, necessary articles entering into the consumption of the entire people of the United States. They are not produced in our country at all. Their production and importation do not come into competition with domestic labor. They are not produced in any degree in our own country; and yet they are articles of such general, absolute use, so necessary to human subsistence and human comfort, and so generally and almost universally used by our people, that a reduction upon no subjects of taxation can operate so impartially, so justly, and so equally as upon these. Then why should the Senate hesitate a moment to reduce the tax upon tea from twenty-five to fifteen cents and on coffee from five cents to two and a half or three cents? Why should there be any hesitation to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Missouri? I do hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. McDUGALL. In the country where I reside we are growing tea now, and we are producing coffee, and it is supposed to be as fine a tea and as fine a coffee land as there is in the world, Java not excepted. Now, we do not ask protection for it. We do not ask protection for the tea and coffee grown in California and Arizona and Sonora, the countries we intend to occupy.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 15, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Doolittle, Fowler, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Kirkwood, Lane, Patterson, Ramsey, Trumbull, and Yates—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Cattell, Cowan, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Howard, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, and Wilson—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Creswell, Dixon, Guthrie, Nesmith, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, and Sumner—13.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to amend the bill on page 2 by striking out of line eighteen of the first section the word "three" and inserting "two;" so as to read:

On all sugar not above No. 12, Dutch standard in color, two cents per pound.

In looking at the table of importations for 1865, I find that of this description of sugar we received 519,475,697 pounds, at a gross value of $21,895,042, so that the article cost in the foreign market four and one tenth cents per pound, and the duty upon it is three cents, which is a tax of seventy-three and one sixth per cent.—a much larger duty than is imposed upon any article of silk manufacture that comes into the ports of this country, and half as much as there is on salt.

I find that of the article of sugar from No. 12 to No. 15 Dutch standard, there came into this country seventy-five million pounds at a gross value of $3,000,000, costing four and one seventh cents per pound. The duty is three and a half cents, which is eighty-four per cent. ad valorem upon this article. Of sugar No. 15 to 20 Dutch standard, there came into this country 12,741,808 pounds, at a valuation of $659,582, or five and one sixth cents per pound, and the duty is four cents, which is seventy-seven and one tenth per cent. upon the article. Of sugar about No. 20 Dutch standard, there came into this country 918,315 pounds at an aggregate valuation of $59,996—making six and a half cents a pound, foreign value. Upon that we impose a duty of five cents per pound, or seventy-seven per cent.
